EDWARD VI, only Son and Successor to Henry VIII, was nine years and three months old when he ascended the Throne by the death of the King his Father. His majority was fixed to the eighteenth year of his Age, by the late King's Will, but he died before he came to it, after a short Reign of six years and five months. The History therefore of these six years, as may be easily judged, will not be so much the History of the King himself, as of his Governors and Ministers. There was reason to hope extraordinary things from this young Prince, had it pleased God to bless him with a longer Life. He had an excellent Memory, a wonderful solidity of Mind, and withal, he was laborious, sparing no Pains to qualify himself for the well-governing of his Kingdom. At eight years of age, he wrote Latin Letters to his Father. French was as familiar to him as English. He learnt also Greek, Spanish, and Italian. After that, he applied himself to the Liberal Sciences, wherein he made an astonishing Progress (1). Cardan, who saw him in his fifteenth year, speaks of him as of the wonder of the age. The Testimony of this [Italian] Philosopher was the less suspicious, as it was after the young Prince's death that he published his Praises, and in Italy, where his Memory was odious.

As soon as Henry VIII. had resigned his last breath, the Earl of Hertford, and Sir Anthony Brown, were sent by the Council, to give young Edward notice of it, and to bring him to London. He was then with his Sister the Princess Elizabeth at Hertford, from whence the Deputies conducted him to Enfield. Here they inform him of the King's death, and pay their respects to him as to their Sovereign. After that, they attended him to the Tower of London, where he was received by the Council in a Body, and proclaimed King the same day, the 31st of January 1547.

On the morrow, the Council met to settle the Form of Government during the King's Minority. There was not much to be debated. The Parliament had empowered the late King, not only to settle the Succession by his Will, but also to appoint what form of Government he should think most proper, till his Successor was capable of holding the reins himself. All therefore that was to be done, was to open his Will and obey the Contents. There it appeared, that Henry had nominated sixteen Persons to be his Executors, Regents of the Kingdom, and Governors to his Son. These were :

Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury.
The Lord Wriothesley, Lord-Chancellor.
The Lord St. John, Master of the Household.
The Lord Russell, Lord Privy-Seal.
The Earl of Hertford, Lord-Chamberlain.
The Viscount Lisle, Lord-Admiral.
Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham.
Sir Anthony Brown, Master of the Horse.
Sir William Paget, Secretary of State.
Sir Edward North, Chancellor of the Court of Augmentations.
Sir Edward Montague, Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas.
Judge Bromley.

(1) He continued under the care of the Women till he was six years old; and then he was put under the Government of Sir Anthony Cook; of Dr. Richard Cox, Master of Eaton School, who was his Preceptor for Manners, Philosophy, and Divinity; and of Sir John Cheke, Professor of the Greek Tongue in Cambridge, that was his Master for the Latin and Greek Languages; as John Belman was for the French. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 2. Strype's Mem. Tom. II. p. 3, 9.

1547. Sir Anthony Denny, } Chief Gentlemen of the Sir William Herbert, } Privy-Chamber.
 Sir Edward Weston, Treasurer of Calais.
 Doctor Wotton, Dean of Canterbury and York.

As for Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, I have observed in the late Reign, that though he was at first among the Regents, his Name was struck out.

The King empowered these Sixteen, or the major part of them, to execute his Will, and to administer the affairs of the Kingdom, as they should judge fit. Upon this general Clause, which gave the Regents an unlimited Power, were afterwards built many Alterations, which seemed contrary to what Henry had ordained. He gave them however no Power to substitute others in the room of such as should die, but it rather appeared, his Intention was that the vacancies should not be filled up. This Consequence was naturally drawn from his commanding the Princess' his Daughters, not to marry without the written Consent of those of the Executors who should then be alive. It might also be inferred from thence, that he intended none of the Regents should be deprived of their Dignity.

Besides the Sixteen who were to exercise the Sovereign Authority during the King's Minority, Henry appointed a Privy-Council who should be assisting to them, namely :

Henry Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel.
 William Parr, Earl of Essex.
 Sir William Petre, Secretary of State.
 Sir Richard Rich.
 Sir John Baker.
 Sir Ralph Sadler.
 Sir Thomas Seymour.
 Sir Richard Southwell.
 Sir Edmund Peckham.
 Sir Thomas Cheney, [Treasurer of the Household.]
 Sir John Gage, [Controller.]
 Sir Anthony Wingfield, [Vice-Chamberlain.]

The late King's Will being thus known, the Council resolved to execute it in all its Points, and that very day the Regents, as well as the Counsellors, entered upon their Offices. I have already said, the History of this Reign relates more to his Governors, than to Edward himself ; and therefore it will be necessary to give the Characters of such of the Regents and Counsellors as had the greatest share in the affairs of those days.

The Character of Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury is sufficiently known by what has been said of him in the foregoing Reign. I shall only add two things. The first, that he did not much love to meddle with State Affairs, for which he was not very proper, by reason of certain maxims of Candor and Sincerity, which he followed, and which were very opposite to those generally observed in the Government of States. The second thing concerning Cranmer is, that he was extremely zealous to promote the Reformation. Since he was no longer restrained by such a master as Henry, he was so far from concealing his Opinions, that he even laboured with all his power to establish them by publick Authority. He was as it were the first mover of every thing that was done with regard to the Reformation. But his Zeal was tempered with a Maxim which he believed absolutely necessary, namely, to proceed by degrees, and retrench first the gross Abuses, that the People might be gradually accustomed to these Changes, before the Tenets of greater Consequences were touched. Besides that this course seemed to him the most natural, he went upon another Reason no less important, and which it will be proper briefly to explain.

It has been seen in the late Reign, that Henry VIII. left not his Subjects free to approve or reject the Alterations he had been pleased to make in Religion. There was an absolute necessity of conforming to them, or of resolving to part with Estate, Liberty, and Life itself. Hence the Church of England abounded with Multitudes, who outwardly embracing the established Opinions, were not however inwardly persuaded of their Truth. This was the case of several Bishops, and many dignified Clergymen. But it was the inferior Clergy that were chiefly infected with this Hypocrisy. Most of these were no other than Monks, for whom the Court of Augmentations, and the Possessors of the Abbey-Lands had procured Benefices to ease themselves of the Burden of maintaining them, to which they were obliged when the Monasteries were suppressed. These Men were still wedded to the Errors that were intended to be reformed. Cranmer thought it necessary therefore to gain a little time, in order to change the Clergy, by filling the vacant Livings with Persons well inclined to the Reformation. Herein he met with great opposition from the zealous, who wished to bring the Reformation to perfection at once, without attending to this worldly Wisdom, which they believed little agreeable to the Spirit of the true Religion.

The Lord-Chancellor Cromwell, was of a very contrary Character to that of Cranmer, and never his religious Opinions were entirely repugnant to his Ambition. He was extremely ambitious, very contented of his own Merit, haughty, imperious, and very fond of Advice was not always followed. This made him extremely troublesome in the Council, where no one could oppose his Opinion without being liable to be treated with bitter and offensive Language. But he showed his heat and passion chiefly on occasion of religious Matters. Though he had outwardly complied with the King's Innovations, he was however firmly attached to the Romish Religion. Of this he had given evident Proofs in the of Ann Askew, in his Project to ruin the Queen, and on many other occasions. Wherefore such of the Regents as desired to promote the Reformation, were to expect from him perpetual opposition. Since the Duke of Norfolk's Imprisonment, the Chancellor was considered as the Head of the Romish Party. Accordingly, he looked upon the Reformers, and Cranmer in particular, as his Enemies, as on their part, they could not without extreme Grief see him in a Post which enabled him to countermine their design. Happily for them, their Party was strongest, among the Regents, and in the Council.

Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford, was of a noble and ancient Family which came from Normandy with William the Conqueror. Henry VIII. having married Jane Seymour, after the tragical death of Ann Bullen, Sir Edward Seymour Brother to the new Queen, was presently after created Lord Seymour, and Viscount Beauchamp, and then Earl of Hertford. From that time he had always an honorable Post at Court; as well during the Queen his Sister's Life, as after her death. Henry VIII. ever expressed a great Esteem for him, and employed him in several military Expeditions, which he discharged in such a manner as increased his master's Regard and Affection. He was humble, affable, civil, courteous, and guided in all the Transactions of his Life, by the Principles of Honour, Virtue, and Religion, which are seldom found in the Men of the World. In a word, he had many noble Qualities, and few Faults. Among these is reckoned by some an immoderate Ambition. But very likely, this Ambition was rather an effect of his Zeal for Religion, than a natural failing, as will hereafter appear. It is said also, he had no very able Head, and therefore was deemed more proper to execute than advise. In the late Reign he adapted himself to the King's Religion, because it was very dangerous to oppose it. He was not the only Person that took that course. To this reproach all the English are liable, who lived in that Reign, excepting some few of both Parties, who suffered death for resisting the Will of that imperious Monarch. However, the Earl of Hertford was inwardly a Protestant and consequently a great Friend of Cranmer. This drew upon him the hatred of the contrary Party, and particularly of the Chancellor, who had already attempted to destroy him. He always showed a very great zeal for the Reformation, and to him and Cranmer is properly due the glory of every thing that was done in favour of Religion during the Reign of Edward VI. At King Henry's death he was Lord-Chamberlain. He was one of the Regents named in that Prince's Will, and, what still increased his Power, he was Uncle to the new King.

John Dudley, Viscount Lisle, was Son of Edmund Dudley, put to death in the beginning of Henry the Eighth's Reign, for having been Henry VII's Instrument in his oppressions of the People. Henry VIII. feeling some remorse for Dudley's death, was pleased, and, it may be, thought himself bound to make his Son a sort of reparation, by creating him Lord Dudley, and afterwards Viscount Lisle. So the Father's downfall proved the Son's rise. After Henry VIII. had given him a Place in his favour, he made a considerable figure at Court. He was honoured with several Employments, and always behaved to the King's Satisfaction. He signalized himself chiefly in the Wars by his Bravery and Conduct. He served twice as Lieutenant-General under the Earl of Hertford, in Scotland and Picardy, and had the honour of having a great part of the Success ascribed to him, though he commanded not in chief. Afterwards, being Governor of Boulogne, he repulsed, by a vigorous Sally from the upper Town, the French, who were now masters of the lower Town. The next year he commanded, as Admiral, the Fleet assigned against France, and after the French had refused to fight, made a Descent upon the Coast of France, and carried away a great Booty. In a word, he was considered as one of the best Generals then in England. In all probability, had Henry VIII. lived any longer, he would have pushed his Fortune farther, since with the Qualifications of a Soldier, he had also those of a good Courtier. But

547. on the other hand, for his Morals, he had nothing worthy of Commendation. He was excessively addicted to his Pleasures, and even ran sometimes into shameful Debaucheries. Besides, he was not very scrupulous with regard to Honour and Virtue. As his Ambition was boundless, he did not stick to make use of any means to accomplish his Ends. It may easily be judged, that a Man of this Character had not the concerns of Religion much at Heart. As long as Henry VIII. was alive, he kept exactly within the bounds prescribed by that Prince. Afterwards, in the Reign of Edward VI., he openly declared for the Reformation, because it was then the only way to please the King, and advance his Fortune. Nevertheless, he must have shown, when among the Romish Party, that he was not their Enemy, since the Court of France believed him very far from being a Protestant. This is at least what Thuanus affirms in his History. Hence it may be presumed, he considered Religion only as a means to raise himself, and had made it a rule to follow that which was most in vogue. Wherefore how zealous soever he appeared for the Reformation, he was never looked upon as one of its Protectors, because he was thought to act only out of Policy. The figure this Lord made during the Reign of Edward VI., obliged me to dwell the longer upon his Character.

Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, was reckoned a Person of great Abilities. He had been employed by Henry VIII. in several Embassies, Commissions, and Negotiations, and at length promoted to the See of London, and afterwards to that of Durham, the richest and most considerable in the Kingdom, by reason of the Dignity of Palatine annexed to it. As long as Henry VIII. lived, Tunstall conformed like the rest, to the Religion of the Sovereign, but it was perceived he was very sorry to see the Religion he had professed from his Youth, change by degrees. He would have gladly consented to the reforming of some of the most notorious Abuses, but was of Opinion the King went too far. Mean while, for fear of incurring the Royal displeasure, he submitted to what was enjoined. He was however considered as one of the chief favorites of the old Religion, and so much the more formidable to the Reformers, as he was able and learned. Nevertheless Cranmer had a friendship for him, on account of his mild and peaceable Temper, which afforded hopes of his being reclaimed.

Sir William Paget Secretary of State (1), was a very able Politician, and for Religion, was of the Principles of the Reformers. By which means he had contracted a strict friendship with Cranmer and the Earl of Hertford.

It will be entirely needless to speak of the Lord St. John, the Lord Russell, or the rest of the Regents, because they were wholly guided by the others. But it will be necessary to mention some of the Members of the Privy-Council, who were to assist the Regents.

The Earl of Arundel, a Lord of an ancient Family, was not very well pleased to be only among the Counsellors, whilst several who were his Inferiors were invested with the Dignity of Regents. On the other hand, he was not inclined to the Reformation. These two Reasons were the cause, that he willingly entered into all the Intrigues tending to produce any change, either in Religion or the Government of the State. But he had the misfortune always to labour for others.

William Parr Earl of Essex, Brother to the Queen-Dowager, was a Person of slender Merit. He made however some figure in this Reign, and was often employed, because he had the Address to be attached to the prevailing Party.

Sir William Petre, Secretary of State, was expert in the discharge of his Office. He was become almost necessary, and therefore had a great share in the most secret Transactions of the Court (2).

Sir Richard Rich, a Lawyer by Profession, was a good Courtier, who by his pliant Temper found means to become Lord-Chancellor (3).

Sir Thomas Seymour the King's Uncle, and younger Brother to the Earl of Hertford, thought himself unhappy in being only a Counsellor, whilst the King had made his Brother a Regent. He imagined, his being Uncle to the King, should have procured him more Honour. He had a boundless Ambition, joined to a high Conceit of himself. Wherefore the rank given him by the late King in his Will, not being capable of satisfying him, he had a mind to mount higher, which occasioned his downfall, as will hereafter appear.

The Form of the Government was no sooner settled according to Henry's last Will, but a change was proposed. Some of the Regents observed, it could not but be very troublesome for the People, and particularly for foreign Ministers, to be forced to apply to sixteen Persons of equal Authority, and moved, that one should be chosen to be Head and President, with the Title of Protector. They added, that by this means Affairs would be more speedily dispatched, and yet nothing changed in the established Form of Government, because the Person to be raised to that Dignity should do nothing without the consent of the major part of the rest.

The Lord Chancellor Wriothesley easily perceived this Motion was made to his Prejudice. As by his Office, he was next to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who did not much follow secular Affairs, he was in hopes of becoming the Head of the Regency. But he saw plainly, if a Protector were elected, the choice would not fall on him, but this Dignity would be conferred on the Earl of Hertford the King's Uncle, who was not his Friend. Wherefore he strenuously opposed it, declaring, the Regents had no Power to depart from the late King's Will, authorized by Act of Parliament. But matters were so well laid before-hand, that, notwithstanding his opposition, it was resolved immediately, that one should be raised over the rest, and called, the Protector of the King's Realm, and the Governor of his Person. However, it was with the express condition, that he should do nothing without the Consent of the other Regents. Then the choice fell, as it was easy to foresee, upon the Earl of Hertford, who probably had caused this Motion to be made by his Friends.

Indeed it was very natural to chuse for Protector the King's Uncle, and the Person of the whole Kingdom the most concerned for his Preservation. Notwithstanding it was thought by many, the Regents had made a false Step in the very beginning of their Administration, for the Reason alleged by the Lord Chancellor. It might however be said in their excuse, first, that they had given no particular Authority to the Protector, and consequently the Form of Government established by the late King was not altered. Secondly, that the Will empowering the Regents, or the major part of them to administer the young King's Affairs as they should judge proper, whatever was resolved upon by a Plurality of Voices, was deemed agreeable to the late King's Will.

Whilst all things necessary for Henry VIII's Funeral, and the new King's Coronation were preparing, the Regents were intent upon an affair which concerned them in particular, or at least the principal of them. Henry had resolved before he died, to confer new Honours on several of the Regents and Counsellors. He had even settled the Revenues or Pensions he designed to give these new Lords, to enable them to support their Dignities. But as some had refused them because they thought these Pensions too small, the affair was suspended, both by reason of this objection, and of the King's Sickness and Death. However, he had ordered in his Will, that whatever he had promised should be made good. This was sufficient to put the Regents upon performing the forementioned Engagement, especially as the Benefit was chiefly to redound to themselves. But as the late King's Intentions and Promises appeared not in writing, recourse was to be had to the Testimony of those to whom he had opened his Mind, who deposed what they had heard from his Mouth. Upon their Testimony therefore, the Earl of Hertford was made Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Essex, Marquis of Northampton, Viscount Lisle, Earl of Warwick, the Lord Chancellor Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, Sir Thomas Seymour, Lord Sudley, Rich, Willoughby, and Sheffield (4), had the Title of Barons, with the Names of their Families (5).

Then he ordered him to write in a Book such as he thought meetest. Which done, the King assigned to each such a portion of Lands out of the Duke of Norfolk's Estate, as he thought fit. Paget told him it was too little, and being ordered to acquaint those with it who were to be advanced, many thought so too, and desired to remain as they were. The Duke of Norfolk hearing of this, and fearing if his Lands were thus divided, they would never return to his Family, sent to desire the King that he would be pleased to settle all his Lands on the Prince, for, said he, according to the Promise of those days. They are good and fairly given. Whereupon the King resolved to reward his Servants some other way, so ordered the Book to be thus filled up. 1547. As Henry VIII. had not left his Coiffers full, Expeditions were to be devised to find the Revenues and Pensions assigned to the new Lords. No better was found than to alienate five or six thousand Pounds a year of the Chantry-Lands. These Promotions, with the Revenues annexed, were not universally approved, because they were all in favour of the Regents themselves or the Coun-cellors. Many thought, these Lords showed too much Avidity at the beginning of their Regency, and that they ought to have staid till the King was of Age. The Protector especially was liable to much Envy, by procuring for himself the two great Offices of Lord-Treasurer and Earl-Marshall, vacant by the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk. The first was conferred on him the 10th of February, and the other the 17th of the same Month (1).

 to such greatness, that it was hardly possible to make any Addition to it. Happy, had they been contented ! But we shall see hereafter, that by endeavouring to rise still higher, the two Brothers fell into a gulf of Misfortunes, which might have been avoided by a small share of Moder-

Henry the Eighth's Funeral Obediences were performed with great Pomp and Magnificence at Windsor (3). He had himself ordered his Body to be there interred. The day before, his Corpse was brought to Richmond (4), and as the Motion caused some watry Matter to run through the Coffin, it was reported to be Blood, and that a Dog, licked it up. This was said with design to verify the Friar's Prediction, who told Henry in a Sermon, that the Dogs should lick his Blood as they had formerly licked Ahab's. But besides that several affirmed, it was not Blood which ran from the Coffin, the report that a Dog licked it up, was entirely groundless.

The Ceremony being over, Edward's Coronation was solemnized the 20th of February, with the usual Formalities (5). The Lord Russell acted as High-Steward, by virtue of a Patent which empowered him to exercise that Office for that day only. Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset, had acted the day before as High-Constable by virtue of a like Patent, which limited the Exercise of his Office to the 19th of February, the day preceding the Coronation, from Sun-rising to Sun-setting. Probably, the Office of High-Constable was necessary only for certain Preparatives, since it was to end before the Ceremony of the Coronation (6).

The Chancellor's disgrace.

 Burnet.

I have before observed, that the Lord Chancellor Wri-thely, the new Earl of Southampton, was ambitious, proud, and haughty, very troublesome in the Council, and moreover, a great Enemy to the Reformation and the Reformed. All these Reasons made the Protector and most of the Regents wish to be rid of him. They were so happy, as that he himself afforded them a plausible Pretence. Resolving to apply himself chiefly to State-Affairs, he had on the 18th of February put the Great Seal to a Commission directed to the Master of the Rolls, and three Masters of Chancery (8), empowering them to execute the Lord Chancellor's Office in the Court of Chancery, in as ample a manner as if he himself were present. This being done by his own Authority, without any Warrant from the Lord Protector and the other Regents, his Enemies failed not to improve this occasion to ruin him. Complaint of what he had done being brought before the Council, it was ordered, that the Judges should give their Opinions in writing. Their answer was, That the Chancellor being only entrusted with his Office, could not commit the Exercise thereof to others, without the Consent of the King, or the Regency : That by so doing he had his Son to be Earl of Wiltshire, with 800 l. a year in Land, and 300 l. a year out of the next Bishop's Lands that fell. The Earl of Essex to be Marquis of Essex, and so on, with yearly Revenues to them. And the King having promised to give the Earl of Hereford six of the best Preenards that should fall in any Cathedral, except Beaulieu and Trevellick; at his desire the King agreed, that a Deny and a Treasurer should be instead of two of the six Preenards. All this Deny and Herbert confirmed, for they then waited in his Chamber; and when Paget went out, the King made Deny re-over the Bace, and Herbert observing the Secretary had remembered all but himself, the King bid Deny to write 400 l. a year for him. Burnet, Tom. II.

(1) On the 6th of February the Lord Protector knighted the King, being authorized thereto by Letters Patents. So it seems, that as the Laws of Chivalry required that the King should receive Knighthood from the hand of some other Knight, so it was judged too great a Presumption for his own Subjects to give it, without a Warrant under the Great Seal. The King at the same time knighted Sir John Hoby, the Lord Mayor of London, and William Portman, one of the Judges of the King's Bench. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 8. Strype, p. 15.

by the common Law forfeited his Place, and was liable to Fine and Imprisonment at the King's Pleasure. This answer being communicated to him in full Council, he fell into a great Passion with the Judges, and even talked very haughtily to the Regents, the Council, and the Protector.
 He told this last in particular, that he held his Chancellorship by an undoubted Authority, since he held it of the King himself, whereas it was a great question whether he himself was lawfully Protector. But this haughtiness, instead of composing his affair, only served to render it worse. His Submission might have lessened his Punishment, but by his Passion and Heat he gave the Council occasion to treat him with the utmost Severity. He was immediately confined to his House, with a Command not to stir till further Orders. Then it was debated what his Punishment should be. It was not doubted that he might be deprived of the Chancellorship. But as to the Regency, the Point was not so clear, because it was uncertain whether the late King had placed him among the Regents as Chancellor, or as a private Person, like several others who were in no Office. For this reason it was not thought proper to turn him out of the Regency; but to render it useless to him, he was left under an Arrest, and the Great Seal taken from him, and given to [Sir William Hayward Pavelet] Lord St. John, till another Chancellor should be appointed. So the Earl of Southampton continued in his Confinement till the 27th of June (9), when he was discharged of his Imprisonment, upon entering into a Recognizance of four thousand Pounds, to pay what Fine they should impose on him.

After the Protector was freed from this troublesome Enemy, he thought only of ingrossing the sole management of Affairs, and to be Protector indeed, whereas hitherto it was but an empty Title, without any peculiar Authority.
 To attain his Ends, he represented to the Regents and Council, that several Persons doubted whether they could by their sole Authority name a Protector: That the French Ambassador in particular had insinuated a distrust, that he could not safely treat with him, without knowing first whether he was duly authorized, since his Title might be contested for want of Authority in those who had conferred it. Upon this Foundation, he desired (10) that he might be allowed to prepare Letters Patent, under the Great Seal, establishing him Protector of the Realm, and Governor of the King. His request appearing reasonable, it was granted, and probably he was left to draw the Patent, wherein it is very likely, he used some deceit. What gives occasion for this Suspicion, is, that the Patent assigned him Prerogatives unthought of by the Regents, when they made him Protector. There was no mention of the Condition upon which he had been chosen. On the contrary, the King gave him full Authority to do every thing as he in his Wisdom should think for the Honour, Good, and Prosperity of his Person and Realm. Moreover, he appointed him a Council, giving him Power, with so many of them as he should think proper, to annul and change what they thought fitting; restraining the Council to act only by the Protector's Advice and Consent. It is true, this Council consisted of the same Persons which before composed the Regency and Council, except the Earl of Southampton. But whereas fifteen of them were before Regents of the Kingdom, Executors of Henry's Will, and Governors to the young King, they were now become by this Patent only mere Counsellors to the Protector, each according to the Rank his Office or Birth gave him, without the Protector's being obliged to follow their Advice.

Edward VI.
 ceedings.

Very likely, as I said, the Protector used some Fraud on this occasion. And indeed, it is by no means probable, that the other Regents should so lightly consent to be deprived of all their Authority. Nay, we shall see hereafter an evident Proof that they had no such intention. Those Hif-torians who have endeavoured to vindicate all the Duke of Somerset's Actions, in order to preserve to him the character of a true Reformer, have very lightly touched upon this point, whereas his Enemies have enlarged on it, to show

he was possessed with Ambition. However, as the Fact is certain, his motive only can be the subject of conjecture; some ascribing it to his excessive Ambition; others believing, he aspired to become master of the Government only to promote more effectually the Reformation. It is at least extremely probable that Cranmer and such of the Regents as favoured the Reformation, were convinced the Duke's advancement would be very advantageous to Religion.

After the Patent was drawn, and the Great Seal put to it, the Protector had all the power. He governed with an absolute Authority, without being clogged by the advice of the Council, since he was obliged only to consult those that were devoted to him. But on the other hand, this Proceeding, with some others of the like nature, drew upon him the envy and hatred of many, and particularly of the Nobility, who made him at last feel the effects. There was certainly much to be said against this Patent, which destroyed the Form of the Government established by Henry VIII. pursuant to an Act of Parliament which the King himself had not power to annul.

The day before, two new Treaties were concluded with France. The first was a renewing of Alliance between Francis I. and Edward VI. without prejudicing the ancient Alliance between France and Scotland, and the Treaties between the Emperor and England. The second concerned the Articles which had not been explained in the late Treaty of Peace, namely, the Bounds of the Territory of Boulogne, and the Fortifications the two Kings were making near the place. As to the Bounds, they were easy to be settled, because as England was to keep Boulogne but eight Years, it was not very material whether its Territory was a little more or less extended. As to the Fortifications, there was more difficulty. Whilst the late Peace was negotiating, Henry VIII. finding it would be in his power to prescribe almost what Terms he pleased, ordered the Governor of Boulogne to begin fortifying Boulenberg, Blacknefs, and Ambletuse. At the same time he gave Instructions to his Plenipotentiaries, to insert in the Treaty that neither of the two Kings should be allowed to make new Fortifications in or about Boulogne, but only to finish such as were begun. This was done according to his desire. However, since the Treaty, the French had attempted to fortify St. Etienne, Portet, and la Pointe. Whereupon disputes arose between the Ambassadors appointed to settle the Limits of Boulogne. But as the two Courts were equally desirous to avoid all occasion of Rupture, it was at length agreed, that the English might continue the works begun: That the French should have the same liberty with regard to the Fortifications of St. Etienne, but should discontinue those at Portet and la Pointe. This Treaty, and the other which renewed the Alliance between the two Crowns, were signed at London the 11th of March. But Francis died the 31st of the same Month, before he had ratified them, leaving Henry II. for his Successor.

Upon news of Francis's Death, an Express was sent to Nicholas Wotton Ambassador in France, with a Commission to receive the new King's Ratifications, and see him swear to the Treaties. But the Court of France was entirely changed by Henry II's Accession to the Crown. The Cardinal of Lorraine, and his Brother the Duke of Guise, managed every thing as they pleased, and it was not their Interests, the King should preserve a good Understanding with England. Besides that they were strongly addicted to the Romish Religion and the Pope, they were contriving means to hinder England from employing her Arms to accomplish the Marriage between Edward and the young Queen of Scotland their Niece. They persuaded therefore Henry II. that it was his chief Concern to recover Boulogne at any rate, for fear the English should make use of that place to confound his future Projects. Henry liking their policy, refused to ratify the Treaties, and disowned the Ambassador sent by his Father to London to conclude them. So, there not only remained an occasion of quarrel between the two Crowns with respect to the Limits of the Territory of Boulogne, and the new Fortifications; but also in refusing to confirm the Alliance, Henry showed his intention to break the Peace.

This was the first ill effect of the Death of Francis I. and Henry VIII. But it was not the only one. Germany as well as England suffered by the Loss of these two Kings. The Protestants, who had been ill used by the Emperor in the last Campaign, found themselves wholly deprived of the Assistance, they expected from France and England. Henry II's Ministers did not think proper, he should be engaged in a War with the Emperor in support of the Protestant Religion. But as Policy seemed to require that he should oppose the Emperor's progress, they intimated to him the expediency of first recovering Boulogne; after which, it would be still time enough to protect Germany, in case the Emperor grew too powerful there. As for the Court of England, there was no likelihood that during a Minority, they would undertake to support the Protestants, especially as France refused to be concerned with them. Mean while, the Princes of the League having sent to Edward for Aid, fifty thousand Crowns were privately given them, with great caution, for fear of offending the Emperor. It is very true, the Protector was inclinable to support them: But it was not yet convenient to do it openly. The Reformation was to be put upon a good foot in England, before any thoughts of protecting it in foreign Countries.

Henry the Eighth's Death was a sort of Crisis for England with regard to Religion. It was observed in the History of his Reign, that he steered a middle course in that respect. He reformed some things, but left others untouched. In general, the Reformation he had begun, may be said to concern only the Articles which were directly or indirectly contrary to his Temporal Sovereignty or Ecclesiastical Supremacy. He was so rigorous, that he would never allow his Subjects to differ in opinion from him, or at least not to show it openly. So all were under constraint, there being scarce any one but what believed more or less than himself. As soon as he was dead, every one took the liberty to speak his thoughts upon religion, though the Laws made in his Reign were still in force. But some change was expected. If on one hand the Reformed built their hopes on Cranmer and the Earl of Hertford, the contrary Party flattered themselves that Chancellor Wriothesley, Tonstal, and some others, would use their utmost Endeavours to restore Religion to its ancient state, or at least would hinder the Reformation from making farther progress. The Earl of Hertford's Promotion to the Protectorship, and the Chancellor's disgrace, gave the Reformed all the advantage, who seeing themselves supported by the Protector and the Archbishop of Canterbury, entertained great hopes that the work of the Reformation would visibly advance. This gave them the boldness openly to show their Sentiments, and even publicly to preach them (1). On the other hand, the contrary Party finding the time was not favorable, strove to persuade, that Religion should be left in its present state till the King was of age. They said, since no Alterations could be made but in the King's Name, as supreme head of the Church of England, it was necessary at least to stay till he was able to judge of them himself. But the Reformers agreed not to this principle. They maintained, on the contrary, that the Royal Authority was the same, whether the King was a Minor or not. They opposed their Adversaries maxim the more strenuously, as it influenced not only the Affairs of Religion but the Government it self.

The party of the Reformers was so strong, that it was very difficult for their Enemies to resist them. The King himself was at their head. Tho' he was yet of an age wherein Men hardly begin to make use of their Reason, he had made very great progress in the study of Religion, by the care of Dr. Cox his Preceptor, who was in the Sentiments of the Reformers. The Duke of Somerset, Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Holgate Archbishop of York, Holbeach Bishop of Lincoln, Goodrick Bishop of Ely, Dr. Ridley, and Latimer who was discharged of his Imprisonment, were the chief Supporters of this Party. These were properly whom Dr. Burnet calls in his History, the Reformers. In the other Party were the Princess Mary, Wriothesley Earl of Southampton, Tonstal Bishop of Durham, Banner of London, Gardiner of Winchester, with many other Bishops, and the major-part of the inferior Clergy, consisting, as I have observed, of the suppressed Friars, who had been recommended to livings. But it is certain, tho' this last Party was as numerous as the other, they were far excelled by them in Learning and Capacity. Besides, the Government was in the hands of their Adversaries. There was another thing which very much lessened the Power of this Party. Most of them had made it a rule to oppose to their utmost the intended alterations, but when effected, to pay them afterwards an outward compliance. This Conduct, though beneficial to particular Persons, was however detrimental to the whole Party, as it intimated they only loved their Religion when attended with temporal Blessings. The Bishops and the rest of the Clergy were properly the establishers of this maxim, out of fear of losing their Benefices.

The present juncture being so favorable for the Reformation, the Protector, and such of the Council as were of his Sentiments, resolved to improve it. To that end, they ordered a general Visitation of all the Churches, and appointed Visitors, with power to abolish certain gross abuses introduced into the Divine Service, and particularly

547. with regard to Images (1). With this visitation commenced the execution of the design already formed, of perfecting the Reformation, which was properly but just begun in the late Reign. As Dr Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, has given as full account of these matters as can be desired, in his excellent History of the Reformation in England, it will be needless to defend to particulars, which will be seen with much more Satisfaction in the Work of that illustrious Author. So, without speaking hereafter of Religion any farther than will be necessary for the understanding of the History, I shall confine my self chiefly to the political Affairs of this Reign (2). The first that offers in the year 1547, is the war with Scotland.

Sequel of the Affairs of England with Scotland. Act. Pub. XV. p. 131, 142. Buchanan.

Henry VIII. had left his affairs with Scotland in such a situation, that the agreed marriage between Edward and the young Queen of Scotland, was to be relinquished, or the Treaty executed by force of Arms. The Party, against the marriage in Scotland was so powerful, that the others durst hardly discover their contrary Sentiments. If the affair had been to be decided by the two Kingdoms, in all appearance Scotland would have been forced to submit. But the King of France took care not to abandon the Scots.

Hayward, Hallingb. Burnet.

He was highly concerned to hinder the King of England from becoming Master of Scotland. Herein his Sentiments agreed with those of the two Lorrain Princes, Brothers of the Queen Dowager of Scotland. It was this that most troubled the Protector, especially as Henry II. had now declared he would assist the Scots to the utmost of his power. Mean while, the projected marriage was so advantageous to England, that it well deserved some endeavours to accomplish it. Besides, Henry VIII. had so expressly ordered, before he died, that all possible means should be used to effect it, that the Protector thought he could not be excused from taking some steps, to show he intended to execute his orders. He resolved therefore to carry war into Scotland.

War with Scotland resolved.

Indeed, it was a very extraordinary way of wooing the young Queen for Edward. But in this the Protector and the Council followed Henry VIII's maxim, who ever flattered himself, that the inconveniences and dangers of a war would at last oblige the Scots to execute the Treaty. To that end therefore they resolved to make war upon Scotland, and not with design to conquer the Kingdom.

Conference for a Peace very ineffectual. Burnet.

Every thing being prepared, and the Protector ready to go and command the Army, the French Ambassador desired him to consent to a Negotiation, to try to conclude a Peace before Hostilities were begun. The Protector, who was willing to manage France, complied with his request, and the Conferences began the 4th of August. Tanshal, who was first Plenipotentiary (3), had orders to yield every thing, provided the Scotch Commissioners had power to agree to the marriage, otherwise he was to break off the Congress. This condition rendered the negotiation ineffectual, because the Scots had nothing like it in their instructions. So the Protector departing in August, entered the Territories of Scotland the 2d of September, with an Army of fifteen thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse (4), having the Earl of Warwick for Lieutenant-General. He took some Castles in his march, and particularly the Castle of Broughty (5) near the Tay's mouth, where he left a Garrison of two hundred Men. A few days after, he came within sight of the Scotch Army, thirty thousand strong (6), with thirty Pieces of Cannon, who expected him on the Field of Pinkie near Musselburgh.

The Protector enters Scotland. Hayward. Buchanan. Burnet.

The Duke of Somerset, as I said, had undertaken this war against his Will, and only to avoid the blame of not endeavouring to procure for his young Master an advantageous marriage. The fight of the Enemies Army, superior to his own, increased not his desire to decide the affair by way of Arms. Wherefore, to avoid so dangerous a decision, he wrote to the Earl of Arran Regent of Scotland, desiring him to consider the great quantity of innocent Blood which was going to be shed. And to show that he was ready himself to come to an agreement, he made this offer: That he would retire to England with his Army, if the Scots would agree that the young Queen should be bred up in Scotland till she came of age, and give Security that she should not till then be contracted to any Foreigner. This Proposal might have been accepted without any detriment, either to the Queen or the Kingdom of Scotland. In the first place, this condition hindered not the Queen from marrying a Scotch Lord. Secondly, the worst that could happen to the Scots, was to be, when their Queen was of Age, in the same situation they were in at present. Lastly, the King of England or the Queen might dye in this interval, and of course the death of either ended the quarrel. But the French Faction was so prevalent in the Council of Scotland, that this advantageous offer was proudly rejected. Nay, a rumour was spread among the Scotch Troops, that the Protector of England would not hearken to a Peace, unless the Queen was put into his hands.

The two Armies were parted by the River Esk. The English were encamped about two miles on the South-side, and the Scots along the banks, on the North. So if the Scots had been willing to avoid a battle, probably, the English would never have attempted to pass the River in their light. Mean while, the Protector, having formed the design of approaching the Scots, and gaining a rising ground on the Left which commanded their Camp, moved forward with his whole Army. But the Scots having notice of it, immediately passed the River, and possessed themselves of that Post. The Protector having missed his aim, marched to the Right, towards the Sea, in order to encamp on a little hill not far from the river. This march made the Scots imagine, he was approaching the Sea, to put his Ordnance and Baggage on board the Fleet, which was entered the Firth, that he might retreat the more easily. The whole Scotch Army were so possessed with this notion, that they considered the English as already vanquished by fears. Mean while, the Protector had posted himself on the Hill, and made some intrenchments before his Camp. This confirmed the Scots in their opinion, that it was only a feint in order to retire in the night. So, resolving to hinder the English from executing this imaginary design, they advanced in good order to join battle. The moment the Protector had received intelligence of their march, he drew up his Army, part on the Hill, and part on the Plain, and expected them without stirring. He had placed his Artillery in an advantageous place that commanded the whole Plain, and on the other side, his Fleet was near enough to fire upon the Enemy in flank. Nay there was a Galliot, which being lighter than the rest of the Ships, came very near the Land, and extremely annoyed the Scotch Army (7).

Hayward.

It was on the 10th of September that the two Armies engaged. I shall not relate the particulars of this Battle. Besides that the Historians agree not in the principal Circumstances, there are but few capable of giving a just account of what passes on these occasions, and of pointing out the chief causes of the gain or loss of a Battle. It belongs only to Generals themselves to be good Historians on such Subjects. I shall content my self therefore with reciting the Success of this here. After a very obstinate fight, the Scots were routed, leaving fourteen thousand dead on the place, and fifteen hundred Prisoners in the hands of the English, of whom eight hundred were Gentlemen.

Hollingb. Hayward.

This great loss threw all Scotland into the utmost consternation. The Regent and the Queen after garrisoning the Castle of Edinburgh, retired to Sterling with the remains of their Army, abandoning thus the Frontiers to the ravages of the English. A few days after the Protector took Leith, and the English Fleet commanded by the Lord Clinton, burnt several Sea-port Towns in the County of Fife, with all the Ships in their Harbours. Then, the English Army marched to Edinburgh, and entering without opposition, plundered the City. Such a terror seized all Scotland, that if the Protector had improv'd his Success,

The Duke of Somerset was General of the whole Army, and Captain of the whole Ward, which consisted of four thousand Foot. The Earl of Warwick led the Fore-ward, containing three thousand Foot. And the Rear-ward, wherein was the same number, was led up by the Lord Darnley. The Lord Grey of Wilton, Marshal of the Army, was Captain General of the Horse, in number six thousand. Sir Francis Bryan, Captain of the light Horse, in number two thousand. Sir Ralph Vane Lieutenant of all the Men at Arms, and Demi-Lances. Sir Thomas Darcy Captain of all the King's Pensioners and Men at Arms. Sir Peter Mewster Captain of the Hinge-batters, in number 600. Sir Peter Cambray Captain of two hundred Hinge-batters on Horse-back. John Brome, Captain of the Pioneers, in number fourteen hundred, p. 920. In the mean time, the Fleet advanced towards Newcastle, consisting of sixty five Vessels, whereof one Galliot, and thirty four tall Ships were prepared for fighting, the rest served for carriage of Ammunition and Victuals. Of this Fleet Sir Edward Clinton was Admiral, and Sir William Woodhouse Vice-Admiral. Hayward, p. 279.

1547. by besieging the Castle of Edinburgh, it is hardly to be doubted, he would have forced the Regent to relinquish the young Queen, or subdued the Kingdom. But affairs which concerned him in particular, made him relinquish his enterprize, just as he was going to reap the Fruits of his victory. Whilst he was employed in Scotland, his Brother the Admiral caballed against him in England, and had now made such progress that the Protector was upon the point of being ruined, at the very time he was causing the King's Arms to triumph. The advice he received made him think, he could not too speedily return to Court, in order to break his Brother's measures. This was the real motive of his hasty return, which however was coloured with other pretences.

He returns to England. The 18th of September he departed for England, having employed but sixteen days in his expedition, from his entrance into Scotland, and if we may believe the English Writers, lost but sixty two Men in all (1). In his return, he marched through the Counties of March and Tieristdale, and leaving a Garrison in the Castle of Hume, ordered Roxburgh to be repaired, where he left Sir Ralph Palmer Governor.

The People praise him, and the Nobles envy him. The Protector's glorious Campaign in Scotland, put the Nation in mind of several noble Actions performed by him in the late Reign. This gained him great Applause from the People (2), but withal the Envy of the Nobles, who, if Sir John Hayward was to be credited, had no great Esteem for him. This Contrast between the Nobles and People was very prejudicial to him. It induced him to rely too much on the People's Favour, and to raise himself above the rest of the Nobles, both by an external Pomp, and by assuming the sole Administration of Affairs. As by the King's Patent, he was not obliged to follow the Advice of the Council, he generally consulted only his Creatures, and neglected the rest, as if there were no such Men. This Behaviour seemed at first a little strange in one, who, very far from being naturally proud and haughty, was rather humble, modest, and civil. No other reason can be given, but his great Zeal to promote the Reformation. This was, doubtless, what made him think it necessary to remove from the Administration those who were not led by the same Zeal as himself, in order to lessen the opposition, as much as possible. Besides, he had passed the best part of his Life in the Court of Henry VIII., where he had seen the Authority-Royal carried to the greatest height, and as Henry had succeeded by the way of rigour, he deemed it requisite to follow much the same Maxims. The Reformation was certainly the sole Object, the Protector had in view, and all his Proceedings, in the Public Affairs both Foreign and Domestick, tended properly to that point.

Bonner and Gardiner are sent to Prison. The Commissioners, appointed to visit the Churches, having made their report, it was found, that all the Bishops had complied with the Orders of the Council, except Bonner of London, and Gardiner of Winchester. These had given an advantage against themselves, not only by direct opposition, but by Cavils, which plainly showed how averse they were to all Reformation. They insisted chiefly upon the forementioned Maxim, that it was not lawful to make any alterations in Religion during the King's Minority. As this Principle might have had pernicious Consequences, with respect to the Government, it was made a pretence to send them to Prison (3), notwithstanding their seeming, but very equivocal, Submission. The truth is, as several Acts in favour of the Reformation were intended to be passed in the next Parliament, which was summoned to meet the 4th of November, the Reformers were very glad to be freed from the troublesome opposition of these two Prelates. The Princess Mary was also displeased with the Instructions given to the Visitors, and the design of advancing the Reformation. She writ upon this occasion to the Protector, expressing her dislike of all the Changes which were making, and of those which were designed to be made during the King's Minority. The Protector sent her a very strong answer, and did not think himself obliged to conform to her Sentiments.

Rich is made Chancellor. Some days before the Parliament met, the Lord Rich was made Chancellor (4). The 3d of November, the day before the opening of the Parliament, the Protector, by a Patent under the Great Seal, was warranted to sit in Parliament on the right hand of the Throne, under the Cloath of State, whether the King was present or not, and moreover was to have all the Honours, Privileges, and Prerogatives that are of the Uncles of the Kings of England, or any Protectors had ever enjoyed, [with a non-obstante to the Statute of Precedence.] This Proceeding was a clear Evidence that the Duke of Somerset's Intention was, not only to be superior to all, but even to destroy by degrees the very remembrance of the Form of Government established by Henry VIII. Though he had not forgot to cause this Patent to be approved by the Council, before it was sealed, that was not sufficient to justify him entirely. It was well known the King did nothing but by his direction: That the Council was at his Command, and that it would have been very dangerous for the Counsellors, directly to oppose a Patent which concerned him in particular.

The Parliament being met the 4th of November, passed several material Acts, relating some to the State, and others to Religion. It is very certain, the number of those who desired a Reformation, was very great in the Kingdom. However, it must not be imagined that then, any more than at this day, whatever the Parliament did was agreeable to the general Opinion of the Nation. The Representatives of the Commons were chosen, as they are at present, without any Instructions concerning the Points to be debated in Parliament, nay, without the People's knowing any thing of them. Thus, the House of Commons had, as I may say, an unlimited Power, to determine by a majority of Votes, with the concurrence of the Lords, and assent of the King, what they deemed proper for the Welfare of the Kingdom. There was no necessity therefore, in order to obtain what the Court desired, of having the universal Consent of the People, but only the majority of the Voices in both Houses. Hence it is easy to conceive, that the Court used all imaginable means to cause such Members to be elected as were in their Sentiments. This is now, and ever will be, practised till some cure is found for this Inconvenience. I call it Inconvenience, because it happens sometimes that the Parliament passes Acts contrary to the general Opinion of the Nation. Of this one may be easily convinced, by what passed in the Parliaments held under Edward VI. and Queen Mary his Sister. In the Reign of Edward, Popery was entirely rooted out, and under Mary it was wholly replanted. In one or other of these Reigns therefore the Parliament must have acted contrary to the Opinion of the People, since it is not possible to believe, that a whole Nation should have thus changed, in an instant, from white to black. I don't pretend, by this remark, to weaken the Proceedings of Edward VI.'s Parliament in favour of the Reformation; what I advance is levelled as much against that of Queen Mary, as against this. My design is only to observe, that the determination of a Parliament is not always a convincing Proof of the Approbation of the whole English Nation. The Reasons therefore which may be drawn from the pretended Consent of the Nation, represented in Parliament, either for or against the Reformation, seem to be of very little weight. Each of the two Parties will always say, and perhaps very justly, that the Parliament which opposed them, was a Parliament devoted to the King and the Ministry.

The present Parliament was, in all appearance, directed by the Duke of Somerset, since it so readily favoured all his designs. I shall content my self with relating the Substance of the chief Acts passed this Session, without insisting much upon them, because Dr. Burnet has spoken of them so accurately and fully in his History of the Reformation, that it would be needless to repeat what he has said.

The first Statute repealed several Acts passed in the late and some former Reigns: namely,

I. All Acts declaring any thing to be Treason but what was in the Statute of 25. Edward III. This Statute of King Edward had long served for the Standard of Treason, till during the Civil Wars between the Houses of York and Lancaster, and particularly in the Reign of Henry VIII. the List of treasonable Offences was very much increased. And therefore, the Parliament very justly reduced these Offences within their old bounds, that the Subjects might not be liable to so many rigours.

II. This Statute also repealed all Acts, declaring that to be Felony, which was not so before the rupture with the Pope (5). And,

III. The Act which made the King's Proclamations of equal Authority with Acts of Parliament. If this Statute had continued, Parliaments would have become useless.

IV. Two Acts concerning the Lollards (6).

Lastly, By the same Statute, the Law of the Six Articles was also repealed.

(1) Under Henry VIII. p. 287. But Baillan affirms, that the English lost about two hundred Horse in the first Charge. 1. 15.
(2) The Mayor and Aldermen of London went out to meet him in Winchbury Field, on Octob. 8. when he returned to that City. Hollingsh. p. 99a.
(3) To the Fleet. Burnet, p. 37. Gardiner was imprisoned, June 31. and released about the end of the year. Strype, p. 68.
(4) His Patent bears date, Novemb. 30. See Burnet, Tom. III. Collect. p. 406.
(5) Or rather, all Acts made upon this head since April 23. 1 Henry VIII. as it is in the Statute.
(6) Those of 5. Richard II. and 21 Henry V.

By another, [Article of the same Statute] the King's Ecclesiastical Supremacy was again confirmed, with several Penalties upon those who should call it in question. It was likewise declared High-Treason in any of the Heirs of the Crown, nominated in Henry VIII's Will, and in their Abettors, to endeavour to break the Succession of the Crown settled by that Prince.

It was also enacted, That all should enjoy the Benefit of the Clergy (1), and the Privilege of Sanctuary, [as before Henry VIII's Reign] excepting only such as were guilty of Murder, Poisoning, Burglary, robbing on the Highway, stealing of Cattle, and stealing out of Churches and Chapels.

An Act passed in Henry VIII's time, empowering his Successor to annul Laws made during his Minority till his Four and Twentieth Year, was likewise explained; and it was declared, that this Act should only take place for the future, and not for the past (2).

With regard to Religion, several Acts were made, which caused very great alterations. First, private Masses were abolished, and the Cup was given to the People in the Communion (3).

Another Act gave the King power to nominate to the vacant Sees by his Letters Patents, and so abolished the way of chusing Bishops by Congé d'office (4), which was only a Mockery, since these pretended Elections were all made by the direction of the Court.

The Jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts was also very much abridged, by taking from them the Cognizance of matrimonial and testamentary Causes which were removed to the Civil Courts (5).

Then the Parliament passed a very remarkable Act against Vagabonds. It was enacted, That if any Person should any where loiter without Work, or without offering himself to work three days together, he should be adjudged to be a Slave [for two years] to him that should present him to two Justices of Peace, and be marked with the Letter V. imprinted with a hot Iron on his Breast. This Law was thought very severe in a Country like England, where Slavery seems inconsistent with the Privileges of the People. But herein the Court, by whom the Parliament was governed, had an eye only to the Monks, who being gone from their Monasteries, little inured to Labour, could not think of working for their livelihood. These Men spent their time in going from house to house to cabal against the Government, and inspire the People with the Spirit of Rebellion. So the Court, judging it to be an effect of their Idleness, and that if they betook themselves to some Employment, they would at length lose this Habit, resolved to make them work, how unwilling soever they might be. Mean while, as the Law was general, it occasioned great Murmurs among the People. Wherefore it was never rigorously executed, and even repealed by another Parliament.

Lastly, The Parliament gave the King all the Lands designed for the maintenance of Chancies, Chapels, and Colleges, which were not possessed by Henry VIII, and all Revenues given for Obits, Anniversaries, Lights in the Churches, together with all Guild Lands (6) which any Fraternity enjoyed on the same account. This Act did not pass without great difficulty. Crammer himself opposed it to the utmost of his Power (7), not from a desire to keep these Endowments for the uses intended by the Donors, but because he hoped to meet with some favorable opportunity to convert them to other uses beneficial to Religion, whereas being once in the King's hands, the Church was deprived of them for ever. But all opposition was in vain. The Nobles gaped, as I may say, after the Church-Lands, which they obtained of the Court upon very easy Terms. Besides, the Executors of the late King's Will wanted these Lands to pay his Debts and Legacies. It is true, there was a Clause in the Act, importing, that these Lands should be converted to the maintenance of Grammar-Schools and Preachers; but it was never put in practice (8).

The Parliament ended with a general Pardon, in which were excepted the Prisoners in the Tower, and those who had absented themselves out of the Kingdom. As Gardiner was not in the Tower, he enjoyed the benefit of the Pardon.

I just mentioned the reason which obliged the Protector to quit Scotland and return to Court, with a precipitation very detrimental to the King's Affairs. But it is necessary now to speak a little more largely of it, before I conclude the year 1547, because it was during this Session of the Parliament that this affair broke out.

Among all the envious of the Protector, there was not one more passionate against him than his Brother, Admiral Thomas Seymour. He was a hot, proud, and haughty Man. 'Tis true, he was reckoned to have more Sense than his Brother, and to be more capable of managing great affairs. But this Opinion might proceed from the Party he had made among the Nobility, who loved not the Protector. However this be, the Admiral could not bear the difference the King had put between him and the Duke of Somerfet, though they were both Uncles to the young King. He thought himself, by his Birth and natural Endowments, as worthy as his Brother of having a share in the Administration of the Government. Presently after Henry's death, he gave proofs of his Ambition, in making his Addresses to the Princess Elizabeth. But finding he was not like to succeed, he turned to Catherine Parr Queen-Dowager, and so won her Heart, that he privately married her, without communicating it to the Duke his Brother, who was now incited with the Protectorship. This Marriage was so quickly after Henry's death, that if the Queen had bred as soon as she might have done, there would have been room to question whether the Child was the King's or the Admiral's. Having kept his Marriage private for some time, he found means, unknown to the Protector, to procure a Letter from the King, recommending him to the Queen for a Husband. Whereupon he declared his Marriage, without using any Ceremony with his Brother. And here began their quarrel. But the Protector, who was a Man of great Moderation, prevented their quarrel from breaking out, though he was still extremely displeased with his Brother. The Admiral's Envy was greatly increased by the Duke his Brother's Promotion, who from a nominal, was become a real, Protector. This Envy, added to his natural Disposition, carried him at length to form the Project of supplanting him, by insinuating himself into the King's Favour, and making a Party among the Nobility. There is no doubt, the Protector's secret Enemies cherished the

(1) Benefit of the Clergy was an ancient Liberty of the Church, confirmed by diverse Parliaments. When a Priest or one within Orders was arraigned of Felony before a secular Judge, he might pray his Clergy, that is, to be delivered to his Ordinary, to purge himself of the offence. But the ancient custom of the Law in this point of Clergy is much altered, for Clerks be no more delivered to their Ordinaries to be purged, but now every Man, though not within Orders, is put to read at the Bar, being found guilty, and convicted of such Felony as this Benefit is granted &c. and is bound in the Hand, and set free for the first time, if the Ordinary's Deputy, standing by, do say, Legit ut Clericus.

(2) This Law was thus altered, The King, after the 24th year of his age, might by his Letters Patents give any Act of Parliament for the future, except this present Act, and all Pardons granted by Parliament, but could not do so before the beginning, as to annul all things done upon it between the making and annulling of it, which were still to be lawful Deeds. Barnet, Tom. II. p. 41.

(3) And because some Persons, on account of the abuses committed by this Sacrament, took occasion to despise and revile it, it was furthermore enjoined by this Act, That whoever were for the future guilty of depraving or despising of it, should be imprisoned, and make fine at random at the King's pleasure. This Bill was first read on Novemb. 12, twice on the 17th, and again on the 24th, when it was delivered to the Lord Chancellor. The Different from it, were, the Bishops of London, Northampton, Hereford, Worcester, and Gloucester. Journal Parl.

(4) But the Peers, usually paid on the Collation to a Bishopric, were retained, by an Article of this Act. They amount to 331 l. as the Reader may see in Collier's Ecc. Hist. Tom. II. p. 236.

(5) Whereas (says the Act) the Bishops did exercise their Authority, and carry on Proceedings in their own names, and since all Jurisdiction both Spiritual and Temporal was derived from the King, therefore their Courts and all Proceedings should be from henceforth carried on in the King's name, and be sealed by the King's Seal, as it was in the other Courts of common Law, excepting only the Archbishop of Canterbury's Courts, and all Collations, Presentations, or Letters of Orders, which were to pass under the Bishops proper Seals as formerly.

(6) A Chantry, was a little Church, Chapel, or particular Altar, in some Cathedral Church, &c. endowed with Lands, or other Revenues, for the maintenance of one or more Priests, daily to sing Mass, and perform divine Service for the Souls of the Founders, and such others as they were appointed to pray for. Chantry, were independent from any Church, and endowed for much the same purpose as the Chantry. The Gift was the Anniversary of any Person's Death; and to observe each day, with Prayers, Alms, or other Commemoration, was called the keeping of the Obit. See Strype's Mem. Tom. II. Reprint, the yearly Returns of the day of the death of Persons, which the Religious registered in their Capital or Martyrology, and solemnly observed, in testimony to their Founders and Benefactors. Guild, signifies a Fraternity or Company; from the Saxon, gildan to pay, because every one was to pay something towards the charge and support of the Company. G. Jacob. Of these Chantries and Free-chapels, there was in the Kingdom, two thousand three hundred and seventy four. When they were sold, in the 24 year of this King, they were valued, in the whole, at about two thousand five hundred and ninety three Pounds; and were sold for forty six thousand two hundred and forty nine Pounds, fourteen Shillings. See Strype's Mem. Tom. II. Reprint, p. 85, &c. Besides these Chantries, the Parliament granted also the King Tunnage and Poundage for life. Which was three Shillings of every Tun of Wine, and of sweet Wine six Shillings, and of every Aune of Rhenish Twelve pence. The Poundage was Twelve pence of the Pound, of the value of all Goods imported or exported; and two Shillings of Auns for Tin and Pewter exported. The Subsidy from Wool was 33 1. 4d. of every Sack of Wool; and of that exported by Strangers, 5 1. 6 d. of every two hundred and forty Wool-fells, 33 1. 4d.; for every 1. Laid of Hides and Backs, 5 1. 6 d.; but of Strangers, 1 1. 13 s. 4 d. See Strype's Mem. Tom. II. p. 231, 232.

(7) As did also the Bishops of London, Durham, Ely, Northwich, Hereford, Worcester, Gloucester. It was first read in the House of Lords, Decemb. 6, and the second, third, and fourth times, on the 12th, 14th, and 15th of the same month. It was read again twice on the 24th, and tent down to the Commons. Journal Parl.

1547. Admiral's Ambition by the Praifes they gave him, confirming him in his ill Opinion of the Duke his Brother. He began his Cabals about Easter, with gaining the King's Servants to his Interest, that they might continue their young master in a good Opinion of him. By their means he fo ordered it, that the King frequently came to his House to see his Mother-in-law. Here it was that he diligently made his Court, and even furnished him with Money for his privy Purse, and for small Presents to his Domesticks (1). This pleased the young King, who found himself freed from the trouble of asking his Governor for Money, and of being accountable to him for what he did with it. All this could not be done without the Protector's knowledge. He taxed his Brother with it, who denied all, but in so haughty a manner, that it was easy for the Protector to perceive, he had not much regard for him. He was unwilling however to come to an open quarrel, hoping in time to reclaim him.

The Protector was no sooner in Scotland, but the Admiral renewed his Cabals with less reserve than before. He distributed money to several Persons, and never ceased making his Court to the King. Nay, he obtained, unknown to his Brother, a new and more ample Patent for the Office of Lord Admiral, with an addition of two hundred Marks to the Salary. Sir William Paget, who was devoted to the Protector, and perhaps had orders to watch the Admiral, seeing how he increased in favour with the King, thought himself obliged to talk with him about it. But the Admiral's Answer not satisfying him, he sent the Protector notice of it, and upon this intelligence it was that he ended his Campaign in Scotland fo abruptly, to return to Court and break his Brother's measures.

him.

The Protector's Arrival was not capable of interrupting the Admiral's projects. He rather hastened the execution the more, not to give his Brother time to prevent him. He had gained some of the Privy Counsellors, several Lords of distinction, and many Members of Parliament. In fine, he persuaded the King, that the two Offices of Protector and Governor of his Person gave the Duke of Somerfet too much authority, and that it was proper to part them, and confer the second on him, in order to balance the Protector's power. The young King was much better pleased to have for Governor an Uncle, who had all the Condescension possible for him, than one who was not fo complaisant, and kept him more in awe. So his age not allowing him to make other Reflections, he writ with his own hand a Message to the House of Commons, desiring them to make the Admiral the Governour of his Person. The Admiral was to carry this Message himself: But his Contrivance was discovered before he could execute his design. The Council hearing of it, sent some Lords, to reason the case with him, and prevail with him to proceed no farther. But the Lords did not bring back the satisfaction that was expected. On the contrary, instead of regarding their Remonstrances, he answered with Threats (2). Whereupon, he was sent for next day by order from the Council, but refused to come. At last, he was threatened to be turned out of all his Offices, sent to the Tower, and prosecuted upon the Act of Parliament, which made it death for any Person to disturb the Government. This menace frightened him. He plainly saw, though he had the King on his side, the young Prince who was but just entered into his eleventh year, would not have resolution enough to support him, contrary to the advice of the Protector and Council. Nay, it was hinted to him, there was no likelihood, the Parliament would hearken to a Message from a minor King, but would doubtless suppose him to have been surprized. He chose therefore to submit himself to the Protector and Council, and to be reconciled to his Brother, who desired only to reclaim him by fair means. However this reconciliation was not perfect. Quickly after he showed, he had not relinquished but only put off, his design till a more convenient Season. And indeed, he never ceased endeavouring both by himself and by those whom he had gained, to infuse into the King a dislike of the Protector, and his other Ministers. This made the Protector

1547. fet Spies about him, to be informed of his proceedings, considering him as a very dangerous Enemy.

This year the face of affairs in Germany was entirely changed. The Emperor defeated and took Prisoner John Frederic Elector of Saxony (3), and declared his Cousin Maurice Elector, who at the same time took possession of the Electoral Dominions. After this disaster, the Landgrave of Hesse finding himself unable to maintain the war, made the best terms he could with the Emperor, and came to him upon the faith of a Safe-Conduct, which expressly ran that he should not be liable to any imprisonment. But by a gross fraud, instead of the German word emig, which signifies any, the word ewig, which signifies perpetual, was inserted. By this base artifice he was detained a Prisoner, to be released at the Emperor's pleasure.

The imprisonment of the two Heads rendered the Protestant Party very weak, and the Emperor's triumphant. The Archbishop of Cologne, who had embraced the Protestant Religion, was forced to renounce his dignities of Archbishop and Elector of the Empire. After that, the Emperor made sundry Alterations tending to destroy the Reformation, or rather, under that pretence, to render himself absolute in Germany. For this cause the Pope himself grew jealous of him. As, after his victory, his Ambassadors were imperious at Trent, the Pope ordered the Council to be removed to Bologna, under the feigned pretence of the Plague's being at Trent.

Hitherto Germany had served for Sanctuary to many Protestants persecuted in other Countries. But since the Emperor's victory, they were no longer safe there. For which reason many came into England, where they saw the Reformation to be in a prosperous way. Among these were Peter Martyr (4), Bucer, Ochinus, Fagius, to whom Edward gave Pensions and Benefices, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

Tho' Henry II. had refused to ratify the two Treaties concluded at London in March, the English however, as I observ'd, continued the Fortifications of Bullenburg, pursuant to an article of the Treaty of Peace. But after several complaints from France, Henry sent fo rough a message by his Ambassador, that the Protector, rather than hazard a quarrel with France, ordered the Works to be discontinued, before the Fort was finished.

In the beginning of the year 1548, the Council made several alterations with respect to Religion. By an order (5), the carrying of Candles on Candlemas-day, of Alhes on Ashe-Wednesday, of Palm on Palm-Sunday, with the Rites used on Good-Friday and Easter-day, were forbidden (6). Moreover, it was left to the People's choice to go to Confession or to neglect that practice, hitherto deemed an indispensable Duty. Some days after, it was ordered that all Images in general should be remov'd from the Churches (7). As England was then divided into two Parties, some approved, and others censured these changes. But the Council, in spite of all opposition, caused their orders to be confirmed by the King's Proclamation, in virtue of his Supremacy. Only Gardiner Bishop of Winchester openly opposed these Changes, upon the maxim that no alteration in Religion could be lawfully made till the King was of age. He was not the only Person that tried to infill this notion into the People. All those of his Party endeavour'd the same thing, but had not the courage to do it publicly. Whereupon he was commanded to appear before the Council; and as he offered to submit to whatever should be prescribed him, he was ordered (8) to preach at St. Paul's upon certain points, whereof one of the chief was, that the King's Authority was the same during his minority as when of age. He preached; but fo little to the Council's Satisfaction, that it was resolved to send him to the Tower. This severity produc'd a great effect, in that all the Friends of the Remijs Church relolv'd to conform, at least outwardly, to what should be enjoined by publick Authority, when they saw one of their chief Supporters was not spared.

Mean while, the war with Scotland gave the Protector great uneasiness. He clearly saw, it was ridiculous to 1548. think of accomplishing the King's marriage with the Queen of Scotland by the way of Arms, in spite of the Queen-Dowager, the Regent, and the Council. Moreover, he knew France was preparing to send them a powerful aid. And therefore he perceiv'd it would be very difficult to succeed in this undertaking: besides that this war would very likely occasion a rupture with France. In short, nothing was more repugnant than a war to his design of perfecting the work of the Reformation. He would have been glad the Regent of Scotland had accepted a ten years Truce, which he offer'd him. But the Scots would not hearken to it, because France had promised them a powerful aid. The Protector therefore was forced to resolve, even against his Will, to continue the war. But as he would not command the Army himself, he gave the conduct thereof to Francis Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, whom he appointed his Lieutenant. On this occasion he plainly shew'd, he meant to stretch the Prerogatives of the Protectorship as far as possible, since he would have the Earl take his Commission of him. However, as the Patent, obtained the 12th of March last year, did not so clearly give him the Power of nominating his Lieutenants, he ordered another to be prepared, wherein his Prerogatives were more fully explained and enlarged. In this, the King said, that having by his Letters-Patents of the 12th of March appointed his Uncle, the Duke of Somerset, Protector of the Kingdom and Governor of his Person, his intention was, that the Clauses therein contained should be understood in the amplest Sense, and the most favorable to the Duke: That however, as the generality of the terms might occasion some doubts, he declared that he constituted him his Lieutenant-General and Captain-General throughout his whole Dominions, with power to order his Subjects to take arms whenever he should think proper, and to appoint Lieutenants to command in his place, both by Sea and Land. It cannot be denied, all this was very contrary to the establishment of the late King, and consequently to the Act of Parliament by which it was previously authorized. All the Favours granted by the King to any but the Protector, could be justified by the advice of the Protector and Council: But those done to the Protector himself, must have been ascribed wholly to the persuasions of the Person who received them. Nay, in extraordinary Favours, this render'd in some measure the King's Patents ridiculous, who was made to say, he granted them to the Protector by the advice of the Protector himself.

Mean time, in the beginning of the Spring, whilst the Court of England was considering whether the war with Scotland should be continued, the Regent of that Kingdom had opened the Campaign with the Siege of Broughty Castle (1), which employ'd him three months in vain, tho' it was but an inconsiderable place. On the other side, whilst he us'd all his Forces in this siege, the English took the Castle of Haddington, and fortified it with all speed. By means of this place, situated in one of the most fruitful Counties of Scotland, they made excursions to the very gates of Edinburgh, which was but twelve miles from thence. They took Lauder also, and made some works there.

About the end of May, the Scots received from France an Aid (2) of six thousand Men French and Germans, commanded by Desse d'Esparvilliers. After these new Troops were a little refreshed, the Regent joined with them eight thousand Scots, and with these Forces the two Generals besieged Haddington (3). During this Siege it was that, after several Conferences between the French and the Scots, the resolution was taken of sending the young Queen of Scotland to France. Many Scots however very much disliked that resolution. They affirmed, when the Queen should be in France, there would be no way to make Peace with the English, whereas, without any prejudice either to the Queen or Kingdom, the ten years Truce offer'd by the English might be accepted. This Argument was combated by others, who maintained, that the aim of the English in this War being only to marry the Queen to Edward, they would have no farther inducement to continue it, when once that expectation was destroyed. Nevertheless, it was easy to see that, by delivering the Queen to the French King, they were going to be at the mercy of their Ally. But besides that the French declared, France would not engage to assist Scotland upon any other Terms, the Queen Mother was extremely desirous her Daughter should be at the Court of France, where the Princes of Lorraine her Brothers bore an absolute sway. Besides, all the Clergy earnestly press'd the sending of the Queen into France, out of fear of her being married at last to be delivered to the English, and that their Religion would be destroyed by her Marriage with Edward. In short, to win the Regent, the King of France promised to confer on him the Title of Duke of Châtelleraux, with twelve thousand Livres a year in Land. All these things produced the resolution of sending the Queen into France, in the same Ships that had brought the auxiliary Troops. But to avoid meeting the English Fleet, these Ships sailed round Scotland, by the North (4), and landed the Queen in the Province of Bretagne. Mean while, Admiral Seymour, who commanded the naval Forces himself, made several Descents in Scotland, where he was always repulsed with loss, and at last, returned to England without much damaging the Scots.

Buchanan,
St.

At length, the English Army, seventeen thousand strong (5), entered Scotland, under the Command of the Earl of Shrewsbury. At his approach, the French and Scots raised the Siege of Haddington, and retired (6). So the General easily supplied the place with Provisions, and then, marching to the Enemies, who were intrenched in an advantageous Post, offer'd them Battle. But after staying about an hour in their fight, finding they would not stir from their Intrenchments, he led back his Troops into England. It is hard to guess what could be the motive of this abrupt Retreat, which gave the Scots an opportunity to make great progress during the rest of the Campaign (7). The English Army was no sooner retired, but Desse attempted to surprize Haddington. He was now at the Gates, and just entering the Place, when a French Defier who had fled thither, fired one of the great Cannon, which being discharged among the thickest of the French Troops, so discouraged them, that they retreated with precipitation. From thence Desse went and fortified the Village of Leith, now become a very considerable Town. His design was to retake Broughty Castle; but receiving express Orders to make an Inroad into England, he advanced as far as Newcastle, without meeting any resistance, and returned loaded with Spoil. It is not known what was become of the English Army, led by the Earl of Shrewsbury into Scotland, and consisting part of English and part of Land-foreigners. These last were German Troops, who had served the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Hesse, and having no Leader in the Empire, had offered themselves to the Protector, who had entertained them in his Service. This had raised great murmurs against him, the English being impatient of seeing in the Kingdom foreign Troops, who are generally too much devoted to the King. It was easy to perceive, the Protector's aim was to strengthen himself personally with the aid of these Foreigners.

Before the end of the year, the Queen-Dowager of Scotland complaining to the Court of France of Desse's Conduct, who behaved with great haughtiness, and abused the Scots (8), caused him to be recalled, and de Therme was sent in his room. The new General was accompanied with Montluc Bishop of Valence, who, being returned from his Embassy at Constantinople, was sent to be Chancellor of Scotland. But the Scots were so displeased to see the best Office in the Kingdom in the hands of a Foreigner, that the King of France recalled him. They began to repent sending their Queen into France, when they saw the French show less regard for them.

During the year 1548, the Pope and Emperor had great quarrel about the Translation of the Council. The Emperor, as I observed, used the pretence of Religion to render himself absolute in the Empire. The Council, assembled at Trent, a City of Germany, as the Protestants had required, furnished him with a colour to compel them to submit to its Decrees. He was not sorry, they refused to comply with them; but desired they should have no other reasons than those which they drew from Religion itself, because then the pretence of constraint remained entire. But by the Translation of the Council to Bologna, a City of Italy, and belonging to the Pope, this same pretence was taken away, because the Protestants had cause to complain,

1548. complain, that the Decrees of the Diets were not executed. On the other side, the Pope finding the Emperor was become almost absolute in the Empire by the Success of one Campaign, grew jealous of his Power, fearing it would reach likewise over all Italy, and be very detrimental to the Holy See. For this reason, he was very glad to have him always at variance with the Protestants of Germany, that his affairs there might hinder him from forming new Projects. These different Interests were the cause that the Emperor and the Pope could not agree. The Emperor professed against the Translation of the Council to Bologna, and the Pope rejected the Protestation.

Soon after, the Emperor intending to shew the Pope, he could be without him, ordered Articles of Agreement to be drawn, which were called the Interim, because the Form of Religion contained therein, was to last only till a General Council should meet in some Town of Germany. The Framers of these Articles, by the Emperor's Order (1), took care to set them forth in the smoothest Terms possible. But, in the main, they contained the Doctrines of the Romish Church, though a little disguised. The only considerable Softnings were, that Marriage should be no bar to Priest's Orders, and the Communion given in both kinds to those who desired it. This work being finished, the Emperor summoned a Diet to Augsburg, where the Interim was propounded. The Elector of Mentz, without any Order, did, in all the Princes Names, give the Emperor thanks for it; which he interpreted as the Assent of the whole Diet; and after that would not receive the Protestations of several Towns of the Empire against the Interim. The Pope himself was extremely displeased with it, because without consulting him, the Emperor had presumed to dispense with the Marriage of Priests, and Communion in both kinds. This occasioned many Troubles in Germany, and obliged numbers of Divines and others, who disliked the Interim, to abscond or retire elsewhere, not to be exposed to the victorious Emperor's Repentment, who was bent at any rate to have his Interim universally received. At this Diet, Maurice of Saxony was solemnly invested with the Electorate, of which John Frederic had been deprived.

Whilst the Emperor was labouring to destroy the Reformation in Germany, it daily made fresh progress in England. The Parliament which met the 24th of November (2), was almost wholly taken up with matters of Religion. By an Act made this Session, Priests were allowed to marry. Another confirmed the new Liturgy, about which Commissioners, appointed for examining and reforming the several Offices, had been employed all the Summer. This new Liturgy retrenched divers Abuses, both in the Communion Service, and all the other Offices, and gave the whole a turn favorable to the Reformation. It is the fame, the Church of England makes use of at this day, excepting a few alterations (3).

The Protector and the Archbishop of Canterbury were the chief supports, and most zealous promoters of the Reformation, though always in pursuance of the maxim they had established, namely, to advance by degrees. Whatever reasons they had thus to proceed, the Zeal of the reformed Party were not pleased with it, because they were afraid that, by some sudden and unexpected Revolution, the work would be left unfinished. They knew, the Protector was hated and envied by many of the Nobility, and that all the Romish Party had a mortal aversion for him. This was sufficient to create a dread, that his Enemies would at length prevail over him; the Administration, he was entrusted with, being of such a nature, that it was almost impossible not to render himself in some measure obnoxious. They had the more reason to be alarmed, when they saw him forced to arrest his own Brother, who had now formed a Party to supplant him.

Though the Admiral had already endured a great mortification, he ceased not however his practices against the Protector, in spite of the warnings which were given him from time to time, that they would in the end prove his ruin. The Queen his Spouse dying in September last year 1548 (4), he resolved to renew his Addresses to the Princess Elizabeth. But he did not meet with that encouragement from the Princess that he had expected. After all, though he could have obtained her consent, that would not have been sufficient without the approbation of the Protector, and the Council. The late King's Will expressly debarred her from the Succession, if she married without the consent of the Executors. So the Admiral having no hopes of succeeding in this project, turned his thoughts another way, to try to gratify his ambition. It is pretended, he formed a design to carry away the King, [to his House of Holt in Denbighshire,] displace the Protector, and seize the Government himself, and for that purpose had now lifted ten thousand (5) Men in several places. However this be, it is certain he spoke openly against the Protector, charging him with enslaving the Kingdom by means of the foreign Troops in his Service. It is also said, that the Protector being informed of all his proceedings, showed extreme patience towards him, refusing to come to extremity, till he saw plainly one or other must necessarily be ruined. But to speak the truth, one cannot rely upon what the Historians say of the Admiral's private designs, or of the Protector's forbearance. The reason is, as some make it their business to blacken the Protector's reputation as much as possible, so others strive to vindicate all his actions. Thus much is certain, the Admiral was not satisfied with his condition, but fought to supplant his Brother, and put himself in his place. But one cannot be so positive of the means he intended to use to execute his designs.

At last the Council being informed he was contriving something against the Government, signed a Warrant to send him to the Tower (6). After that, Commissioners were appointed (7) to receive the Depositions of those who appeared as Witnesses against him. These Commissioners reported to the Council (8), that the Admiral was accused of forming, with several others, a Conspiracy against the Government (9), and of committing many Misdemeanours in the discharge of the Admiralty: That he was charged with protecting Pirates, [who gave him a share of their Robberies] and with refusing Justice, whether to private Persons or to Princes themselves, who complained to him of these outrages, by which the King was in danger of a war. It is said, before he was brought to his Trial, the Protector endeavoured more than once to persuade him to resign his Office, and withdraw from Court; but to no purpose. So his Accusation was drawn, consisting of thirty three Articles, upon which some of the Council were ordered to go and examine him. But he refused to answer, demanding an open Trial, and his accusers to

The first thing they examined was the Sacrament of the Eucharist, than which no part of Worship was more corrupt. After which they proceeded to the compiling of all the Offices, beginning with Morning and Evening Prayer. There were put in the same Form they are now, not laid as now; but in other things it was very near what it is now. The Office of receiving began with a short Exhortation, a Confession of sins, and the Overture was to be made of Bread and Wine mixed with Water. In the Consecratory Prayer were these words, hinc left out. With thy Holy Spirit which is hinc left out. With thy Holy Spirit Gifts of Bread and Wine, that they may be unto the Body and Blood of thy most dearly beloved son, Christ. This Communion Service was printed in 1547, before the rest of the Liturgy was drawn up. See Strype, Tom. II. p. 85. The custom Reverend may be in it, in the form it was published, [which was on March 8, 1547-8] in Sporwood's Collection of Commons, &c. and in Collier's Eccles. Hist. among the Records, N. 59. In Baptism there was, besides the Terms which we still retain, a Cross at first made on the Child's Forehead and Breast, with an Addition the Common Prayer Book. It is laid in the Preamble of the Act, "That there might be an uniform way of Worship all over the Kingdom, the King, by the advice of the Protector and his Council, had appointed the Archbishop of Canterbury, &c. to draw an Order of divine Worship, &c. which they by the aid of the Holy Ghost, had with one uniform Agreement concluded on. Wherefore the Parliament having considered the Book did enact, &c." This Act was variously censured by those who differed in some thought it too much, that it was said the Book was drawn by the aid of the Lords Devon, and Windsor. See *Journ. But he still refused to answer, inflicting upon his first demand, which was not thought proper to be granted. It is strange, that, as the particulars of his Charge were manifestly proved, if any credit is to be given to the Council-book, not only by Witnesses, but by Letters under his own hand, he should however be denied an open Trial, and to have his accusers brought face to face. And yet he was a Peer of the Realm, Lord High-Admiral of England, and Uncle to the King. At last, finding he could not obtain this Favour, or rather Justice, he defied the Articles of his Accusation might be left with him, and said, he would answer to them when he had considered them. But even this was denied him. I don't know whether it was lawful then to leave with the Party accused the Articles of his Charge, and to allow him time to examine them. But as for the bringing his accusers face to face, it is evident that could not be refused without Injustice, though this pernicious Custom had been introduced in the late Reign. Nay, it seems, it ought to have been abolished during a Minority, or practised against any other rather than against an Uncle to the King.

However, the Council having made their report to the King (1), it was debated, whether the Admiral's affair should be brought before the Parliament, and a Bill put in for attainting him, to which all the Counsellors agreed, the Protector himself not excepted. Herein their design was, doubtless, to take care of the King's reputation, and to cast the odious part of the prosecution upon the Parliament. The King, who believed his Uncle guilty, consented also, that he should be delivered to the Justice of the Parliament. Before the two Houses proceeded against him, some of their Members (2) were ordered to go and take his defence. He gave an answer to the first three Articles, and then stooped on a sudden, and would not go any farther. This being reported, the Bill of Attainder very easily passed the House of Lords (3). But there was much more opposition in the House of Commons. They could not forbear exclaiming against Attainders in absence, and the irregular manner of judging the accused, without confronting them with the Witnesses, or hearing their defence. Perhaps they would have thrown out the Bill upon this single consideration, if the King had not sent them a Message, that he did not think the Admiral's presence necessary, and that it was sufficient they should examine the Depositions produced in the House of Lords (4). After the King had thus made known his Will, the Commons in a full House of four hundred, passed the Bill, not above ten or twelve voting in the negative. Very probably, they were convinced of the truth of the Depositions, and, the point in question being only an Irregularity, which was even become a Custom, did not believe it a proper Season to put a stop to it. However this be, the Royal Assent being given to the Act, the Admiral was beheaded the 20th of March (5).

his Brother, or been afraid of displeasing him by a denial. The young King himself, then but twelve years old, would never have been induced to compel, as I may say, the House of Commons, to overlook the Irregularity of the Proceedings, if he had not been solicited by the Protector to take so unusual a step. It is therefore very difficult to justify the Duke of Somerset's prosecuting his own Brother to death, for Crimes committed against his Person only. And indeed, it was never clearly proved, that he had formed any ill design either against the King or the State, as he protested to his last breath. But this is not the only time that Plots against the Ministers have been reckoned High-Treason. For my part, I cannot help suspecting, that they who then thought of ruining the Protector, feigning to be his Friends, moved him with all their power to be revenged on his Brother, and were ready to serve as Instruments of his Vengeance, to render him odious. Some say, the first occasion of the quarrel between the two Brothers, sprung from the Duchess of Somerset's Envy at the Queen-Dowager, Wife to the Admiral, of whom she pretended to take place as the Protector's Lady. But it is unlikely she should be so void of Sense, or so ignorant of the Customs of England, as to dispute the Precedence with the Queen Dowager (6).

Before the Parliament broke up, a Subsidy was given the King to assist him in the Conquest of Scotland, which is called in the Act, a part of his Dominions. Then the Houses thanked him for the great happiness they enjoyed under him, and for applying all his Endeavours to the advancement of the true Religion. The Clergy also granted him a Subsidy (7), after which the Parliament was on the 14th of March prorogued to the 4th of November (8).

Presently after, the Council appointed Commissioners to go and establish the new Liturgy in all the Churches. It was every where received without opposition, except at the Princess Mary's, who would never submit to this Change. The King and Council seemed resolved to compel her. But upon the Emperor's Intercession, it was thought advisable, for reasons of State, to promise to leave her undisturbed for some time. He pretended afterwards, that the promise was made without any limitation.

At this time, the Council being informed that several German Anabaptists were come into England, and fearing they might spread their Errors, commissioned Cranmer and some others to search after and try these People (9). An unfortunate English Woman, Joan Bacher, commonly called, Joan of Kent, who had suffered herself to be seduced, showing an invincible obstinacy, was pronounced a Heretic, and as such delivered over to the secular Arm, and sentenced to be burnt. But when the King was moved to sign the Warrant for her Execution, he could not but be prevailed with to do it. He thought the Sentence was very unjust and cruel. Archbishop Cranmer, who had a great Influence over him, was employed to persuade him to sign. At length, the young King, silenced rather than convinced by Cranmer's reasons (10), set his hand to the Warrant, with Tears in his Eyes, telling him, if he did wrong, since it was in Submission to his Authority, he should answer for it to God. Whatever the Archbishop's Arguments were, it may be affirmed, this was not one of his brightest actions. He would doubtless have done better, not to have concerned himself in such an affair, so little becoming a Protestant Bishop. Accordingly this Proceeding has been often objected to him, and even served

They also gave Eight pence in the Pound of every Woolle. Cited made for sale throughout England, for three years. Strype's Ann. Tom. II. p. 454.

(8) Before the two Acts made in this Parliament, and mentioned above, the following were also then enacted, 1. That Malt shall be three weeks in making; except in the months of June, July, and August, when the space of seventeen days is thought sufficient. 2. That Tithes shall be paid as they have been within forty years before; and that no one shall carry away his Corn, &c. before he hath let out the Tithes, or agreed for them, upon pain of forfeiting the triple value of them. 3. That an Incumbent, not paying his Tithes due to the King, when demanded, shall be deprived of that Benefice for which they are due. 4. That Bachelors, Bachelors, &c. conspiring and agreeing not to sell Meat, Bread, &c. but at certain prices; Or Workmen refusing to work, except at a certain price or rate, shall, for the first Offence, forfeit 10*l.* for the second 20*l.* for the third 40*l.* to be paid within six days, or else to suffer Imprisonment for twenty days.

(9) Of these Anabaptists there were two sorts most remarkable. The gentle or moderate sort, who only thought Baptism ought not to be given to Infants, but only to grown Persons. The other sort were Men of fierce and barbarous Tempers, who denied almost all the Principles of the Christian Doctrine. They had broke out into a general Revolt over Germany, raised the War, called, The Ruffick War, and possessing themselves of Munster, made one of their Teachers, John of Leyden, their King, under the Title of the King of the new Jerusalem. Some of them set up a fantastical, unimitable way of talking of Religion, which they turned all into Allegories: These being joined in the common name of Anabaptists with the other, brought them also under an ill Character. Barnet, Tom. I. p. 110, &c.

(10) King Edward thought it a piece of cruelty to like that which the Reformers had condemned in Papists, to burn any for their Conscience. He asked Cranmer, What my Lord? Will ye have me burn her to rack to the Devil in her error? So that Cranmer, humble, castled, that he had never so much to do in all his life, as to cause the King to sign the Warrant, saying, that he would lay all the charge thereon upon Cranmer before God. But to bring him to a compliance, Cranmer argued from the Law of Moses, by which Blasphemers were to be stoned. He said, he made a difference between errors in other points of Divinity, and those directly against the Apostles Creed: that these were Impieties, which a Prince as God's Deputy ought to punish. Strong Arguments indeed for the monstrous Doctrine of Persecution! Ibid. Strype, Tom. II. p. 2. Edit. 1684.

Complaints of the People against the Nobles.
Hayward.
Burnet.

Whilst all England seemed to receive with Submission whatever came from the Court, the Leaven of discontent was fermenting in the Kingdom, and upon the point of producing great alterations. The chief cause proceeded from the People's not being able to gain their livelihood with the same ease as formerly. This affected all in general, as well of the new as of the old Religion. But the Priests, the suppressed Monks, and they who were still addicted to the Romish Religion, took occasion from thence to inflame the discontent universally spread among the common People, in order to incite them to a Rebellion. Besides, the Duke of Somerset's Enmities were not sorry that the People appeared dissatisfied with the Government. But before I speak of the Insurrections in several parts of the Kingdom during the course of this year, it will be necessary to make known the Causes.

these Complaints.
Burnet.

After the Suppression of the Abbies, there were great numbers of Monks dispersed in the Kingdom, who were forced to work for their living, their Penions being either ill-paid, or not sufficient for their Subsistence. So, the work being divided among so many hands, the profit became less than before. Moreover, whilst the Monasteries stood, their Lands were let at easy rents to Farmers, who, to cultivate them, were obliged to employ a world of People. But after these Lands were fallen into the hands of the Nobility [and Gentry,] the rents were much raised, whence the Farmers, to make them turn to better account, were forced to employ fewer hands, and lessen the wages. On the other side, the Proprietors of the Land finding, since the last Peace with France, the Woollen Trade flourished, took to breeding Sheep, because Wool brought them in more Money than Corn. To that end, they caused their Grounds to be inclosed. Hence arose several Inconveniences. In the first place, the price of Corn was increased, to the great detriment of the meaner sort of People. In the next place, the Landlords, or their Farmers, wanted but very few people to look after their Flocks in these Inclosures. Consequently great numbers lost the means of getting their livelihood; and the profit of the Lands, which before was shared among many, was almost wholly engrossed by the Landlords. This occasioned numberless Complaints and Murmurs among the common people, who saw they were like to be reduced to great misery. Nay, several little Books were published, showing the mischiefs of these Proceedings. But the Nobility and Gentry still continued the same course, without regarding the Consequences. The Protector only espoused the cause of the poor People, whether to mortify the Nobles, by whom he was not beloved, or because he foresaw the mischiefs which might arise from the discontent of the Commons. In 1548, the Inhabitants about Hampton-Court complaining to the Council, concerning a Park inclosed there by Henry VIII., the Protector gave them content, and the Park was entirely laid open. The last year, he had appointed Commissioners to examine whether the who had purchased the Abbey Lands kept Hospitality, and performed all the Conditions on which these Lands were sold them (2). But he met with so many obstacles in the execution of this Order, that it had no effect. Mean while, the Protector increased the hatred of the Nobility and Gentry, whose Interest it was to continue these abuses. Nay, it happened in the last Session of the Parliament, that the Lords passed an Act for giving every one leave to inclose his Grounds if he pleased. But the Bill was thrown out by the Commons; and yet the Lords [and Gentlemen] went on inclosing their Lands. This bred an universal discontent among the People, who imagined, there was a settled design to ruin them, and reduce them to Slavery. Whereupon the common People rose in Wiltshire, [and Somersetshire,] but Sir William Herbert dispersed them, and caused some to be hanged. About the same time, there were the like Insurrections in Suffex, Hampshire, Kent, Gloucestershire, Suffolk, Warwickshire, Essex, Hertfordshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, and Worcestershire.

The Protector perceiving the flames were kindling all over the Kingdom, sent to let the People know he was ready to redress their Grievances, and by that means stopt their Fury. To perform his promise, he brought the affair before the Council, hoping some expedient would be found to satisfy the Malecontents. But he met with so great opposition, that he thought himself obliged to take care of it by his sole Authority. So, contrary to the mind of the whole Council, he publish'd a Proclamation against all new inclosures, and granted a general pardon to the People for what was past. He moreover appointed Commissioners with an unlimited power to hear and determine causes about Inclosures, Highways, and Cottages. These Commissioners were much complained of by the Nobility and Gentry, who openly said, it was an invasion of their property to subject them thus to an arbitrary power. Nay, they directly opposed the Commissioners when they offered to execute their Commission. For this reason, the Protector, who every where met with opposition, was not able to redress this Grievance so fully as he desired. So, the People finding the Court did not perform what was promised, rose again in several places, and particularly in Oxfordshire, Devonshire, Norfolk and Yorkshire. Those in Oxfordshire were immediately dispersed by the Lord Gray (3).

The Insurrection in Devonshire was more considerable and dangerous. That County abounding with People, who had only complied outwardly with the Alterations in Religion, the Priests and Monks ran in among them, and fomented the Rebellion to the utmost of their power. They first came together on the 10th of June, and in a short time grew to be ten thousand strong. The Protector neglected this affair at first, in the expectation that this might be as easily dispersed as were the other insurrections. At last, finding they persisted in their Rebellion, he sent the Lord Russell with a small Force to stop their Proceedings. That Lord, who found himself too weak to attack them, kept at some distance (4) and offered to receive their Complaints, and send them to the Council. But this proceeding, which demonstrated a fear of them, served only to encourage them the more. At the same time they set at their Head Humphrey Arundel, a Cornish Gentleman, who was come to join them. Mean while, to show they had not taken arms out of wantonness, they sent to the King's General their demands, which plainly showed, Religion was the chief motive of their Rebellion. They were comprised in these fifteen Articles.

fewer to each in particular. This he did very boldly, not without reproaching them for being misled by some ignorant persons. Then the Rebels perceiving, the Court granted not one of their demands, reduced them to eight, which were not more agreeable than the former. Nevertheless, to convince the People of the justice of this refusal, the Council thought fit to send an answer to these demands in the King's Name. But this was not capable of reclaiming the Rebels, whose obstinacy grew the more dangerous, as at the same time there were the like Rillings in Norfolk and Yorkshire, and as the King of France was entering le Boulonnais with an Army. I shall speak of the Rebels of the other Counties after having finished what concerns Those of Devonshire.

The Negotiation breaking off in July, the Rebels besieged Exeter (1), where they met with more resistance than they expected, from a place defended only by the Citizens. As they had no Artillery, they set fire to one of the Gates, in order to storm it as soon as the violence of the flames was over. But the Inhabitants, instead of quenching the fire, fed it with much fuel, till they had raised a Rampart within the Gate. The Besiegers having missed their aim, wrought a Mine: but the Citizens found means to countermine, and spoil their Powder. At length, finding they could do nothing by force, they turned the siege into a blockade, in hopes that the want of Provision would compel the Besieged to surrender. But the Citizens endured extreme Famine for twelve days, with invincible resolution (2).

Mean time, the Lord Ruffell who had but a small force, being too near the Rebels, would have retired at a greater distance, for fear of being inclosed. But he found they were possessed of a Bridge behind him (3), over which he was necessarily to pass in order to be out of danger. As there was no other road, he briskly attacked the Guard, consisting of two thousand Men, and after a slight conflict became master of the Bridge (4). This Trial convincing him, they were not so formidable as he imagined, he resolved to attack them as soon as he had received a Supply which he expected from Bristol. Shortly after, the Lord Gray joining him with some Troops, and Spinola with a Body of Landquenets, he marched directly to the Rebels (5). He found a Body of them posted on the side of a River, who would have opposed his passage, but attacking them immediately, slew above a thousand, and then continued his march to Exeter. At his approach, the Rebels raised the Blockade, and divided themselves into small Parties, which were easily dispersed one after another. Arundel their Leader, the Mayor of Bodmyn (6), and some others, were hanged soon after. Thus ended the Insurrection in Devonshire (7).

The Riling in Norfolk was no less dangerous. One Ket a Tanner headed the Rebels, who quickly became twenty thousand strong. The Marquis of Northampton was sent against them with eleven hundred Men only (8), too small a number to inspire them with Terror. Wherefore he had orders to keep at some distance from them, and try only to cut off their Provisions. Ket marching to Norwich was advanced as far as Moultford Hill above that City, where he erected a fort of Tribunal to administer Justice as a Sovereign, under an old Oak, called from thence the Oak of Reformation. This was because they talked only of reforming the State, Religion being neither the cause nor pretence of their rising. Their Design was to destroy the Gentry, and put some of their own body about the King to direct and govern him.

The Marquis of Northampton neglecting to observe the orders given him, marched on to Norwich, and even entered the City. But as the Rebels had Correspondents there, he was attacked the next day, and glad to escape, leaving a hundred of his Men dead on the spot (9), with thirty Prisoners. This Loss obliged the Court to send the Army deigned against Scotland, under the Command of the Earl of Warwick. It was composed of six thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse. With this considerable body the Earl of Warwick entered Norwich, where he waited for a favorable opportunity to attack the Rebels. At last, as they had themselves waited the Country about them, and as the Earl never failed to cut off their Convoys of Provisions, they were forced to remove. Then it was that the Earl of Warwick closely followed them, and without allowing them time to come to themselves, fell upon them, killed two thousand, and took many Prisoners, among whom was Ket their Captain, who atoned for his crime on a Gibbet at Norwich (10).

At the same time that the Malecontents of Norfolk began to rise, those of Yorkshire also took arms; but their number never exceeded three thousand (11). They committed some outrages at first, but at length accepted the offer of pardon which was sent them. Some of the Ring-leaders renewing afterwards the Sedition, were taken and hanged at York.

During these Commotions, the Protector discovered by all his Proceedings, that he did not desire to come to extremities with the Rebels; whether he was perwaded the People had reason to complain, or was willing to gain their favour, since he was hated by the Nobility. Nay, after all the Troubles were over, he moved in the Council, that there might be a general Pardon proclaimed, for restoring the Peace of the Kingdom. But this was strongly opposed. Many of the Council were for taking this occasion to curb the Insolence of the People. But the Protector, being of another mind, gave out, by his sole Authority, a general Pardon of all that had been done before the 21st of August, and excepted only a few Rebel-Prisoners. He had power to act in this manner by virtue of his Patent, but it inflamed the hatred of the Nobles, as well as of a good part of the Counsellors, who were vexed to see themselves consulted only for form-sake, and that their opinions were of no weight.

Whilst the Court was employed in quelling the Insurrections, other Troubles unexpectedly arose from another quarter. Henry II. finding it a favorable juncture, entered the Territory of Boulogne at the head of an Army, though there had been no Declaration of war between the two Crowns since the last Treaty of Peace. Nothing was more express than that Treaty, wherein Francis I. and Henry VIII. agreed, that Boulogne should be restored to France in eight years, on payment of two millions of Crowns of Gold to the King of England. But Henry II. was no sooner on the Throne of France, than he formed the design of recovering Boulogne before the time appointed, and without paying the stipulated Sum. His reason was, that Henry VIII. had unjustly made war upon Francis I. when Francis was employed against the Emperor. From thence he inferred, he might himself improve a favorable opportunity, to repair the loss sustained by the King his Father. It is not necessary to examine here Henry's grounds, I mean, the pretended Injustice done to his Predecessor. It suffices to observe, that according to this maxim, the most solemn Treaties are to go for nothing. And yet, it is but too much followed, and as if it was an undeniable truth, it is an inexhaustible source of wars between Sovereigns.

However this be, Henry seeing that the Commotions in England presented him with a fair opportunity to execute his designs upon Boulogne, took several Castles in the Boulonnais. Then, he ordered the Fort of Bullenburg to be attacked, where his Troops were bravely repulsed. At the same time there was a Sea-fight between the French and English near Jersey, each claiming the Victory (12), as it often happens in such Engagements. At length, Henry besieged Boulogne in September, and the English believing they could not keep Bullenburg, carried away their Canon, and blew up the Fortifications. The Plague, which seized the French Army, obliging Henry to depart, he left 1549. the management of the Siege to Gaspard de Coligny Lord of Chatillon, who after some fruitless attempts was forced at last to turn it into a Blockade.

The War with Scotland was not successful to the English during this Campaign. De Thernes, who had succeeded Dixie, took Brough, Castle. On the other hand, the Protector finding himself obliged to employ the Army, designed for Scotland, against the Rebels of Norfolk, and not daring even to send that Army at a distance from the Centre of the Kingdom, resolved at length to demolish Haddington; which was done the 15th of September.

Mean while, the War, begun by the King of France, made the Protector extremely uneasy. He had certain advice that Henry II. was entered into a Treaty with the German Protestants, and had promised them a strong aid as soon as he had recovered Boulogne. Hence it was easy to perceive, he would make a powerful Effort next Campaign, and in order to withstand him, England would be obliged to make a considerable Armament. But the King's Exchequer was very low (1), and there was danger of raising new Commotions, in demanding fresh Subsidies of the Parliament. On the other hand, as the Protector was extremely zealous for the Reformation, he plainly saw nothing could be more advantageous than the Union of France with the German Protestants. But he was sorry, it was to cost the English Boulogne. The Protector also considered, if the war with France should last any time, there was some reason to fear the Romish Party would excite Troubles in the Kingdom. In that case, he foresaw how difficult it would be to maintain three wars at once (2). In short, there was another reason which concerned him in particular, and made him desirous of a Peace with France, namely, the war might give his Enemies too great an advantage, on account of the ill accidents it might produce, whereas a Peace enabled him to parry their blows. He was not ignorant there was a strong Faction already formed against him, as well by reason of the Envy at his Greatness, and of his dispossessing the Nobility and Gentry in the affair of the Inclosures, as because of the injury he had done to many of the Counsellors, in depriving them of the Dignity of Regents, and reducing them to the bare state of Privy-Counsellors. Among these, the chief were, the Earl of Southampton, who had refused his Place in the Council, and the Earl of Warwick. This last was extremely ambitious; he envied the Protector, and esteemed him but little. As of all the Lords who had most access to the Court, he thought himself the only Person fit to succeed him in the Administration of the Government; he reckoned, if he could but ruin him, he should infallibly profit by his disgrace. Upon this account, he had formed in the Council itself a strong Party, of which the Protector had some knowledge, but which he saw himself unable to ruin at once.

All these Considerations made the Protector resolve to propose to the Council the restitution of Boulogne to France. He seconded his motion with all the reasons he thought most plausible, adding, that by concluding a Peace with France, England would at the same time be freed from a burthenome, and withal a fruitless war with Scotland, since it was not possible to obtain the end proposed in beginning it. This Proposal was received by the Council with marks of Indignation, and considered as a real Cowardice. It was too nice an affair, for the Protector to determine it by his own Authority. And therefore, tho' he plainly perceived the Faction against him would carry it, he was willing his Proposal should be debated in form. The result of the debate was, that Boulogne should not be restored, but an Alliance with the Emperor endeavour for the Security of that place. Page was appointed for the Embassy, because being devoted to the Protector, the ill Success which was expected from this Negotiation, was designed to be thrown upon him, in order to blacken the Protector himself.

The Duke of Somerset's Enemies having resolved to execute the Plot contrived against him, began with spreading reports to destroy his reputation. It was said, he was more cruel than a wild Beast, since he scrupled not to sacrifice his own Brother to his boundless Ambition: That he was the cause of the Insurrections this Summer, by countenancing the People, and intimating, he thought them unjustly oppressed: That afterwards he favoured the Male-content to the utmost of his power during their actual Rebellion, and when their fury was stopt, granted them a general Pardon, contrary to the mind of the Council: That to maintain himself in the Post he had usurped, he entertained foreign Troops, having extorted the Council's consent: That he was raising a much larger and more stately Palace than the King's, and had pulled down several Churches for the sake of the materials, and alienated Church-Lands to bear the charge (3). That he had the boldness to call himself by the Grace of God, Duke of Somerset, as if he was a Sovereign Prince: That he had kept for himself the Money raised by the Sale of the Chantry Lands: That he had broke through the Establishment settled by the late King, by seizing the Regency alone, and excluding the other Executors, who had no less Right than himself: That he had ill-provided the Forts of the Boulonnais, that their loss might render a Peace with France absolutely necessary: That he had demolished Haddington in Scotland for the like reason: That he had most presumptuously assumed the Government of the Kingdom, and procured the King's Letters Patents to countenance his Ambition: That besides, he used his Power tyrannically, rejecting the opinions of the Council, and acting in many things by his own Authority. In short, Page being returned from his Embassy, without succeeding in his Negotiation, it was rumoured, that he had the Protector's Orders to represent the Impossibility of engaging the Emperor in the defence of Boulogne, that it might give a colour to the base project of restoring that Place.

As it was impossible, all these reports should be published and the Duke not hear of them, and guess the Authors, the whole month of September was spent in disputes and heats; his Enemies only seeking an occasion of quarrel to execute what they had resolved. Mean while, the Protector seeing his Enemies acting almost openly, was afraid they had formed a design to carry away the King, and to that end corrupted those about him. For this reason, to secure himself against such a design, he placed his own Servants about the King (4), with orders to watch narrowly what passed. This proceeding furnished his Enemies with the pretence they were seeking.

On the 6th of October the Lord St. John, President of the Council, the Earls of Southampton, Warwick, and Arundel, Sir Edward Norb, Sir Richard Southwell, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Edward Watton, and Dr. Wotton, met at Ely House in Holbourn (5), and sat as the King's Council. Secretary Petre being sent to them in the King's name to ask the reason of their meeting, they forced him to stay with them. Being thus met, they considered the State of the Kingdom, and laid on the Protector the blame of all the pretended disorders, and of the late losses in France, taking for granted, they would not have happened had he followed the advice of the Council. Then they declared, they had that very day intended to confer with him, but hearing he had armed his Servants, and many others whom he had placed about the King, did not think they ought to expose themselves to his Violences. This done, they sent for the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, with the Lieutenant of the Tower, and expressly forbid them to own the Duke of Somerset for Protector. The Lieutenant of the Tower (6) promised to obey. The Mayor and Aldermen answered more cautiously. But in all likelihood most of them were now gained, as it plainly appeared two days after.

Upon the first news of the Counsellors undertaking, the Protector removed the King to Windor, and armed such as he could assemble at Windor or Hampton-Court. This furnished his Enemies with a fresh occasion to complain, that he had carried the King to a place where there were no Provisions fit for him, so they took care to fend him what he might want from London. The same day, being the morrow after their meeting, seven Counsellors, namely, the Lord Chancellor Rich, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Sir Thomas Cheney, Sir John Gage, Sir Ralph Sadler, and the Lord Chief Justice Manwile, came and joined with them. Whereupon they wrote to the King a Letter full of expressions of their duty, complaining of the Duke of Somerset's not hearkening to their Counsels, and of his gathering a force about his Person, to make him believe they had ill designs against him, though they had nothing in view but his Good and Welfare. They wrote also to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and to Page, ordering them to see that the King's own

On the 8th of October they went in a Body to Guild-Hall, where the Common-Council was assembled. They declared, they were so far from having any ill designs against the King (1), that their sole aim was to take him out of the hands of the Duke of Somerset, who considered only his own private Interest. Whereupon the Common-Council openly declared, they were ready to support them to the utmost of their power.

The Duke no sooner heard that the City of London, and the Lieutenant of the Tower had forsaken him, but he was entirely discouraged. He called together the few Counsellors then about the King, and protesting, he had no design against any of the Counsellors, offered to submit to the Judgment of two of those that were present, and two of those that were at London. This offer made him lose five Counsellors more, who seeing him thus yield, did not think it prudent to expose themselves for the sake of a Man they believed already undone. So, though they approved not the Proceedings of those at London, they joined with them however next day, being the 9th of October. These five were, the Lord Russell, the Lord Wentworth, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Anthony Wingfield, and Sir John Baker Speaker of the House of Commons.

From that day, the Duke of Somerset's affairs daily declined, every one forsaking him when he was seen himself to despair of maintaining his ground. Nay, upon an Information to the Privy-Counsellors his Enemies, that he had said, if they intended to put him to death, the King should die first; and boasted, it was in his Power to carry the King out of the Kingdom, they declared him unworthy of the Protectorship, though they had no proofs of his speaking these words. After that they published a Manifesto, to inform the Publick of the reasons of their Conduct. Then they wrote to the King, that his Royal Father having appointed them Executors of his Will, and Regents of the Kingdom, they had chosen the Duke of Somerset to exercise the Office of Protector, with the express Condition, that he should do nothing without their Advice; which Condition he had not observed, but had made himself absolute master of the Government. Therefore, they judged him unworthy of that Honour, and prayed his Majesty's leave, to discharge the Office committed to them by the late King, and that the Forces gathered about his Person by the Duke of Somerset, might be dismissed.

Of all the Privy-Counsellors, only the Archbishop of Canterbury and Paget stayed with the King, who seeing the Impossibility of withstanding the opposite Party, advised the King and the Duke to give the Council the Satisfaction they desired. The King consenting to it, the Counsellors at London had notice of it by an Express. As they had foreseen the Duke would be obliged to submit, they had already sent Deputies (2) to Windsor, with a Charge to see that the Duke of Somerset should not withdraw, and that some of his Confidants should be put under an Arrest (3). On the 12th of October, the Counsellors, Enemies of the Duke, came in a body to the King, who received them graciously, and assured them, he took all they had done in good part. Next day they proceeded to the Examination of the Duke's Friends, who were sent to the Tower, except Cecil, who had his Liberty. On the 14th, the Duke of Somerset was called before them, and the Articles of his Accusation were read to him, the principal whereof were as follows:

I. That he had not observed the Condition on which he had been made Protector.

II. That he had treated with Ambassadors without notifying it to the Council, and by his own Authority had disposed of Governments and Bishopricks.

III. That he had held a Court of Requests in his own House (4).

IV. That he had embased the Coin.

V. That he had issued out Proclamations in the affair of Inclosures, against the mind of the whole Council.

VI. That he had not taken care to suppress the late Insurrections, but had even supported and encouraged them.

VII. That he had occasioned the loss of the Forts in the Territory of Boulogne, by neglecting to furnish them with Provisions and Ammunition.

VIII. That he had endeavoured to inflame the King an ill opinion of his Counsellors, by perfwading him they intended to destroy him, and had even ordered some Persons to put the King continually in mind of it, lest he should forget it.

IX. That he had caused the Lords of the Council to be proclaimed Traitors.

X. That he had maliciously not only put the King in great fear, by carrying him so suddenly to Windsor, but cast him into a dangerous disease.

XI. That he had armed his Friends and Servants, and left the King's Servants unarmed; and that he intended to fly to Jersey or Guernsey.

Upon these Accusations, to which it was then not a time to answer, he was sent to the Tower; those whom he had taken so much pains to humble, being become his proper Judges. He could not indeed deny the truth of most of the Facts laid to his charge. But the question was, whether they were crimes, for he was accused neither of fraud, nor rapine, nor extortion. But that was to be decided only by the Peers of the Realm, or by the Parliament. As soon as the Duke was in the Tower, an order was made that six Lords should be the Governors of the King's Person, two of whom were in their course constantly to attend him (5). Then it was easily seen that the Earl of Warwick had been the chief Promoter of the Protector's ruin, since all the other Counsellors suffered him without opposition to take upon him the principal Administration of the Government, though without any Title which might give him a particular Authority.

The Enemies of the Reformation gloried in the Protector's Fall. They were perfwaded, the Earl of Warwick was in his heart more Catholic than Protestant, and his strict union with the Earl of Southampton confirmed this belief. Accordingly Bonner and Gardiner, who were then in the Tower, writ to him a hearty Congratulation, upon his having freed the Nation from the Tyrant [so they called the Duke of Somerset]. It was even thought for some time, that the Duke of Norfolk was going to be released. But the Earl of Warwick was not yet fully known. That Lord, who was wholly swayed by Ambition, was properly of neither Religion. He was far therefore from undertaking to destroy the Reformation, which had too many Friends in the Kingdom. On the contrary, knowing how desirous the young King was to establish it, he openly declared in his favour. Thus the Adherents of the Pope and the old Religion had not long reason to rejoice at the late Revolution at Court.

Bonner, Bishop of London, had been deprived and imprisoned sometime before this turn. He was known to be strongly addicted in his heart to the Romish Religion, and to pay only an outward compliance to what was established by public Authority, whilst by a doubtful behavior he plainly showed his dislike of these alterations. They who were then at the helm, resolved therefore to put him to a Trial, which could not fail either to give them an advantage against him, or make him forfeit the esteem and trust of his Party. He was summoned before the Council, and after a declaration of the causes of Complaint against him, he was ordered to preach on a Sunday at St. Paul's Cross, and to prove in his Sermon certain Points, whereof this was one of the principal: That the Authority of a King was the same when he was in Minority, as when of full Age. He preached on the 1st of September before a numerous Audience, and touched upon all the points that were enjoined him, except the last. Besides, he brought in some things which gave offence to the Court. Whereupon the King appointed Judges to examine the matter (6). Dr. Burnet says, he behaved before the Judges more like a Mad-man than a Bishop. However, he was deprived (7) and sent to the Tower. It was doubtless with joy that a pretence was found to be rid of such a Bishop, who embarrassed the Reformers.

The Earl of Southampton was no less deceived in his expectations than the rest of his Party. He imagined, that having been one of the principal Instruments of the Duke of Somerset's ruin, he should be rewarded for this Service

But he found himself much mistaken. Rich still kept the Great Seal, and the Treasury was given to the Lord St. John, who, some time after, was also created Earl of Wiltshire (1). It was not the Earl of Warwick's Interest, to advance to any high Post to intriguing a Person as the Earl of Southampton, who, besides, was looked upon as the head of the Party against the Reformation. He would thereby have lost the King's Favour, whom it was his business to persuade, that Religion was not concerned at all in what had passed with regard to the Duke his Uncle. So, without a moment's hesitation, he forsook not only the Earl of Southampton, but also all the Romish Party, who had flattered themselves with seeing some great change in Religion. Southampton was so full of Indignation to be thus slighted, that he could not forbear calling against the Earl of Warwick: but perceiving Warwick was informed of his Proceedings, and knowing his revengeful temper, relinquish'd his Projects. Shortly after, he withdrew from Court without taking leave, and lived at one of his Manors, where he died with grief and vexation. Some even say, he poisoned himself (2).

3 The Earl of Southampton quite the Court and dies. Burnet. The War with France begins the Ministry, burnet. Howard. Strype.

Mean while, the war with France made the Council very uneasy. Henry II. it was plain, was resolved to besiege Boulogne, and it was justly feared that place was not tenable. Whilst the Duke of Somerſet was alone burthen'd with that incumbrance, his enemies would have it to be Cowardice to resign Boulogne to avoid a war, wherein they hoped to find an occasion to ruin him. But when they had the Government in their hands, they found difficulties in that affair, which they would not own, so long as they thought the event would be laid to his charge. They resolved therefore to send a second Embassy to the Emperor (3), to persuade him to take Boulogne into his protection, imagining Poget had magnified the difficulties. But the Ambassadors found the Emperor very cold, and constantly alleging his alliance with France. He even told them, that so long as Religion continued in England in its present state, the English could not expect much assistance from him. This Answer determined the Council to make peace with France. We shall see presently the effects of this Resolution (4).

The Council refuses upon a Peace. The Parliament meets. Burnet.

The Parliament met the 4th of November, without the Duke of Somerſet's disgrace occasioning any change in the affairs of Religion. It was still the same Parliament the Duke of Somerſet had called, and the Council had still the same maxims with respect to the Reformation, the Earl of Warwick's Policy not suffering him to make any change. The Parliament began with a severe Act against unlawful Assemblies, in order to prevent any more Insurrections. But by another Act, the Statute against Vagrants, as too severe, and contrary to the Liberties of the Nation was repealed, and a Law made in the late Reign reviv'd.

The 2d of January 1550, a Bill of Attainder against the Duke of Somerſet, with a Confession signed by his own hand, was read in the House of Lords. But as some of the Lords suspected this Confession to be extorted, four Temporal Lords and four Bishops were sent to know the truth from his own mouth (5). Next day, they made their report, that the Duke thanked the House for their kindness, and owned he had freely subscribed the Paper, after having confessed the Contents before the King and Council. He protested however, he had no ill intention against the King or State. Whereupon, he was fined by Act of Parliament in two thousand Pounds a year of Land, with the Forfeiture to the King of all his Goods, and the loss of all his places. Many thought his Confession very strange, and much censured to abject a Proceeding. But it was doubtless because they wish'd he had taken another course, which would not have failed to prove fatal to him. It is certain, among the Articles of his Accusation, there were several which could be justified only by the intention, which would have been little serviceable to him in the House of Peers, most of whom were not inclined to favor him. For instance, to mention only the chief Article, could he deny that, contrary to the condition on which he was made Protector, he had degraded it were the other Regents, and reduced them to bare Councilors? It is true, he might have alleged the King's Patent. But it was the Patent of a minor King, not eleven years old, who, looking upon him as his Governor, acted only by his advice, as it was said in the very Patent which conferred his Authority on him. Wherefore, the Duke could never have cleared himself upon the Article, nor upon several others. Consequently his only remedy was to own himself guilty of all, and cast himself upon the King's mercy. Besides, it concerned him highly to get out of Prison on any Terms, since it was very dangerous for him to remain any longer in the hands of his Enemies. He was very successful in this course. They who wished his destruction seeing the King had been very hardly prevailed with to consent to his Trial, thought it was not yet time to push their hatred any farther, till they had ruined him in the King's Favour. He came therefore out of the Tower the 6th of February, giving of the Bond of 10000 l. for his good Behaviour, and ten days after had his pardon. Thus his Fall was not so great as Warwick's Enemies expected. He forfeited however much of the esteem he had acquired among the People, who not diving into the reasons of his Conduct, could not help thinking him guilty, since he had confessed all. But the King judged otherwise, since on the 6th of April following, he gave him a place again in his Council (6).

Mean while, the Parliament knowing, the Friends of the Romish Church drew from the Duke of Somerſet's Fall consequences which might breed ill effects, thought it proper to confound their hopes. To that end an Act of Parliament was made, confirming the New Liturgy, and ordering all Missals, Breviaries, &c. to be delivered to such as should be appointed to receive them, and all the Prayers to the Saints to be dashed out in all the Prayers set out by the late King. Moreover, those who had any Images taken out of Churches, were required to burn or delace them before the last of June (7). Then the Parliament was prorogued on the 11th of February, after granting the King a Subsidy (8), which was followed by a General Pardon, in which the Prisoners of the Tower were excepted. It was during this Session that the eldest Sons of Peers were first permitted to sit in the House of Commons (9).

After the late Revolution at Court by the Duke of Somerſet's disgrace, the Earl of Warwick had not forgot himself. On the 28th of October last, he was made Great Master of the King's Household, a new Title introduced by Henry VIII. instead of that of Steward of the Household, when he conferred this Office on the Duke of Suffolk (10). But it was not so much by his Posts that the Earl of Warwick was grown powerful and considerable, as on account of his directing the Council, who acted only by his advice. Some of the Counsellors looked upon him as their Friend, others as the head of their Party, and some were afraid of offending him. What he had lately done with regard to the Duke of Somerſet, demonstrated how dangerous it was to have him for Enemy.

Notwithstanding all his greatness, the Earl of Warwick was not a little embarrassed concerning the affair of Boulogne. He had himself most exclaim'd against the Duke of Somerſet, for proposing to resign that place, and ridiculed all his reasons, and yet for these same reasons, he resolv'd at length to do what he so much blamed in another. But not to appear inconsistent with himself, he chose to cause the restitution of Boulogne to be mov'd and resolv'd in Council, and to appear himself to be no farther concerned, than to comply with the opinion of the majority. It is not very difficult for one that directs an Assembly, to procure what resolutions he pleases without acting openly. But the difficulty consisted in the dishonour of making the first step, and the danger of shewing a desire to conclude a Peace with France. The Earl of Warwick soon found an expedient to avoid this inconvenience, by employing one Guidotti, an Italian 1550. Merchant, who lived at Southampton. This Man coming to Paris on some pretence, insinuated himself into the Constable's Family, who was the King's chief Favorite. In his Conversation with some of the Constable's Officers, he said, he verily believed the Court of England might be easily brought to restore Boulogne for a Sum of money. The Constable, to whom this was told, presently guessed the meaning. He spoke himself to Guidotti, and charged him to intimate to some one of the Council of England, that the King of France had rather end the affair of Boulogne by a treaty than by arms. Whereupon Guidotti made several journeys to London and Paris. At last he set the matter in a fair way, that the Courts, being equally desirous of ending it, agreed to send Plenipotentiaries to some place in Picard, to treat of a peace and the restitution of Boulogne (1).

Philip Henry Montieur de la Rochepot of the House of Montmorency, Admiral, afterwards Admiral, and two more, were appointed by France; and the Court of England made choice of the Lord Ruffell, Paquet now made a Baron (2), Secretary Petre, and Sir John Major. Their Instructions were a clear evidence, that the Council would have a Peace at any rate. The Substance of them was :

I. That as to the place of Congress, they were not to appear very difficult. But, if possible, they were to have it at Calais or Boulogne.

II. They might offer the restitution of Boulogne.

III. But then they were to demand that the young Queen of Scotland should be sent home, to consummate her marriage with the King of England.

IV. That the Fortifications of Blacknes and New-haven should be restored.

V. That the Pension promised by Francis I. to Henry VIII. should be continued, and all Arrears paid. But if they could not obtain the first, they were to be satisfied with the Arrears.

VI. That as for Scotland they should affirm, England could not treat without the Emperor's concurrence. But if the Emperor would agree to it, the King of England would restore all the places he held in Scotland, except Ayr and Redburgh.

VII. That if the French spoke any thing of the King's marrying Henry II.'s Daughter Elizabeth, they should answer, they had no Instructions upon that head, and should insist upon the King's being too young.

The Plenipotentiaries meeting near Boulogne (3), those of France said plainly, it was not to be expected that the King their master would send back the Queen of Scotland, since he designed her for his Son the Dauphin: That as for the [perpetual] pension, Francis I. promised it when forced by his affairs, but the King his Son never intended to be tributary to England: That however, they were ready to treat about the restitution of Boulogne for a Sum of money: That moreover, the King their master did not mean, the English should keep any one place in Scotland. This was talking impudently. But Henry II. had discovered the intentions of the Council of England, and was resolved to improve the occasion to cause to vanish the grating Claim of the Kings of England to the Crown of France, or at least to the perpetual Pension promised by Francis I. in lieu of that Claim. Some time after, the English Ambassadors received fresh Instructions, empowering them to conclude a Peace upon terms less difficult to be obtained than those first demanded. However, as the Court of England would not absolutely desist from the Pension, an expedient was found, with which that Court was satisfied, namely, all Claims of the two Kings were to remain as before, except such as should be adjusted by the Treaty, which was at length signed the 24th of March, and was in effect as follows :

I. That the City of Boulogne should be restored to France, with all the Ordnance and Ammunition found there by Henry VII., when he took the Place.

II. That in consideration of Henry's Improvements and Charges in transporting Provisions and Ammunition, the King of France should pay the King of England the Sum of four hundred thousand Crowns of Gold (4), half on the day of restitution, and half before the 15th of August.

It is to be observed upon this Article, that the King of France very carefully avoided mentioning either the Pension stipulated in the last Treaty of Peace; or even what was due to the Crown of England since the time of Charles VIII., which had been always increased afterwards by several Estates.

III. That for the security of the payment of the two hundred thousand Crowns in August, France should give six Hostages, and England the like number (5), for the security of the Restitution of Boulogne.

IV. As to Scotland, it was agreed, that the King of England should deliver to the Queen of Scotland the two Forts of Lauder and Dunglass, with all the Ordnance, except what was brought thither from Haddington.

V. That if these two Forts remained in the King of England's power, he should be obliged to demolish the Fortifications of Ayr and Redburgh, which should never be re-built by England or Scotland. But if he restored Lauder and Dunglass, he should however be obliged to raze Ayr and Redburgh, provided the Queen of Scotland demolished also Lauder and Dunglass, and that none of these four Places should be ever re-fortified.

VI. That the King of England should make no new War upon Scotland, unless he had fresh cause: That is to say, Edward relinquished his Marriage.

VII. That the King of England's demands, claims, and pretensions, as well upon France as Scotland, and all the King of France's and the Queen of Scotland's upon England, should remain as before.

Thus all the pains taken by Henry VIII. to secure a Pension, or rather a yearly Tribute in lieu of the Title he pretended to have to the Crown of France, were rendered fruitless by this Treaty, which contained, in favour of England, only an indeterminate reservation of the Claim which had occasioned the effusion of so much Blood since the Reign of Edward III. There remains to the Kings of England only the empty Title of King of France, none of Edward VI.'s Successors having ever seriously thought of prosecuting their pretended Right.

The Treaty being brought to London to be ratified, the Earl of Warwick feigned Sickness, not to be obliged to sign a Peace he had so much exclaimed against. But this was only to impose on the Publick, since he had signed all the Orders and Instructions, by virtue whereof the Ambassadors had concluded it.

The restitution of Boulogne opened the Eyes of the People, with respect to the Conduct of those at the helm. They who had now delivered up that Place for four hundred thousand Crowns, in lieu of the two millions Francis had promised to pay, were the same who some months before had reviled the Protector for only intending to restore it. The Earl of Warwick, who had the chief direction of Affairs, and whose Interest it was to procure the People's Affection, seeing them a little enraged, thought proper to divert them, by giving them some Satisfaction in other respects. To that purpose, he called to a strict account those who had managed the King's Money, or been guilty of Misdemeanors in the Exercise of their Offices. He had also in this another motive; namely, to pay the King's Debts, which were considerable. In this Inquiry, his chief Friends who had served him as Instruments to ruin the Duke of Somerfet, were least spared. The Earl of Edw. Jour. Arundel was fined in 12000*l.* payable in twelve years. Southwell was put in the Fleet, and the rest made their Compositions with the Court as well as they could. As there were few but what were guilty of some misdemeanor, this Inquiry established the Earl of Warwick, every one fearing he would find means to be revenged of those who expelled not great Submission (6).

In the course of this year there were some Changes in the Bishopricks. The See of Westminster, vacant by the resignation of Thirleby, was united to that of London, and given to Ridley Bishop of Rechester (7). Thirleby had the See of Norwich, Peinet that of Rechester (8), and on 1550. the third of July, John Hooper was made Bishop of Gloucester (1).

This year, Polydore Virgil, an Italian, who had been now forty years in England, had leave to go and spend the residue of his days in his own Country. The King permitted him to enjoy his Preferences (2), in consideration of his having employed the best part of his Life in writing the History of England (3).

Before we proceed to the next year, it will not be improper to mention what had passed in foreign Countries.

Paul III dying the 15th of November 1549, the Cardinals who entered the Conclave the 20th of the same month, agreed in few days to raise Cardinal Pole to the Papal Throne, and even came in the Night to his Chamber to adore him according to custom. But he desired them to defer the Ceremony till it was day, telling them it ought not to be a work of darkness. This scruple, unheard-of till then, seemed to me extraordinary, that some imputed it to Stupidity. Others were afraid, if Pole was Pope, he would reform the Court of Rome, and the College of Cardinals in particular. However this be, from that moment they thought of electing another Pope. After which, being divided into three Factions, they could not agree upon the Person till the February following, when they chose the Cardinal de Monte, who took the Name of Julius III (4).

In Germany, the Emperor having opened the Diet of the Empire about the end of July, would have obliged all the Protestants to submit to the determinations of the Council, now removed back to Trent. Maurice Elector of Saxony strongly opposed it, but with so much caution and regard for the Emperor, that he did not lose his Favour. On the contrary, the Emperor agreed, that the Diet should declare him General of the Army of the Empire, to end the war by the Siege of Magdeburg, the only Protestant Town which still held out. Maurice had great designs, which the Emperor knew not, till it was too late to hinder the Execution.

Scotland enjoyed a great Tranquillity after the conclusion of the Peace (5). James Hamilton Earl of Arran in Scotland, and Duke of Chateleraut in France, still governed the Kingdom as Regent. But he was himself governed by the Archbishop of St. Andrews his natural Brother, a Man of a very lewd and infamous Life. Let us return now to England, and see what passed there during the year 1551.

After the Conclusion of the Peace with France and Scotland, the principal affair in the Kingdom was that of the Reformation, which the young King wished to bring to as high a degree of Perfection as possible. He was kept in this disposition by Crammer, and the rest of the Reformers. The Earl of Warwick appeared also very forward to complete this work, because he thereby insinuated himself more into his young Master's favour. The constant maxim of the Romish Party, was to oppose with all their power any intended alterations, before they were established by Law. But they complied with them, at least outwardly, when there was no remedy, till a favorable opportunity should offer to throw off the Mask. It was not possible to be rid of these Hypocrites at once, because they gave no advantage by their outward behaviour. But they were narrowly watched, that their false steps might be improved. By this means Bonner was put out of the way last year, and by the same method Gardiner was this year deprived on the 18th of April (6).

During all the rest of the year, chosen Commissioners were preparing a Confession of Faith (7), which was the last mortal wound to be given to the old Religion. Some places of the new Liturgy were also corrected (8). But the Princess Mary refused to submit to these or the former Changes. She continued to have Mass said in her House, and thereby drew upon herself great mortifications from the Council and the King himself, who seemed resolved to force her to a compliance. She was so alarmed at it, that she formed a design to withdraw out of the Kingdom, by means of some Vessels which the Regent of the Low Countries was to send upon the Coast of England. But the design being discovered, the execution was prevented, though it should seem that Princess would have occasioned less trouble and embarrassment, had she been out of the Kingdom. In all appearance, the Project of excluding her from the Succession was not yet formed, neither was the King's death thought of near as it was.

This Princess's obduracy drew upon her the King her Brother's displeasure, who from thenceforward lost much of the Esteem and Affection he had for her. It was this, probably, that inspired the Earl of Warwick with the thoughts of excluding her from the Succession, and of forming in favour of his own Family the Project mentioned hereafter. It will be necessary however briefly to say here, that this Project was, to marry the Princess Elizabeth abroad, to cause Mary to be set aside, and to marry one of his Sons to Jane Grey, eldest Daughter of Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset, and of Frances Brandon, who was the next in the Succession, after Henry VIII's two Daughters (9).

At this time the Sweating-Sickness broke out in England with great Violence, carrying off in twenty-four hours such as were seized with it, in spite of all Remedies (10). If we may believe the Historians, this Sickness was peculiar to the English Nation. It did not seize the Foreigners who were in England, and in other Countries Englishmen only were afflicted with it. For this reason it was called the English Sweat. There is much the same thing to be observed among the Poles, who are alone subject to a Distemper they call Plica (11), unknown, as it is affirmed, in all other Countries. The Duke of Suffolk, Son of Charles Brandon by his second Wife, died of the Sweating Sickness, as did also two days after his Brother, who had succeeded him. So, the Title of Duke of Suffolk being void, the Earl of Warwick resolved to procure that Honour for the Marquis of Dorset, Father of Jane Grey, whom he designed for one of his Sons. He wanted the Concurrence of that Lord, to set the Crown on his Daughter's head, to whom the Mother was moreover to resign her Right. It is however very difficult to conceive, that the Earl of Warwick should have formed this Project so early, since Edward was in good health, in his fifteenth year only, and very likely to have a numerous Issue. The Earl of Warwick must therefore have known that the King was to die very soon. And this is what they would insinuate, who make him form his design at the time I

(1) Upon the vacancies of these, and other Sees, the best, and almost all the Manors belonging to them, were surrendered into the King's hands, and distributed among the Courtiers; and to make some sort of compensation, there were bestowed upon the same Sees, either worse Manors, or else Rectories, and impropriated Tithes. Thus on September 20, 1547, Saxton, Bishop of Lincoln, resigned to the King twenty-four Manors; so that at present the Revenues of that Bishoprick are said to consist of Impropriations: Buckton being the only Manor it has left. May 20, 1548, the Bishop of Bath and Wells made the like Relinquition or Exchange of ten Manors. And April 12, 1550, Ridley Bishop of London yielded up to the King the Manors of Stony and Mackey in Middlesex, and of Brankley and Southwiche in Essex; in the room whereof he had the Manors of Forre, Kilcotton, &c. in Essex; of Greenfield, Harwell, Droghda, and Paddington, in Middlesex; the Advowson of St. Martin's in the Fields, and others; of which the Reader may see an account in *Sirype's Rich. King Henry VIII had led the way in this general Relinquition, as it was called, of the Bishopricks, by a Statute made in the 37th of his Reign, c. 16. when no less than seventy Manors, all at the old Rents, were taken at once from the See of Tork, and annexed to the Duchy of Lancaster. He answered, As much as the Cardinals had seen in him to make him Pope. But it was commonly said, that the secret of this Promotion was an unnatural Affection to him. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 147.

According to King Edward's Journal, it was on Feb. 13—January 28, this year, a Commission was given to several Bishops, and others of the Clergy and Laity, to enquire after, repress, and extirpate the Errors of the Anabaptists, Libertines, and other Heretics. *Rymer's Fed. (7) It is not known who were the Compilers of these Articles of the Church of England, being forty two in number, nor what method was taken in preparing them. Burnet thinks they were framed by Crammer and Ridley, and that they were by them sent about to others, to correct or add to them; they saw Cause. The Reader may find them in Burnet's Collection, Num. 55. Vol. II. with the differences between these and those set out in Queen Elizabeth's time, marked in the Margin.

It raged chiefly among young Men, of a strong Constitution. Ew. Jour. p. 30.

(11) They that are troubled with it, lose the use of their Limbs, as if they had a Palsy, and feel great pains in their Nerves, which generally continue a whole year. After that they fall into a great sweat at night, and next morning their Hair is glued together, and has a nausious smell, which continues ever after. If they cut their Hair, the humour falls on their Eyes, and makes them blind. This Distemper is infectious, and communicated by Contagion. Atlas. Geg. Tom. I. p. 199.

1551. am now speaking of, and before the King was seized with his last illness, in order to represent him as the Author of his death. However this be, it is pretended, all this Lord's Proceedings, from the death of Jane Grey's two Brothers, to the end of this Reign, had relation to this Project; as, for instance, the Marriage of the Princess Elizabeth to the King of Denmark's eldest Son, which he caused to be privately treated, but without effect.

The Marriage of the King himself with a Daughter of Henry II. King of France, which was negotiated and concluded this year, seems directly contrary to the Earl of Warwick's designs, supposing they were already formed. Wherefore Dr. Burnet says by the way, that this Marriage was only to amuse the young King. Hayward, who wrote the History of Edward VI. says also, that after the Marriage was concluded, Edward thought himself in perfect safety, though indeed he was in extreme danger. But whatever the Earl of Warwick's motive might be, the Marquis of Northampton, the Bishop of Ely, and some other Ambassadors were sent with a splendid Retinue to carry the Order of the Garter to Henry II. and to propose a Marriage between his Daughter the Princess Elizabeth, and Edward. Henry being then at Chateaubriant, the English Ambassadors came to Nantes, from whence they were conducted to Court. The Marquis of Northampton, as head of the Embassy (1), presented the Collar of the Order to the King. Then the Bishop of Ely desired him to appoint Commissioners to treat with them about an affair tending to the common good of the two Kingdoms. The Commissioners being named, the Ambassadors proposed the Marriage of Edward with the Princess Elizabeth, and the Treaty was signed at Angers, the 19th of July.

The Princess's Portion was to be two hundred thousand Crowns, and her Dowry as great as any Queen of England had ever enjoyed. But the Marriage was not to be contracted by words of the present Tenor, till a month after the Princess was twelve years of age. This hindered it from being consummated, because Edward died before that time. Shortly after, Henry II. sent a noble Embassy into England, of which the Marquis de Montmorency was head, with the Order of St. Michael to the King.

Foreign Affairs being finished, the Earl of Warwick applied himself to Domestic, or rather to his own. He caused Henry Grey Marquis of Northampton, to be created Duke of Suffolk, and himself Duke of Northumberland (2). William Paulet Earl of Wiltshire and Lord-Treasurer, was made Marquis of Winchester (3), and Sir William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke (4). They who were on this occasion dignified with new Honours, were the intimate Friends of the Earl of Warwick, now Duke of Northumberland, who sought to establish himself in the Post he possessed of chief Manager of the public Affairs, though without any Patent to give him that Authority.

This Lord could not however enjoy a perfect Tranquillity, so long as he still saw such a Rival as the Duke of Somerfet, who might one day be restored to favour, and who was really endeavouring to regain the Post he had formerly possessed. Edward was near the time of his majority, and daily increased in the knowledge of Affairs. The Duke of Northumberland had therefore to fear, that when the King should compare his Administration with the Duke of Somerfet's, he would perceive, the last had been wrongfully deprived of his Dignity. Besides, Edward still expressed great esteem for his Uncle, and gave him frequent and public Marks of it. All this made the Duke of Northumberland very uneasy, who plainly saw, it would be almost impossible to execute his Projects whilst he had such an Inspector as the Duke of Somerfet. He determined therefore to be rid of this troublesome Rival at any rate, and to that end made use of two ways. The first was to ruin him in the King's Favour, by means of certain Emiffaries, who beset him continually (5). The second was, to cause his Enemy such mortifications as should throw him upon actions that would give an advantage against him. These two ways succeeded to his wish. The King by degrees took a disgust at his Uncle, and was thereby disposed to receive any ill Impressions against him.

On the other hand, the Duke of Somerfet could not, without extreme impatience, see himself daily exposed to affronts, the more provoking, as they were done with design to incense him. Few have the Prudence or Moderation to avoid falling into such Snarcs. He pretended, that feeling himself thus pushed, he resolved to kill the Duke of Northumberland at a visit he was to make him. Others say, he intended to have invited him to dinner at the Lord Paget's, and there he was either to kill or poison him. At least the Historians thus speak of it, because the report was spread both before and after his disgrace, and even imbibed by the King. And yet, his Impeachment had no such thing in it, but ran only, that he intended to secure the Duke of Northumberland's Person. However this be, it cannot be denied, he had contrived some Plot to be resorted to his Post, and devised, and perhaps imparted to his Confidants, several expedients which were imputed to him afterwards as so many Crimes, though he had executed none. One of these Confidants was the Person that ruined him, being, in all appearance, bribed by his Enemy. This Man, Sir Thomas Palmer by name, having been secretly brought to the King, told him all he knew, and probably, so turned his discourse, as to make the King believe that bare Projects or Thoughts were fixed and settled designs (6). However, the King being persuaded, his Uncle would have assassinated the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, consented that he should be brought to his Trial. So on the 17th of October the Duke was apprehended and sent to the Tower, with many others accused of being his Accomplices. Next day, the Dukes of Somerfet, with two of her Women were also arrested, and after that, the Earl of Arundel and the Lord Paget underwent the same fate.

As soon as the Duke of Somerfet was in the Tower, he pretended Crimes were every where published with Circumstances proper to impose on the People. Upon these extravagant Accusations it is that the Historians, Doctor Burnet excepted, have built their accounts of this Event. What is most probable, is, that the Duke had projected to get himself declared Protector in the next Parliament, since the Earl of Rutland affirmed it upon Oath. As to the means he intended to use for that end, very likely he had devised several, but not yet fixed upon any, except that perhaps of securing the Duke of Northumberland's Person. As the Custom of bringing the Witnesses face to face had been some time since laid aside, we must be contented with knowing what the Witnesses deposed against him, without any possibility however of receiving from thence an unquestionable Proof of the truth of the Facts. Every one is sensible, what great alterations the confronting of Witnesses is capable of producing in seemingly the most positive Depositions.

Palmer deposed, that Sir Ralph Vane was to have headed two thousand Men to support the Duke of Somerfet's designs, who with a hundred Horse (7), was to have fallen upon the Guard, that being done, the Duke intended to have gone through the City proclaiming, Liberty, Liberty, and in case he failed to raise the People, to have fled to the Isle of Wight. One Crane affirmed the same thing, and added, that the Earl of Arundel and the Lord Paget were privy to the Conspiracy.

Upon these Depositions, the Duke was brought to his Trial before the Peers on the first of December, the Crimes laid against him being cast into three Articles:

1. That he had designed to seize on the King's Person, and the Administration of the public Affairs.
2. That he with one hundred others intended to imprison the Duke of Northumberland.
3. And that he had designed to raise an Insurrection in the City of London.

These three Articles, to which the Duke of Somerfet's Crimes were reduced, plainly shew, there was no proof of his having intended to kill or poison the three Lords above-mentioned, though the King had been made to believe it, and the People told the same. Of these three Articles the first and third were High-Treason, and the second, concerning the Duke of Northumberland, was only Felony. He positively denied the treasonable Articles, and for the other, which was placed the second in the Impeachment, he protested, he had never determined to have killed the 1551. Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, but had only talked of it without any intention to do it.

It must be confessed, here is a difficulty which is not easy to be resolved. The Duke of Somerset is not accused of intending to kill these Lords, and yet he justifies himself on that head. This seems to intimate, there were some such Article in the Indictment. And yet, Doctor Burnet, an exact Historian if ever there was any, and who affirms, he took the Accusation out of the Records of the Council, sets down but three Articles, where there is no mention of these Lords, who even sat among the Peers his Judges. On the other hand, it will appear presently, that the Duke was condemned for Felony, which was fetching the rigour of the Law as far as it could go, if he was guilty only of an Intention to seize the Duke of Northumberland; whereas if he had really intended to kill these three Lords, there was nothing in his Sentence but what was agreeable to an Act of Parliament. It must therefore be said, either the famous Historian above mentioned, has not exactly related the Articles of Accusation, or the Peers condemned the unfortunate Duke for a Crime he was not legally charged with. The faithfulness and exactness Doctor Burnet has professed, will not allow him to be accused of such a Fraud. But the Character of the Duke of Northumberland, and of most of the Duke of Somerset's Judges, who for the most part were his professed Enemies, give but too much occasion to suspect, that the fear of offending the Duke of Northumberland, or some other Motives, prevailed over Justice (1).

After the Peers had heard the depositions against the Duke, and his defences, they unanimously acquitted him of Treason; but found him guilty of Felony. They proceeded, in appearance, upon a Statute made in the time of Henry VII (2), which declared it Felony to intend to take away the Life of a Privy-Counsellor. This was stretching very far that severe Law, which perhaps was never executed before, especially upon a Duke, Peer of the Realm, and Uncle to the King. Besides his charge did not run that he had intended to kill these three Counsellors, but only had designed to secure the Duke of Northumberland's Person. But what is most strange in this Trial, is, that these three Lords sat as Judges. Sentence being given, he asked Pardon of the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, for his ill intentions against them. This asking pardon has made several believe him guilty. But it is a question, whether by these ill Intentions we are necessarily to understand a design to assassinate them. When the People who were present at his Trial, saw he was returned not guilty of Treason, they shouted for Joy so loud, that they were heard at Charing-Cross. But their Joy was turned into Sorrow when they heard he was condemned of Felony.

Every one believed the Duke would be pardoned, because his execution was deferred almost two months. But so great care had been taken to prepossess the King against him, that young Edward, who absorbed the Crimes he believed him guilty of, was very far from any thoughts of granting him a pardon. It appears in his Journal, that one Barthelemy had affirmed upon Oath, that the Duke of Somerset had hired him to kill the Duke of Northumberland. That the Duke himself had owned it at his coming to the Tower, though he had denied it at first. But it is very strange, this Evidence was not produced at his Trial. Nothing argues his innocence in this respect so much as the Indictment itself, which ran, not that he had intended to assassinate the Duke of Northumberland, but only had designed to seize and imprison him. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the King believed him guilty of the first of these Crimes, since we see in his Letter to Barnaby Fitz-Patrick his Favorite, then in France, that the Duke had confessed it after Sentence, though he had before sworn the contrary (3). But the King's Belief does by no means prove the Fact. It serves also equally to prove that the young King was abused, who even shewed afterwards an extreme sorrow for having consented to his Uncle's death. The Duke of Somerset was in hopes however of undeceiving the King. He had now engaged the Lord Chancellor Rich to be his Friend, who through a mistake in the Superfcription of a Note he sent to the Duke, discovered his design to use his endeavours for him. This occasioned the Great Seal's being taken from him, and given to the Bishop of Ely (4).

As soon as the Duke had received his Sentence, great care was taken to divert and entertain the King with pleasing fights, that he might not reflect upon this strange condemnation. At the same time, all his Uncle's Friends were carefully hindered from coming near him. At last, on the 22d of January he signed an Order for his Execution. The Duke appeared calm and undisturbed on the Scaffold, and made a Speech to the People. He affirmed "he had never offended the King by word or deed. He gave God Thanks for making him his Instrument to promote the Reformation, and exhorted the People to persevere therein." When he had gone so far, he was forced to stop, by reason of an extraordinary noise among the People, which lasted some time. Sir Anthony Brevin riding towards the Scaffold, and crying to the People to give way, made many believe he was bringing a Pardon. On the other side, a Company of Soldiers who had been ordered to attend at the execution, coming too late, caused others to imagine they were come to massacre them. This bred a terrible disorder, and fatal to some of the Spectators who were smothered to death. When the noise was over, he calmly went on with his Speech, and said, "he had always been most diligent about his Majesty, in his affairs both at Home and Abroad; and no less diligent in seeking the Common Good of the whole Realm." Here again he was interrupted by the People crying out, It was most true. Then "he prayed for the King, asked Forgiveness of all whom at any time he had offended, forgave all his Enemies without exception, and desired the People to bear him Witness that he died in the Faith of Jesus Christ." When he had ended his Speech he turned to his private Devotions; after which he laid his Head on the Block to receive the fatal blow.

Thus fell the Duke of Somerset, concerning whom opinions have been very much divided. Some have represented him as a very wicked Man, capable of committing the most heinous crimes, and others, as a very good Christian. It is easy to see that Religion was the sole cause of this diversity. Had it not been for the prejudice, Religion betrays in most Men, his faults would not have been so much aggravated, which after all, were some of the least Men are guilty of. On the other hand, without this same prejudice, there would not have been so much pains taken to colour his Ambition, which doubtless was a little too great. They who have made it their business to vindicate all his actions, have also very lightly touched upon the vast riches amassed by him during his Administration. Of this Somerset-House now standing in London, is an authentic Proof. But then, his Enemies have made bare accusations artfully spread among the People, and infilled into the King, to pass for evidenced Crimes, though it manifestly appears, by the very Articles of his Indictment, that he was condemned only for an intention to commit an offence, not against the King or State, but against some private Persons. It may therefore be affirmed, that the Faults for which he was pardoned after his first Condemnation, were much greater than that for which he suffered death. The People, who are seldom mistaken in their Judgment of Great Men, were so generally persuaded of his Innocence, that many dipped their Handkerchiefs in his Blood, considering him as a sort of Martyr. Nay, it happened in the beginning of Queen Mary's reign, that a Woman seeing the Duke of Northumberland leading to the Tower, took one of these bloody Handkerchiefs at him, saying, Behold, the Blood which thou didst cause to be unjustly shed, does now apparently begin to revenge itself on thee.

About a month after this execution, Sir Ralph Vane, Execution of Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Michael Stanhope, and Sir Thomas Arundel (5), who were said to be the Duke of Somerset's chief Complices, were also put to death. But they all protested they had never intended to form any Plot, either against the King or any Privy-Counsellor. Vane added, he did not doubt his blood would make the Duke of Nor-

The Lord Chancellor was left out of the number, being suspected of favouring the Duke of Somerset. Educ. Journ. p. 41. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 179.

(3) The King's words, as in Burnet, are: "The Duke seemed to have acknowledged the Felony, and after Sentence he had confessed it, though he had formerly vehemently sworn the contrary." So it was not the design of killing, (as Rapin says by mistake) but the Felony that the King said, he confessed. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 181.

(4) The Lord Chancellor intending to send the Duke of Somerset an Advertisement of somewhat designed against him by the Council, and being in haste, wrote only on the back of the Letter, To the Duke, and hid one of his Servants carry it to the Tower, without giving him particular directions to the Duke or his Secretary. His Servant fancying it was to the Duke of Norfolk, carried it to him. He, to make Northumberland his Friend, sent the Letter to him. Rush understanding the mistake, prevented the delivery, and went immediately to the King, and pretending some indisposition, desired to be discharged; and upon that took to his Bed. So it seemed too barbarous to do any thing further against him. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 182.

During the year 1551, the ſtate of the Emperor's Affairs was changed in Germany, when he leaſt ſuſpected it. Maurice Elector of Saxony, having formed the deſign of reſtoring his Country to liberty, had ſecretly negotiated a League with France and the Proteſtant Princes of Germany. But before he declared himſelf openly, he had a mind to know what might be expected from England. To that purpoſe, he ſent Ambaſſadors to Edward, to gain him to his Inter'eſt, and procure a Sum of four hundred thouſand Crowns, by telling him it was for the preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion. The Ambaſſadors were told, the King would moſt willingly enter into a religious League; but did not mean to be engaged, under that pretence, in a War for other Quarrels. That if the Elector of Saxony would confer more particularly with the Proteſtant Princes, and then ſend the King Ambaſſadors with fuller inſtructions and ſufficient powers, he ſhould have a more poſitive Anſwer. Hitherto Maurice had but coldly followed the Siege of Magdeburg. But when his private Affairs were ſettled, he ſo ordered it, by the help of ſome Friends in the Town, that the Inhabitants ſurrendered by capitulation. Then he broke up his Army, who parting into ſeveral Bodies, quartered in the Territories of ſome Popiſh Princes, putting them under heavy contributions. The Catholics complained very much of their being expoſed to theſe oppreſſions. The Emperor alone remained in an entire Security, without having the leaſt ſuſpicion of the Elector.

of the Council of Trent.

The Council being removed back to Trent, was opened again in May 1551. But a quarrel between the Pope and the King of France interrupting the ſeſſions, they were renewed in September; and tho' Henry II. proteſted againſt the Council, the Legates continued it, and cauſed ſeveral points to be decided which are foreign to our purpoſe (1).

1552. Parliament. An Act enjoining the conſtituting of the Writings.

The Parliament met the 23d of January 1552. The Commons ſeeing the great abuſe of the pernicious cuſtom of condemning People without confronting the Witneſſes, had a mind to put a ſtop to it. To that end, a Bill was prepared, condemning under divers Penalties, thoſe who ſhould write or ſpeak againſt the King, with a Proviso, that none ſhould be attainted of Treason on this Act, unleſs two Witneſſes ſhould come, and to their face aver the Faſt for which they were to be tried, except ſuch as ſhould confeſs it. The Lords were very unwilling to agree to this Proviso (2), as if it concerned them leſs than the Commons, to be freed from oppreſſion. But at length the Act paſſed as drawn by the Commons.

The Marriage of the Duke of Somerset.

In this ſeſſion alſo ſome progreſs was made in the Reformation (3). Among other things, the Marriage of the Clergy was declared good and valid, which had been for ſome time conſidered by the People as only tolerated.

Attempts to ſubvert the Duke of Somerset's Ministry.

The ſeſſion of Parliament being about to end, and not above a hundred and thirty ſeven Members remaining in the Lower Houſe, a Bill was brought into the Houſe of Lords, to repeal the Settlement of the Duke of Somerſet's Eſtate, made in favour of his Children by his ſecond Wife. In this Bill was inſerted a Clause, as the foundation of it, that the Duke of Somerſet and his Complices were juſtly attainted (4). But the Commons agreeing to the Repeal, rejected the Clause. This ſhews their opinion of the Duke's Innocence.

In this ſame ſeſſion, the Duke of Northumberland attempted to get Tonſtal Biſhop of Durham condemned; who had been accuſed of Miſprifion of Treason (5). The Lords readily paſſed the Bill for attainting him, but the Commons would not proceed upon it, becauſe it was intended to condemn the Biſhop without confronting the Witneſſes. The Duke of Northumberland's Aim was to have had the Dignity of Palatine of Durham, annexed to that See, conferred on himſelf. We ſhall ſee hereafter, his Project ſucceeded better another time. Mean while, finding the Commons had not much condeſcenſion for him, becauſe the Parliament had been called during the Duke of Somerſet's Adminiſtration, he reſolved to have another which ſhould be more at his devotion. Accordingly this which had now ſix Years, was diſſolved at the end of the ſeſſion (6). Then the Council came to a reſolution to call a new Parliament for the next year only, in order to have time to take the neceſſary meaſures to cauſe Reſepreſentatives to be choſen, who ſhould be more favorable to the Court.

There were this year two conſiderable changes with reſpect to the Biſhops. Firſt Heath and Day Biſhops of Worceſter and Chicheſter were deprived, for too openly oppoſing the Reformation. The ſecond Change was more conſiderable. After the Parliament had given the King Power of nominating to the vacant Sees, his Patents ran, that he appointed ſuch a one, Biſhop of ſuch a See, during his natural Life. But at the time I am ſpeaking of, it was thought proper to change the Words into, ſo long as he ſhall behave himſelf well (7). So the Biſhops made by theſe Patents might be deprived of their Sees by a bare Act of the King's Will, without being forced to obſerve the uſual Formalities in ſuch Caſes.

The Duke of Northumberland ſtill directed the Affairs of the Government, though he had no Commiſſion to diſtinguiſh him from the other Privy-Counſellors. His Proceedings againſt the Duke of Somerſet, putting every one in fear of being expoſed to his vengeance, not a man dared openly to oppoſe him. We have ſeen, that in the late Parliament he attempted to render the Duke of Somerſet's memory odious, by cauſing his ſentence to be approved by the two Houſes. That Project not ſucceeding, he took another method. He ordered a ſtrict Enquiry to be made of all who had been enriched by the Chantry-Lands, given to the King during the Duke of Somerſet's Adminiſtration. Great Numbers were found, ſome of whom were condemned in heavy Fines, and others found means to purchaſe the Duke of Northumberland's favour. But it was not poſſible for the Lord Paget to divert the Storm which fell upon him, the Duke of Northumberland mortally hating him for having been entirely devoted to the Duke of Somerſet (8). He was not only fined in ſix thouſand Pounds, but alſo, on pretence that he was no Gentleman (9), was degraded from the Order of the Garter, which he had received from Henry VIII. as if that Prince, when he gave it him, knew not his Pedigree. Beſides the Motive of hatred and revenge by which the Duke of Northumberland was twayed, he had alſo another, which was to make way for his eldeſt Son (10) the Earl of Warwick, for whom he eaſily procured the vacant Garter (11).

About this time the Corporation of German Merchants, who lived in the Still-yard, was diſſolved, becauſe it was become detrimental to England, by engroſſing the whole Woolen Trade (12). It was proved, that the Still-yard 1555. Men in the year 1551, shipped forty four thousand Cloths, and all the English Merchants together did not export above eleven hundred. The Regent of Flanders and the City of Hamburg earnestly solicited to have the Company reformed, but it was to no purpose. The Court also set on foot a Project for the advantage of the Trade of England, namely, to open two free Mart-Towns in England, Hull and Southampton. But it was not executed for want of time.

Cardan in England. Burnet. This year Cardan the famous Italian Philosopher passed through England in his return from Scotland, where he had been to cure the Archbishop of St. Andrews of a Dropsy. His endeavours were crowned with success, but he foretold the Archbishop he was to be hanged. As he passed through England he waited on young King Edward, and was so charmed with him, that he every where spoke of him as of a Miracle. It is said, he cast his Nativity, and foretold to him a long and prosperous Life. But for once the Rules of his Art were not just (1).

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Burnet. The affairs of Scotland underwent this year some alteration. The Queen Dowager had been in France on pretence of seeing her Daughter, and had obtained of that Court the Regency of Scotland, in the room of the Earl of Arran. In November 1551, she returned to Scotland through England, where she was magnificently treated by the King, and her Charges born to the Frontiers of the two Kingdoms. At her arrival in Scotland, she persuaded the Earl of Arran to resign the Regency to her, according to the desire of Henry II. and his Ministers, the Earl perceiving he could not keep it against their will. The Archbishop of St. Andrews did not like his Brother's resigning his Dignity. He caballed against the Queen-Regent, who had the address to support herself by the assistance of the Reformed, promising them the free exercise of their Religion in their own Houses. By this means, he established herself in the Government, in spite of the Archbishop's attempts.

Rev. Letters from Scotland. Buchanan. Burnet. The revolution this year in the affairs of Germany was much more considerable. The Elector of Saxony at length discovered his Project, but not till after the King of France had proclaimed war against the Emperor, and the Constable de Montmercy taken Metz by surprize. Then Maurice assembling his Forces, marched directly to Inspruck, where Charles V. was, and had like to have taken him Prisoner. Maurice's Declaration obliged the Emperor at last to give the Protestants some satisfaction, by granting them the famous Edict of Passau, [whereby the several Princes and Towns were secured in the free exercise of their Religion.] That Monarch soon met with another great mortification. He invested Metz; but by the brave resistance of the Duke of Guise, who defended the Place, he was forced to raise the Siege. Let us return now to the affairs of England (2).

1553. Favourable to the Duke of Northumberland. Strype. T. II. p. 391. Somers's Memory is blackened. The new Parliament meeting the 1st of March 1553, the House of Commons consisted of Representatives, who, for the most part, were disposed to follow the directions of the Court. They gave the King a very considerable Subsidy, grounded upon the great waiting of his Treasure during the Duke of Somerset's Administration. This showed what Power the Duke of Northumberland had in the House (3). That Lord procured likewise an Act for suppressing the Bishoprick of Durham, having first caused Tonstal to be deprived (4). This Bishoprick being suppressed, the King founded two others, one at Durham [with 2000 Marks Revenue,] and another at Newcastle [with 1000.] But the Temporality of the Bishoprick being turned into a County Palatine, was given to the Duke of Northumberland. Probably, Tonstal was deprived, and his See suppressed for that purpose.

The Parliament sat but one month. It was dissolved the 31st of March, after the Duke of Northumberland had procured a Subsidy for the King, and a Strain for the Memory of the late Duke of Somerset (5). The Court had no farther need of a Parliament, and the Duke of Northumberland's Interest required there should be none, when he was preparing to execute his designs.

The young King had been seized ever since January with a Distemper which at length brought him to his Grave (6). This did not hinder his being made to sign an Order for visiting the Churches, and taking thence all the superfluous Plate and Ornaments. The Visitors were likewise to examine very strictly, what Embezzlements had been made in that respect. All this was done under colour of selling the Superfluities, and giving the Money to the Poor, who had however the least share (7).

The progress of the French in Germany beginning to make England uneasy, the Council resolved to take some measures to stop their Career. Nay, they seemed at first to have intended to join in a League with the Emperor against France. But all this ended at last in the offer of the King's mediation, which produced no effect.

Mean while, Edward was still troubled with a defluxion upon his Lungs, which wasted him by degrees, and daily grew more dangerous. Some plainly affirm, a slow Poison was given him, and throw the Suspicion upon the Duke of Northumberland. Others only insinuate such a thing, without saying it positively. But after all, both speak only by conjecture, without giving any proof. The young King saw death approaching without any fears as to himself, but could not reflect, without an extreme concern, on the future State of Religion, under his Sister Mary, who was to succeed him. Very probably, the Duke of Northumberland, who constantly attended him in his Illness, took care to increase his fears, on purpose to lead him more easily to the point he desired. All hopes however of the King's recovery were not given over till the middle of May, when 'tis likely, the Physicians told the Duke of Northumberland, his case was desperate. Then it was that he married the Lord Guilford Dudley, his fourth Son, the only one unmarried, to Jane Grey, eldest Daughter of the new Duke of Suffolk, by Francis Brandon, who was in Henry VIII's Will the next in the Succession, after the Princess Elizabeth. At the same time, Jane's two Sisters were also married, the second, the Lady Catherine, to the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son, the Lord Herbert; the third, the Lady Mary, [who was crooked] to [the King's Groom-Porter] Martin Key. These Marriages were solemnized about the end of

They traded in a body, and so ruined others by under-selling them. Trade was now risen much; Courts began to be more magnificent, so there was a greater consumption of Cloth than formerly. Antwerp and Hamburg had then the chief Trade in these parts of the World, and their Factors in the Still-yard (Oreilles from the Street imported by them) had all the Markets of England in their hands, and let such Prices both on what they imported or exported as they pleased, and broke all other Merchants. Whereupon the Merchant Adventurers complained of them, and after some Hearings, it was adjudged that they had forfeited their Charter, and that their Company was dissolved. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 207. Strype, Tom. II. p. 235.

(1) After the King's death, when nothing was to be got by flattery, he wrote the following Character of him: "All the Graces were in him: 'Tis not my Tongue when he was yet but a Child: Together with the English, his natural Tongue, he had both Latin and French, nor was he ignorant, as I was, of the Greek, Italian, and Spanish, and perhaps some more: But for the English, French and Latin, he was perfect in them, and 'Tis to learn every thing: Nor was he ignorant of Logic, of the Principles of Natural Philosophy, nor of Music. The sweetness of his Temper as much as became a Mortal; and his gravity becoming the Majesty of a King, and his disposition was suitable to his high Degree. In short, that Child was so bred, had such parts; and was with such expectation, that he looked like a Miracle of a Man." Afterwards he adds, "He was a marvelous Boy; when I was with him he was in the fifteenth year of his age, in which he spoke Latin as politely and readily as I did. He began to love the liberal Arts before he knew them, and to know them before he could use them: And in him there was such an attempt of Nature, that not only England, but the World had reason to lament his being so early snatched away. When the Gravity of a King was needed, he carried himself like an old Man; and yet he was always affable and gentle as became his Age. He played on the Lute; he meddled in affairs of State; and for bounty, he did it that emulated his Father; though his Father, even when he endeavoured to be good, might appear to have been bad. But there was no ground of suspecting any such thing in the Son, whose Mind was cultivated by the Study of Philosophy." See the Original in Burnet's Hist. Ref. Tom. II. Collet.

(2) This year the King's debts amounted to two hundred and thirty thousand, or, according to Strype, two hundred and forty one thousand, one hundred and seventy nine Pounds, and a Commission was granted to certain Persons, to sell part of the Chantry Lands, for the payment of them. Edw. Journ. p. 51. Strype, Tom. II. p. 312.

(3) They gave the King two Tenth and two Fifteenth and a Subsidy, to be paid in two years. At the passing the Bill, there was a great debate about it in the House of Commons, which seems to have been about the Preamble, containing a long Acculation of the Duke of Somerset, for involving the King in Wars, wakening his Treasures, engaging him in much debt, embosoming the Coin, and having given occasion to a most terrible Rebellion. This was intended by the Duke of Northumberland, to let the King see how acceptable he and his Party were, and how hateful the Duke of Somerset had been. The Clergy did also give the King six Shillings in the Pound of their Benefices. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 215.

(4) He was deprived, August 14. 1552. Strype, Tom. II. p. 367. The Bill for dissolving his Bishoprick was first read, on the 21st of March, and for the second and third times, on the 22d and 29th. Journ. Ref.

(5) But an Act was made, for the reforming in blood Sir Edward Seymour, Kt. who was eldest Son of the Duke by his second Wife. There was also a remarkable Act made, for avoiding excess of Wines. It imported, That no Person whatever should keep in his House above ten Gallons of French Wine, for spending, upon pain of forfeiting 10*l.* Sterling. Unless he could spend a hundred Marks yearly in Lands, Tenements, or other profits certain; or was worth a thousand Marks of his own: Or else was the Son of a Duke, Marquis, Earl, Viscount, or Baron. When it was read in the House of Lords, the Duke of Suffolk, the Earls of Arundel, Oxford, Westmoreland, Rutland, the Bishop of St. David's, and the Lord Darcy of Chichester differed from it. Journ. Ref.

(6) April 2. 1552, he fell sick of the Small-Pox and Measles, which probably might turn to a Consumption. Edw. Journ. p. 49.

(7) Visitors were appointed to examine what Church-Plate, Jewels, and other Furniture was in all Churches, and to compare their account with the Inventories made in former Visitations, and to see what was embezzled, and how. They were to leave in every Church one or two Chalice of Silver, with Linen for the Communion-Table, and for surplices; and to bring in all other things of value to the Treasurer of the King's Household, and to sell the rest of the matters of the Church, and give the Money to the Poor. Heylin, and some others urge from hence, that the King was ill-pleased with the superfluous Plate that lay in Churches, more for pomp than use. And that perhaps being sick, he did not much mind what Papers the Council brought him to sign. Tom. II. p. 217.

May (1), when there was no hope of the King's recovery. At last, one day, as the young King was expressing his great concern at the thoughts, that his Sister, the Princess Mary would do her utmost to destroy the Reformation, the Duke of Northumberland broke the Ice. He represented to the King, that there was but one way to prevent the misfortunes England was threatened with, in case the Princess Mary ascended the Throne after him; and that was, to settle the Crown on the Lady Jane Grey his Daughter-in-law. Indeed, it was natural, in excluding Mary, to transfer the Crown to his Sister Elizabeth, whom the King tenderly loved, and who was a hearty Friend to the Reformation. But probably, the Duke told the King, as he could exclude Mary but on the specious Pretence of her being illegitimate, the same reason subverted with regard to Elizabeth, since the Marriages of their Mothers were equally annulled. That therefore, either the Succession was to be left as settled by the late King, or the Princesses were to be both excluded together. Very likely, the young King, who found himself dying, and only thought of saving the Reformation from the impending destruction, was prevailed with by this Argument, to sacrifice the Princess Elizabeth. Besides, he had a great Esteem and Affection for Jane Grey, who was an accomplished Lady both in Body and Mind.

However this be, the King having taken the resolution suggested to him by the Duke of Northumberland, three Judges of the Realm (2) were sent for, and required to draw an Assignment of the Crown to Jane Grey. The Judges desired a little time to consider of it. At last, they answered, they could not presume to do any such thing, without being guilty of High-Treason. Adding, that all the Privy-Councillors who consented to the Assignment, would unavoidably be liable to the pains expressed in the Act of Succession. Upon which the Duke of Northumberland was in such a fury, that he had like to have beaten the Judges; but they stood to what they had said. On the 15th of June they were sent for again, and at length by Threats and the Expedient of a Pardon under the Great Seal, were wrought upon to draw the Settlement of the Crown, which was signed by all the rest of the Judges, except Hales, who could never be prevailed with. All the Privy-Councillors felt their hands to it likewise on the 21st of the same month. Cranmer was absent that day on purpose to avoid signing; but the King importuned him so much, that he set his hand at last as a Witness, as it is pretended, and not as a Privy-Counsellor (3).

Mean while, the King's Distemper increasing, without the possibility of finding any remedy, the Council thought fit to dismiss the Physicians, and put him into the hands of a certain Woman, who undertook his cure. It was said, this was done by the Duke of Northumberland's advice, and that the Woman shortened the King's days. But he was now so ill, that it was entirely needless to hasten his death. It is true, the Woman instead of curing him, only put him to more pain, by the Medicines she gave him; and this was sufficient to inspire the People with violent Suspicions of the Duke of Northumberland, who was not beloved, and was thought capable of any thing. At last the Physicians were sent for again. But it was not in their power to stop the violence of his Distemper, which carried him out of the world on the 6th of July, after his giving sensible proofs of a true Piety. Some days before his death, the Duke of Northumberland got the Council to write to the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth, desiring them to come and keep him Company in his Sickness. His aim was to have them in his power, that they might not obstruct the Promotion of his Daughter-in-law Jane Grey. The two Princesses not imagining the King so near death, were upon the road, but hearing he was expiring, turned back, and the Duke was disappointed of his expectation (4).

(1) Hollinghead says, it was about the beginning of the Month, p. 1081.

(2) They were Montagu, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Baker and Bromley; and were sent for on June 11. Gisford came with them on the 15th. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 223.

(3) Burnet says, he does not know whether the Archbishop used this distinction, though it seems probable that he did so, seeing that Liberty was allowed to Cecil, who, in a relation which he made one write of this Transaction, for clearing himself afterwards, says, when he heard Hales declare how much it was against Law, he refused to set his hand to it as a Counsellor, and that he only signed it as a Witness to the King's Subscription, p. 223.

(4) His Body was buried on the 8th of August, in the Chapel of St. Peter's Church in Westminster, and laid near the body of Henry VII. his Grandfather. The charge of his Funeral amounting but to 475 l. 2 s. 4 d. Strype, p. 432. He died in Sir Henry Sidney's Arms, Son-in-law to the Duke of Northumberland. It is said, King Edward was in Body beautiful, of a sweet Aspect, and especially in his Eyes, which seemed to have a fiery liveliness and lustre in them. He kept a Book, in which he wrote the Characters of all the chief Men of the Nation, all the Judges, Lord-Lieutenants, and Justices of the Peace over England, marking down their way of living, and their zeal for Religion. He had studied the business of the Mint, with the exchange and value of Money. He also understood Fortification, and designed well. He knew all the Harbours and Ports in his Dominions, as also in Scotland and France, with the depth of Water, and way of coming into them. He had acquired so great knowledge in foreign Affairs, that the Ambassadors who were sent into England published very extraordinary things of him, in all the Courts of Europe. He took Notes of almost every thing he heard, which he writ first in Greek Characters, that those about him might not understand them, and afterwards copied out fair in the Journal or Diary that he kept. This Journal, written with his own hand, is still preserved in Sir John Cotton's famous Library; from whence the learned Bishop Burnet transcribed and published it, in his 2d Vol. of the History of the Reformation. In it the most considerable Transactions in this Reign are perhaps as well related (says Bishop Nicolson) by the young King himself, as by any other Historian. June 26, a few days before his death, the King endowed Christ's, St. Thomas's, and Bridewell Hospitals, in London, with the Revenues belonging to the Savoy in the same City, which amounted then to 600 l. a year; and gave licence for the purchasing of Lands, to the use of the same Hospitals, as far as the yearly sum of 4000 Marks. Hollingb. p. 1082. He also founded Gresham's Hospital in Abington, Heylin, p. 121. The Expenses of his Household yearly, during his Reign, were as follows. The first year, 49,487 l. 18 s. The second, 46,902 l. 7 s. The third, 48,100 l. 3 s. The fourth, 100,578 l. 15 s. The fifth, 68,861 l. 9 s. The sixth, 65,923 l. 10 s. Strype, Tom. II. p. 434, 435. As for the Prices of meat, and other Provisions during this Reign, see Ibid. p. 131, 223. Repetit. p. 143.

By indentures of the 11th and 2d of Edward VI, a Pound Weight of Gold, of twenty Carats fine, and two Carats alloy, was coined into thirty Pounds by Tale; out of which the King had a great Profit; and a Pound of Silver of four Ounces fine, and eight Ounces alloy, was coined into forty eight Shillings; after which rate, every Pound of fine Silver made in current Money seven Pounds four Shillings; and the King's Profit on every Pound Weight was four Pounds four Shillings. In the 3d year of this King, a Pound Weight of Gold of twenty two Carats fine, and two Carats alloy, was to be coined into thirty four Pounds by Tale; into Sovereigns at 20 s. a-piece, Half Sovereigns at 10 s. a-piece, Crowns at 5 s. and Half-Crowns at 2 s. 6 d. a-piece; And a Pound Weight of Silver of six Ounces fine, and six Ounces alloy, was to be coined into seventy two Shillings; which went to go for 12 d. a-piece by Tale; of which the Merchant, for every Pound Weight of fine Silver, received three Pounds four Shillings, and the King above four Pounds gain. In the 4th year of this Reign, a Pound Weight of Gold of the old Standard, of twenty three Carats, and three Grains and a half fine, was coined into twenty eight Pounds sixteen Shillings by Tale; namely, into Sovereigns at 24 s. a-piece, Half-Sovereigns at 12 s. Angels at 8 s. and Half-Angels at 4 s. a-piece. In the 5th of this Reign, a Pound Weight of Silver of three Ounces fine, and nine Ounces alloy, was coined into seventy two Shillings at 12 d. a-piece; and the Merchant received for every Ounce of fine Silver, which he should bring to the Mint, ten Shillings of such Money; by which means twelve Ounces of fine Silver was constantly raised to fourteen Pounds sixteen Shillings. In the 6th of this Reign, a Pound Weight of Gold, of the old Standard aforesaid, was coined into thirty six Pounds by Tale; namely, twenty four Sovereigns at 30 s. a-piece, twenty two Angels at 10 s. a-piece, one hundred and forty four Half-Angels: And a Pound Weight of Crown Gold of twenty two Carats fine, and two Carats alloy, was coined into thirty three Pounds by Tale; namely, thirty three Sovereigns at 20 s. a-piece, or fifty six Half-Sovereigns at 10 s. a-piece, or one hundred and thirty two Crowns, or two hundred and sixty four Half-Crowns: And a Pound Weight of Silver, consisting of eleven Ounces, one Penny-weight fine, and nineteen Penny-weight alloy, was coined into three Pounds by Tale; namely, twelve Crowns, or twenty four Half-Crowns, or forty Shillings, or eighty pence, and twenty 5 pences, or two hundred and forty Three-pences, or seven hundred and twenty Pence, or one thousand four hundred and forty Half-pence, or two thousand eight hundred and eighty Farthings.

HENRY the Eighth's Divorces from Catherine of Arragon and Ann Bullen: the Acts of Parliament confirming these Divorces: other subsequent Acts which seemed to repeal what the first had ordained, the power given to the King to appoint his Successors, and to place them in what order he pleased: in a word, that Prince's last Will it self, had so imbroiled the Affair of the Succession, that it appeared full of Contradiction and Obscurity. It would not have been possible to resolve by the antient Laws and Customs of the Realm, the Queries arising from so many inconsistent Acts, because the Makers of these new Laws had not in view justice and equity, but only the gratifying of a Prince to whom it was dangerous to refuse any thing. Henry VIII. had foreseen the difficulties and perplexities his two Divorces might one day occasion, and even seemed desirous to prevent them. But he only increased them by the new Statutes he obtained of the Parliament, wherein his aim was not so much to procure the Welfare of the Kingdom, as to follow his humour, and cause his Will to be a Law. To fet this matter in a clear light, it will be proper to insert here a brief Recapitulation of that Monarch's Proceedings with respect to the Succession.

It has been seen in the History of his Reign, that after living eighteen years with Catherine of Arragon his first Wife, and having by her several Children, of whom there was but one Daughter alive, he had a mind to put her away. He pretended, his Marriage was void, and because the Court of Rome, for reasons of State, would not condescend to annul it, he caused a Sentence of Divorce to be pronounced by the Archbishop of Canterbury, before he had abolished the Papal Authority in his Kingdom. He thereby afforded a very specious pretence to question the Prelate's Authority by whom the Sentence was pronounced. What is more, he took a second Wife, before he was legally divorced from the first, and by this haste, gave a fresh occasion to dispute the validity of his second Marriage. Here are already two Contradictions in these his two first steps. He applied to the Pope, as to his Judge, and before he had solemnly renounced his Authority, contemns it, and in spite of the Pope, whose jurisdiction was still acknowledged in England, is divorced from Queen Catherine. On the other hand, he owns there was need of a legal Sentence to justify his Divorce, and yet he prevents the Sentence by running into a second Marriage, before it was pronounced.

In the next place, he beheaded his second Wife for Adultery, and yet, before the execution, pretended she could not be his Wife, and was divorced from her on a frivolous pretence. These two Divorces were confirmed by an Act of Parliament passed in 1536, wherein was also a manifest Contradiction. The Act declared Mary and Elizabeth, born of the two first Marriages, illegitimate and incapable of succeeding to the Crown, and yet it gave the King power to place them on the Throne, since, without any limitation, it invested him with all the Authority necessary to settle the Succession as he pleased.

There was likewise another contradiction in a Statute of the year 1540, where it was declared, that a Marriage after Consummation should not be annulled by reason of a Pre-contract. Nevertheless Henry's Divorce from Ann Bullen had no other Motive. Thereby, the King and Parliament owned they had injured Elizabeth, in declaring her illegitimate. It will be said perhaps, this Act was not to regard what was passed. But it is certain, it was made only with design to favour Elizabeth. Notwithstanding, she was not restored by this Act, but it still lay in the King's breast to give her a Place in, or exclude her from the Succession.

In another Act made in 1544, there was a no less manifest Contradiction. By this Act, both Houses themselves put in the line of the Succession Mary and Elizabeth after their Brother Edward. Did not this seem to be making them an authentick Reparation, and owning them for legitimate? And indeed, hitherto no Bastards had ever been on the Throne of England. Nay, it might be questioned, whether it was in the Parliament's Power to place them there. At least there would have been need of a very express and authentick Law for that purpose. Nevertheless by a particular Clause of this Act, the King was allowed the liberty to impose conditions on these two Princesses, without which they could have no right to succeed; a thing the Parliament would not, nay could not, have done, if they had been owned for legitimate. It was not therefore on account of their natural Right, but by mere favour, that they were enabled to succeed to the Crown.

Henry followed the same Plan in his last Will. He put Mary and Elizabeth in the line of the Succession after their Brother Edward, but in such a manner that he let them see, it was by mere Grace, since he bound them to certain conditions, without which they were to forfeit their right. The difference he made between them and Edward, showed he owned them not for legitimate, and thereby afforded a pretence to question the Right he gave them. But what conducted still more to embroil the affair of the Succession, was that this Will passing over in Silence the Issue of Margaret Queen of Scotland, Henry's eldest Sister, placed next to Elizabeth the Children of Mary Queen-Dowager of France and Duchess of Suffolk, the younger Sister. This was a manifest abuse of the Power granted him by the Parliament, and consequently a furnishing the Queen of Scotland with a plausible pretence to demand the annulling of a Will which subverted the most steady Laws of the Kingdom.

Edward VI. completed this Confusion in the Affair of the Succession, by conveying the Crown to Jane Grey, contrary to the rights of Mary and Elizabeth. This was an Act of absolute Sovereignty very unbecoming a King of England, and one that died a Minor. But moreover, in this Act of Conveyance there were Contradictions no less palpable than those Henry VIII. had been guilty of. Edward owned for good and valid, the Act declaring Mary and Elizabeth illegitimate. But at the same time, he repealed by his own Authority, that which gave the King his Father the Power to settle the Succession. On the other hand, he followed his Father's Will, in giving the preference to the younger Sister's Children; but withal, annulled the Will, by excluding Mary and Elizabeth.

By this short Recapitulation, it may be easily perceived what a door to Divisions and Civil Wars was opened by Henry VIII. and his Successor. By the above-mentioned Acts, four Princesses, namely, Mary, Elizabeth, the Queen of Scotland, and Jane Grey, could pretend to the Crown after Edward's Death, and each could find in these very Acts, Arguments to combat the Claims of her Adversaries.

Mary rested upon her Father's Will. But she received, in her opinion, a much stronger Support, tho' she durst not openly alledge it, from her natural Right, and the want of Authority in those who annulled her Mother's marriage. On the other hand, it might be objected to her, that having been declared illegitimate by an Act of Parliament, that Act was never repealed, and it was not in the King's power to place Bastards on the Throne, in

The Gold Coins of this King are Sovereigns, Half-Sovereigns, Angels, Half Angels, Crowns, Half-Crowns. The Sovereign has on one side the King's Bust crowned; Reverse, SCVTVM. FIDEL. PROTEGIT. EVM. the Arms in a Shield surrounded, between E. R. Another by the King's Tunes on the Arms side; on the Reverse, the King with a youthful Countenance, bare-headed, the Motto as in the obverse. The other sort has the King's Face in Armour crowned, holding a naked Sword in his Right hand, and Ball in his left. EDWARD VI. D. G. AGL. FRANC. Z. HIB. REX. Reverse, the Arms crowned between E. R. IHS. AVTEM. TRANS. PER. MEDI. ILLO. I. A. T. (Fig. 2.) The Crown and Half-Crown have the same tincture to those of his Father; the fine Money of Henry VIII. having the half face, and his but the full; whereas King Edward's has but the half, and M.D.XLIX. (Fig. 1.) and the other, INIMICOS EVS. INDVAM. CONFUSIONE. It was on the former of these that John P. Latimer remarked, that it was a pretty little Shilling, that he had like to have put it away for an old Cross. The Crown, Half-Crown, Shilling, and Six-pence, have all a crown and Half-Crown give him on Horseback, and underneath the Horse 1553; another has the Feathers upon the Horse's Head (Fig. 3.) whereas the Shilling and Six-pence give him full-faced; of which there are of two different Mints; of York with the Letter Y; and Trengemont's Mint in the lower, an O or T. (See P. 2. g.) Both these, as well as the Six-pence, have a Rose on one side the King's Head, and XII. or VI. on the other. The Three-pence, with the Rose and III. has the same Inscription as the Shilling.

1553. exclusion of the lawful Heirs. That besides it was known to the whole Nation, that the Parliament was far from being free when she was plac'd in the Succession after Edward, but however this Act ought to have been preceded by an express repeal of that, whereby she was declared incapable of succeeding.

Of Elizabeth. The same thing could be alledged against Elizabeth. But the might answer, that her Mother's divorce was grounded only upon a Clause which was afterwards declared insufficient, and that by the Act of the year 1540, she was referred to her Rights. Consequently it was to her the Crown was devolved if her Sister Mary was incapable of succeeding.

Of Mary. The Queen of Scotland could plead the Illegitimation of Mary and Elizabeth, and affirm, it was her Right to ascend the Throne of England, as Grand-Daughter to Henry VIII's eldest Sister. As to the objection of her being born out of the Land, it was a groundless Cavil, since the Prince of the Blood in England, are never deemed Foreigners, though born out of the Kingdom.

Of Jane Grey. Jane Grey had for her Edward's Assignment, approved by all the Counsellors and the Judges of the Realm. But it must be confest, it was a very ill-grounded Right. Herein, 'tis certain, the King, the Council, and the Judges, had undertaken what exceeded the bounds of their Power. Besides, the Duke of Northumberland was known to hold the Council in Subjection, and it would have been easy to prove the Judges were forced to draw and sign the instrument.

Mary. Had this affair been to be decided by the Law, and impartial Judges, many difficulties would doubtless have occurred. On the other hand, if each of the four Princesses who might have pretended to the Crown, would have maintain'd her Right, and had been strong enough to support her pretensions, to what calamities would the Kingdom have been expos'd? But the affair took another turn, because Elizabeth and the Queen of Scotland endeavour'd not to possess the Crown. So Mary and Jane were the only Competitors. This was very advantageous to Mary, because her Right was thereby put in the balance with only Jane's weakness of all. Undoubtedly this is what induc'd all the Historians to declare for Mary's Right, because they compar'd it only with that of her Rival. But if Elizabeth and the Queen of Scotland had been each supported with a good Army, perhaps all the advantage would not have been so readily given to Mary. Having thus seen the grounds of this quarrel, let us now proceed to the decision.

The Duke of Northumberland. The Duke of Northumberland took great care to conceal Edward's death, because he expected Mary would come and throw herself into his hands. It must be confest, this Minister, tho' very politic, committed a very gross error, in neglecting to secure Mary and Elizabeth, immediately after Edward had signed the conveyance to Jane Grey. He might have easily effected it whilst the King was alive. But instead of suddenly taking so necessary a precaution, he expected they would come of their own accord into the Snare he had laid for them, by causing them to be sent for to keep their Brother Company in his Sickness. Mary had like to have been intrapp'd. She was within half a day's Journey of London (1), when she had notice from the Earl of Arundel, of the King's death, the assignment of the Succession, and the design upon her person. This News obliging her to take other measures, she immediately turned back, and went to Kenning-Hall in Norfolk. From thence she wrote a Letter to the Council (2), which plainly discovered she was informed of what they intended to conceal from her. She told the Counsellors, she thought it very strange that the King her Brother being three days dead, she had not been adverted of it by them, since they could not be ignorant of her just Right to the Crown. That their neglect on this occasion, was a plain Intimation of some ill design against her; but that she was ready to take All in good part, and to pardon those who would have recourse to her clemency. That, in the mean while, she required them to proclaim her Queen. After writing this Letter she departed from Kenning-Hall, and repaired to the Castle of Framlingham in Suffolk. Two reasons induc'd her to retire to this place. The first, that the Duke of Northumberland was much hated in those Parts, ever since the great slaughter he had made of the Rebels who had taken arms under Ket. The second, that the Castle of Framlingham being near the Sea, she might, if the ill Success of her Affairs should oblige her to it, have an opportunity to fly with more ease into Flanders. Upon her arrival at this place, she took the Title of Queen, and being proclaimed at Norwich, sent a circular Letter to all the Nobility, requiring them to come and aid her in maintaining her Right. Let us now see what pass'd at London.

It has been observ'd in the foregoing Reign, that the Duke of Northumberland was become so abject in the Northumbrian Council, that not one of the Counsellors dar'd to oppose his Will. Edward's death seem'd likely to free them from this Servitude. But as probably the Duke would have more Authority under his Daughter-in-law Jane, than under Edward, every one dreaded to make him an enemy. It is not therefore to the Council so much as to the Duke of Northumberland, by whom the Board was directed in all their resolutions, that whatever was done in favour of Jane after Edward's death, is to be ascribed. This Minister soon found it impossible to conceal long the King's death. Two days after, the News of it was published in London. Besides, Mary's retreat plainly shew'd how fruitless were the pains that were taken on that account. So the Duke thinking it no longer proper to hide his designs, was sent with the Duke of Suffolk to give Jane notice of her being to ascend the Throne (3), by virtue of Edward's Letters Patents whereby he assign'd her the Crown. Jane was then but in her sixteenth year. But at that age, wherein the Judgment hardly begins to be form'd, hers had acquired such a degree of Perfection, as is rarely found in one so very young. All the Historians agree, the Solidity of her mind, joined to a continual application to study, rendered her the Wonder of her Age. She understood perfectly French, Latin and Greek, and made use of these Languages as helps to attain to the highest Knowledge in the Sciences (4). Herein she was very like her Cousin King Edward, who had a tender Friendship for her, as, on her part, she had a great esteem for him. She appear'd much mov'd at his death, which however she must have expected, since his recovery had been now some time despaired of. But as she knew not that his death was to procure her the Crown, she was extremely surpris'd at the News which her Father and the Duke of Northumberland told her. Instead of receiving it with Joy, as they doubtless expected, she told them, she did not mean to enrich herself by the Spoils of others: That the Crown belonged to the Princess Mary, and after her to the Princess Elizabeth, and being acquainted, as she was, with King Henry's Will, she was unwilling to aspire to the Throne before her turn. Against these reasons were urg'd King Edward's and the Council's Authority, with the approbation of the Judges, and it was endeavour'd to convince her, that this unanimity was a clear evidence there was nothing in it contrary to the Laws of the Land. She found herself mov'd by these Arguments, and the importunities of Guilford Dudley her Husband prevail'd with her at length to receive the offered Crown. It was however in such a manner, as convinc'd the two Dukes that she did it not so much from a persuasion of the Justice of her Title, as out of compliance, and for want of resolution. Accordingly the Duke of Northumberland declared in his report to the Council, that so far was Jane from aspiring to the Crown, she was rather, by enticement and force, made to accept it.

As soon as the Duke of Northumberland had obtained Jane's consent, it was resolv'd that the Council should withdraw to the Tower with her (5), and she be proclaimed. This resolution being taken, the Lord-Mayor of London was sent for, and being inform'd of the King's death, and of the Settlement in favour of Queen Jane, the Ceremony of the proclaiming was fix'd to the next day, the 10th of July, and the 5th after Edward's Death. Meanwhile the Council writ an Answer to Mary's Letter signed by twenty one Counsellors (6), to this effect, "That Mary could not pretend to the Crown, since she was born of an unlawful Marriage, dissolved by a legal Sentence, confirmed by more than one Parliament: That she ought to give over her Pretensions, and acknowledge Queen Jane for her Sovereign, who was now on the Throne by virtue of the late King's Letters-Patents: That if she shew'd herself obedient, she should find the Counsellors all ready to do her any Service, consistent with their Duty to Queen Jane."

1553. Jane was proclaimed in London with the usual Formalities. But there were none of the Acclamations customary on such occasions: so astonished were the People to see a Queen proclaimed they had never thought of. Besides, as the Duke of Northumberland was very much hated, and as Jane was his Daughter-in-law, when she was heard to be proclaimed Queen, the Duke was imagined to be proclaimed chief Governor, which was by no means pleasing to the People. Nay, an accident happened on this occasion, which was very ominous, and confirmed the Londoners in their prejudice against the Duke of Northumberland. A Vintner's Boy (1) having some way expressed his scorn at the Proclamation, was immediately ordered to be set in the Pillory, with his Ears cut off, and nailed to it; which was accordingly done. This Proceeding, the odium whereof was cast upon the Duke, made it judged what was to be expected from his Government, since this new Reign began with an Act of Severity.

The Duke of Northumberland took care not to omit the Custom long since introduced, that the new Sovereigns should withdraw to the Tower, with the Council, in the beginning of their Reign. He could not doubt, Mary would pretend to the Crown, and use all possible endeavours to take possession, neither was he ignorant how the Nobles and People stood affected with regard to the situation the State was then in. For this reason, he was very glad to have the Counsellors in the Tower, in order to be master, and cause them to come to resolutions agreeable to his Interest. As the change which shortly after happened, proceeded from the Disposition of the several Members of the State, it will be absolutely necessary to have a distinct notion how they stood inclined, in order to understand the causes of this Revolution.

The Council consisted of one and twenty Counsellors, among whom there were few real Friends of the Duke of Northumberland; but every one feared him. Some, as the Earl of Arundel, still adhered to the Romish Religion, though outwardly they complied with the new Laws. Others, as the Archbishop of Canterbury, were truly Protestants. But the major part, without being really addicted to any Religion, blindly followed that which was uppermost. As they had readily embraced that of Henry VIII. they had with the same ease followed that established by Edward, being ready to refuse the Romish Religion if it suited best with their temporal Interest. This was particularly the Duke of Northumberland's Character. So, though he professed the Reformed Religion, the Protestants themselves had a very ill opinion of him. They were persuaded, his pretended Zeal for the advancement of the Reformation was all grimace, and the pure effect of his Policy. This disposition of the Counsellors, manifestly shews, that a religious Zeal alone was not capable of keeping them in Jane's Interest. There was need of a much stronger Motive to that end. But instead thereof, there was a reason which entirely disengaged them from her Party; namely, the slavish subjection they were held in by the Duke of Northumberland. That Lord, whose Pride was intolerable, could not bear contradiction. The Council seemed to have nothing to do, but to follow his directions without examination. Then, he was one of those unreasonable Persons, with whom if you fail on a single occasion, all past Services are cancelled. This the Earl of Arundel in particular had sadly experienced. Tho' he had been very servicable to the Duke in ruining Somerjet, yet afterwards, because he did not find him submissive enough, he caused him to be condemned in a heavy Fine, under colour of his having wasted the King's Treasure. This Usage was still remembered by the Earl, who only waited an Opportunity to be revenged. The rest of the Counsellors were no less desirous to free themselves from the Duke's Yoke. But they were as Prisoners in the Tower, where they apprehended, the least false step would cost them their Life, before the quarrel between Jane and Mary was decided. And therefore, they approved of whatever the Duke pleased to order, and the resolutions tending to establish Jane on the Throne, were made in the Council's name, though the Duke alone was the Author.

The rest of the Nobility, who had no share in the Government, were in much the same Sentiments with the Counsellors. Whilst the Duke of Somerjet was Protector, he was hated by the Nobility, as appeared in the former Reign. And therefore, they assented to the utmost the Earl of Warwick to ruin him. But when that was done, they soon perceived they were no gainers by the change, since it gave them a much prouder, and more formidable matter than the Person they were freed from. The new Minister treated them afterwards with so much haughtiness, that they had reason to regret the Duke of Somerjet. Consequently they earnestly desired to see him ruined, which they could not expect whilst his Daughter-in-law should be on the Throne. This made them incline to Mary, tho' that Princeess was little beloved in the Kingdom.

The Duke of Northumberland had been the principal Author of Somerjet's Fall, who was the People's Idol. This was sufficient to render him odious. Besides, he was counted a hard and cruel Man, whose Counsels always leaned to the side of Severity. After he had dispersed the Norfolk Rebels in the late Reign, he caused so many to be executed, that he drew upon him the hatred of the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. This hatred afterwards spread itself over the Kingdom, when he came to be at the head of Affairs. Wherefore, all the People in general wished to be freed from this odious Minister, and that could be only by the ruin of Jane's Party. The Londoners in particular hated him mortally, because they believed him guilty of King Edward's death.

Let us now consider the English Nation in respect to the two Religions. Jane openly professed the Protestant Religion, and shewed, she was entirely convinced of the truth of its Doctrines. Mary, on the contrary, was extremely addicted to the Romish Church, and though during Edward's Reign, she had pretended to adhere to the Religion established by Henry VIII. it was known to be only with design to silence those who governed during her Brother's Minority. She was not only thought devoted to the Pope, but also a Favourer of the most absurd Doctrines of the Romish Religion. It may easily be guessed, that all who were still for the old Religion in their hearts, passionately wished that this Princeess might ascend the Throne. This was the only way they could hope to see their Religion restored, whereas if Jane reigned, they could expect only the continuance of the measures taken to abolish it. The Duke of Northumberland, who, probably, was to be Jane's prime Minister, had even appeared zealous for the Reformation. So, to judge of him by his past Conduct, the Friends of the old Religion could hope for no advantage from him. Some who knew him better than the rest, were however sensible, he was far from being a good Protestant. But they knew also, though he might have favorable thoughts of their Religion, they could expect nothing from him but what was agreeable to his temporal Interest, and that this Interest would naturally hold him attached to the Protestant Party. So, the Roman Catholics were all for Mary, and ready to lend their assistance to set her on the Throne.

The better to understand how the Reformed stood affected at this time, it must be observed, that to consider England in general, it may be said, she was wholly Protestant. Hardly was there a Man but what had submitted, at least outwardly, to the Laws made for that purpose in the Reign of Edward. But among the great numbers which were looked upon as Protestants, there were many who were so only in name. Some still halted between the two Religions. Others were Papists in their hearts; and very many regarding only temporal advantages, had embraced the Reformation to make their Fortunes. The smallest number was of those, who truly convinced of the Tenets of the new Religion, were ready to sacrifice their All for its sake. None but these therefore were real Friends to Jane. As for the others, there were many who wished indeed the Reformation might prevail, and considered Mary's Accession to the Throne as a misfortune, but we were unwilling to hazard their Lives and Fortunes to prevent it. However, there was one thing wherein all the Reformed, as well the zealous, as the lukewarm, and timorous were agreed; namely, in their hatred of the Duke of Northumberland, and their dread of falling again under his tyrannical Government. These two Passions caused them to look upon Jane's Reign as a misfortune to them and the Kingdom. They were the more confirmed in this opinion, as, not foreseeing what was to happen in Mary's Reign, they flattered themselves, that content with the private exercise of her own Religion, she would leave the Protestant in the same state she found it, or at most would be satisfied with giving her Party Liberty of Conscience; and this was what her Friends every where, and on all occasions, took great care to insinuate. So Jane's Cause was like to be but ill-supported, especially as Mary having no other Rival, the English did not believe they ought, through a principle of Religion, to depart from the rules of Justice and Equity, by depriving her of the Crown, who had the best Title. If their Posterity have not continued in the same opinion, it is to be wholly ascribed to the Cruelties exercised upon the Protestants, where-ever the Romish Religion prevails.

It is certain, though Mary had for her all the Well-Wishers to the old Religion, that Party would not have been able to place her on the Throne, if the People's hatred of the Duke of Northumberland had not determined 1553. the Protestants themselves to declare for her. Most of the English Historians take great pains to prove the justice of Mary's Title, to infer from thence that the Protestants preferred Right to their own Interest. I won't deny that several acted from that principle. But very probably the dread of falling again under the Government of the Duke of Northumberland, helped Mary to more friends than the justice of her Title, especially as this Title was not so clear but that it was liable to many objections. However this be, Mary being proclaimed at Notwich, the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk declared for her, and furnished her with Troops. The Men of Suffolk, though strongly attached to the Reformation, signalized themselves on this occasion. It is true, they desired to know of her, whether she would leave Religion in the same State she found it; which she positively promised, reserving to herself however the liberty of professing her own Religion. Upon these Assurances, they resolved to hazard their Lives and Estates in her quarrel. Many Lords and Gentlemen came also to Framlingham to offer their Service; and the Earls of Bath and Suffolk, the Sons of the Lord Wharton and Mordant (1), with many more (2), raised Forces for her.

Mean time, the Council was drawing instructions for Henry, who was to go and inform the Emperor of what passed in England. It was believed there was most danger from that quarter. Stellay went indeed (3), but the Emperor would neither give him audience, nor receive Jane's Letter to notify her Accession to the Crown, and to desire his friendship.

Mean while, the Council received advices from all sides, that Mary's Party gathered strength, that she had been proclaimed in several places, and had an Army already which daily increased. These ill-news, which flowed in very fast, obliged the Ministers to raise Forces to fend against Mary's. Immediate Orders were given to those that were ready to meet at Newmarket, with whom were joined some Regiments levied in haste at London. At the same time they sent Sir Edward Hastings, the Earl of Huntington's Brother, to raise Buckinghamshire, and the Earl of Northampton undertook also to raise Hertfordshire. The Duke of Suffolk was appointed to command the Army, because the Duke of Northumberland was unwilling to go away, for fear his Absence should produce ill-effects.

But the Earl of Arundel, who wished for an opportunity to act for Mary, seeing the Duke of Northumberland's preference was an insuperable obstacle to the execution of his Designs, found means to break his measures. He intimated to Jane, that the Duke her Father would be exposed to great danger; that it would be more proper for the Duke of Northumberland to head the Army, and for the Duke her Father to stay with her. On the other hand, he insinuated, or caused it to be insinuated to the Duke of Northumberland, that it would be very dangerous to put the Army under the Duke of Suffolk's command, who had never been very fortunate in his Expeditions: That on such an important occasion, he ought instantly to head the Troops himself, and that his name alone was capable of striking terror into those assembled by Mary, in a County where he had given singular proofs of his Conduct and Valour. Jane's tender affection for the Duke her Father, caused her so ardently to embrace this advice, that all the Duke of Northumberland's endeavours to make her alter her mind were ineffectual.

At so critical a juncture, the Duke of Northumberland was much distracted in his mind. Indeed, he knew he was much fitter than the Duke of Suffolk to command the Army against Mary, and was very sensible, all depended upon it. But then he was afraid to leave the young Queen in the hands of the Council, of whom he was not well assured, and who complied with him purely out of fear: and the more, as the Duke of Suffolk, the Queen's Father, was reckoned but a weak Man. However, as it was not entirely in his choice to accept or refuse the command; and besides all depended upon the Success against Mary's Army, he resolved to march. He left London on the 14th of July, without being waited Succes (as is usual on such occasions) by the great Crowds looking on as he passed, and went and headed six thousand Men assembled at Newmarket (4).

Though most of the Counsellors had no great inclination to favour the Duke of Northumberland's designs, they were obliged however to use great caution. They saw themselves as Prisoners in the Tower, under the direction of the Duke of Suffolk, who was concerned to prevent all Proceedings against his Daughter. It was necessary therefore to seem very zealous for Jane's interest, till a favorable opportunity offered itself. They then concerted, that they appointed Ridley Bishop of London to sit out Queen Jane's Title in a Sermon at St. Paul's, and to warn the People of the dangers they would be exposed to, if Mary should mount the Throne. Ridley discharged his Mission (5) like one that was persuaded the Reformation would very much suffer under Mary's Government. And therefore, he largely insisted upon Mary's Attachment to the Romish Religion, and informed the Audience of some things which had passed between him and her, and which were plain indications of her Aversion to the Reformation and the Reformed (6). Mary never forgave him this Sermon, which at that juncture was capable of doing her great injury. For, it was at a time when her friends were using their utmost endeavours to persuade the People, she was not so zealous for the Romish Religion as she was represented, and that she would make no Change in that which was established by Law. Saunders, Vice-chancellor of Cambridge, afterwards Archbishop of York (7), in the Reign of Elizabeth, having received the same orders from the Duke of Northumberland [Chancellor of that University] managed it more artfully, and by keeping to more general Terms, gave no offence to either Party.

Mean while, the Duke of Northumberland was extremely embarrassed. He had marched to Cambridge with six thousand Men (8), and from thence was advanced to St. Edmundsbury. But instead of seeing his Army increase by the way as he expected, it daily diminished by Desertions. On the other hand, he heard of Mary's approaching to Suffolk and Suffolk, and to complete his Misfortunes, New was brought him that Sir Edward Hastings (9), who was to have joined him with four thousand Men, had declared for Mary, and proclaimed her at Buckingham. In short, he was informed likewise, that the six Men of War sent to cruise on the Coast of Suffolk to prevent Mary's escape, had followed the example of Hastings. All these things made him resolve to return to Cambridge, from whence he writ to the Council for a speedy Supply. But the Counsellors were then otherwise employed.

The News they received from all parts of the prosperous State of Mary's Affairs, had now determined some of them to provide for their safety, by changing sides, whilst their change might be of service to them. In all appearance, the Earl of Arundel had already laboured to take off some of his Collegues from Jane's Party. The Marquis of Winchester, who always went with the stream, was easily prevailed with. The Earl of Pembroke had been one of the most zealous for Jane, because his Son had espoused this new Queen's younger Sister. But finding her Affairs in an ill way, he resolved either of himself, or by the Solicitations of the Earl of Arundel, to screen himself from the impending Storm, in doing some signal Service (10). These three Lords gained other Counsellors, and they all resolved to declare for Mary as soon as it was possible. The difficulty was to get out of the Tower, without giving suspicion to the Duke of Suffolk. Had the Duke of Northumberland been present, they would have found it very hard to succeed; but the Duke of Suffolk was far from having his Penetration. The Letter lately received from the Duke of Northumberland furnished them with the wanted pretence. They represented to the Duke of Suffolk, that the readiest way to find the desired Supply, was to apply to the Mayor of London; and to that end, it was proper the Council should meet somewhere in the City, the more easily to confer with the Mayor, concerning the means of speedily raising a body of Troops: That the Earl of Pembroke's House was convenient for that purpose, and there the Affair would be forwarded more in two Hours, than in fix in the Tower. But as it might be objected, that the Mayor and Aldermen could be easily sent for to the Tower, they added, that at the same time Audience might be given to the French and Spanish Ambassadors, who scrupled to receive it in the Tower. Whether the Duke of Suffolk did not suspect them of any ill design, or at such a juncture, durst 1553. not discover his suspicions, he suffered the Council to meet at the Earl of Pembroke's (1), whom he did not mistrust, on the 19th of July.

As soon as they were met, the Earl of Arundel made a Speech, representing to them, That now or never was the time, to shake off the Tyranny of the Duke of Northumberland: That they had sufficiently experienced his insolence, injustice, cruelty, treachery to his Friends, and if they were so unwise as to support Jane on the Throne, they would but render more heavy the Yoke which the Duke had already laid on their necks: That the only way was to declare for Mary, and when the People should see the Council take that course, the Duke of Northumberland would be forsaken by all. The Council's sudden resolution to follow the Earl's advice, shews that this Affair had been already determined among the principal Members. After a short debate, they sent for the Mayor and Aldermen of London, and declaring their resolution, they went together and proclaimed Mary in several parts of the City. Then they repaired to St. Paul's, where Te Deum was sung. The ready Compliance of the Magistrates of London, can be ascribed only to their hatred of the Duke of Northumberland. Let it be affirmed ever so much, that these Magistrates longed for the Re-establishment of the old Religion, and therefore gladly embraced the present opportunity to set Mary on the Throne; it is not likely, that Men placed in their Offices in Edward's Reign, should be so well inclined to the old Religion, as to come to so sudden a Resolution with that view, if there had not been some other motive. However, as soon as they came from St. Paul's, the Council sent an order to the Duke of Suffolk, to require him to deliver up the Tower, and that Jane should lay down the Title of Queen, and give over her Pretensions. The Duke immediately obeyed, seeing no possibility of keeping the Tower at this juncture. As for Jane she saw herself stripped of her dignity, held but nine days, with more joy than she had seen herself clothed with it. Then the Council dispatched orders to the Duke of Northumberland to disband his Army, and behave himself as became an obedient Subject to Queen Mary. At the same time the Earl of Arundel and the Lord Paquet were sent to inform Mary of these Transactions.

The Duke of Northumberland heard what passed at London, before he received the Council's Orders to dismiss his Troops, and plainly perceiving, it would not be possible to keep his Army together, prevented the Orders, and obeyed beforehand. His first thoughts were to fly out of the Kingdom. But 'tis said, he was hindered by the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners, who plainly told him, they had need of his Testimony to justify their Conduct. After that, he thought only of gaining Mary's Favour, by expressing a Zeal for her Service, as if it had been possible to deceive her by some external Actions. To that purpose, he went to the Market-place in Cambridge, and proclaimed the Queen, singing up his own Hat for Joy [and crying, God save Queen Mary]. But all this signified nothing. The next day (2), the Earl of Arundel arrested him by the Queen's Order. Then was that proud and haughty Man seen to cringe, as much as he had been exalted in his Prosperity. He fell at the Earl of Arundel's Feet to beg his favour, and shewed many other signs of fear, abjectness, and pusillanimity. This is the common Character of Men whom Fortune raises above their Birth and Merit. Three of his Sons, namely, the Earl of Warwick his eldest, Ambrose and Henry, Sir Andrew Dudley his Brother, John and Henry Gates, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sands, were apprehended with him, and sent to the Tower the 25th of July. Upon this occasion, a Woman seeing the Duke of Northumberland pass to the Tower, shook at him a Handkerchief dipt in the Duke of Somerset's blood, upbraiding him with having caused it to be unjustly shed.

When the Duke of Northumberland was in the Tower, Mary met with no more opposition. All Jane's Adherents strove to atone for their fault by a ready Submission, and Supplication of the new Queen's Mercy. She received very graciously those who came to pay their duty to her, though she was determined to sacrifice to her Safety, or Vengeance, some of those whom she looked upon as her principal Enemies. Of this number were Jane Grey, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquis of Northampton, Ridley Bishop of London, Cheek who had been Edward's Preceptor, Robert Dudley the Duke of Northumberland's Son, Guilford Dudley Jane's Husband, Chelmley and Montague Judges. All these were sent to (3), or detained in the Tower by the Queen's express Order. But three days after, she pardoned the Duke of Suffolk, having pitched upon him for an instance of her Clemency, because she thought him incapable of creating her any disturbance (4).

On the 3d of August she came to London with her Sister Elizabeth, who had met her on the way with a thousand Horse (5), she had raised for her Service. When she entered the Tower, she released the Duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, Bonner, the Dukes of Somerset, and the Lord Courtney, eldest Son of the Marquis of Exeter, whom she shortly after created Earl of Devonshire. Thus, without any effusion of Blood, she was peaceably settled in the Throne, notwithstanding the attempts to deprive her of it. She owed this good Success to the universal hatred of the Duke of Northumberland, for it may be truly affirmed, that as Jane Grey, without that Lord, would never have borne the Title of Queen, so without him she would doubtless have preserved it. Very probably, the restoring of Religion to the state it was in before the alterations introduced by the two last Kings, and perhaps the being revenged of her Enemies, were the principal things intended by Mary, when she ascended the Throne. At least, we shall see no other Project in the course of her Reign.

As the new Queen had nothing in her thoughts but the establishing of her Religion, her first care was to consult her trusty Friends how to effect it. She was herself disposed to keep no measures, but to force the Kingdom to return immediately to what she called, the Union of the Catholic Church. To that end, she had now determined to send for Cardinal Pool as Legate, to reconcile England to the Pope. But Gardiner, who was considered as a Man of great Experience, was of another opinion. He knew the Reformation must be pulled down the same way it was set up, that is, by degrees, and therefore it was sufficient at first, to bring back Religion to what it was at King Henry's death. This advice was more prudent, and withal more suitable to the Interest of the Person who gave it. He was sensible, the Queen had a great Esteem and Affection for Pool, and was afraid this Cardinal being in England, would dispossess him of the chief place in the Queen's Favour, nay, quite ruin him with her, because he was not his Friend. Mean while, as this advice was not relished by the Queen, it was in danger of being rejected, if Gardiner had not used other means to compass his ends. He sent a Messenger to the Emperor, to represent to him, that what the Queen proposed was too hazardous, and in case Pool came to soon into England, his Zeal for the See of Rome would undo all, because the English were not yet prepared to submit to the Pope's Yoke (6). That on the contrary, by his method, every thing would succeed to the Queen's Satisfaction, and to the advantage of Religion, provided the Queen would be pleased to make him Chancellor, and thereby give him the Authority necessary to conduct so nice an affair. Probably, it was now the Emperor projected the Marriage between his Son Philip and Mary, either of himself, or by Gardiner's Suggestion. However this be, the Emperor approving Gardiner's measures, writ several Letters to Mary, to persuade her to moderate her Zeal, lest too much haste should spoil her designs. As she had a great deference for his Councils, she brought herself by degrees to comply with the Bishop's Projects, to whom at length she gave the Great Seal (7).

King Edward's Funeral was solemnized at Westminster King Ed. the 18th of August. The new Ministers were for having the old abolished Office made use of on this occasion, but Cranmer, supported by Acts still in force, stoutly opposed it, and officiated himself according to the new Liturgy, giving the Communion to as many as were desirous to receive it (8). But the Queen had a solemn Service in her own Chapel performed with all the Ceremonies of the Church of Rome.

On the 12th, the Queen in Council declared, she would use no force upon Conscience in affairs of Religion. Great care was taken to disperse this Declaration, and to magnify it as a great Instance of the Queen's Generosity. But the Protestants easily saw the difference betwixt her 1553. Declarations in Council, and her Promises to the Suffolk-Men. She had told these, that Religion should be left in the same state as it was in at Edward's death, but in this Declaration thought it sufficient to give a general Assurance, that Protestants should not be forced to embrace the Romish Religion; for this was the most natural meaning of her Expressions. This Restriction to her first Promise greatly alarmed them.

The Adherents of the Romish Church were so confident of the Queen's Intention to restore their Religion, that they made no difficulty of owning it publicly, and of even inveighing against the Protestant Religion, though it had still the Countenance and Protection of the Laws.

The day after the Queen had made this Declaration in her Council (1), Bonner went to St. Paul's Church to hear a Sermon preached by his Chaplain Burn. The Preacher spoke so honorably of Bonner, that he raised the Indignation of his Audience. Then, exaggerating the pretended Persecutions suffered by this Prelate in the late Reign, he spoke of King Edward in so injurious Terms (2), that the hearers lost all Patience. Some reproached, and others threw Stones at him. One even threw a Dagger, which he happily avoided, and which stuck fast in the wood of his Pulpit. At last the People grew so furious, that probably the Preacher had been torn in pieces, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent Protestant Ministers, interposed, and conveyed him from the danger, into a neighbouring House. What recompence this Service met with will appear hereafter.

The Protestants still flattered themselves that the Queen would keep her word, and even gave the restriction, the had added by her declaration in Council to her first promise, a favorable Interpretation. But they were not long left in this hope. Shortly after (3), the Queen published a Proclamation, which was but too capable to remove their mistake. The Terms were so artfully managed, that they implied much more than they seemed to express. The Queen said, she had the same belief in which she had been educated from her Infancy, and intended to adhere to it during her Life; she passionately wished all her Subjects would follow her example; but would use no force, till publick Order should be taken by common Assent. This plainly discovered her intention to change Religion by the Parliament, and that then she should think herself discharged from her promise of not compelling Conscience. Then she forbid her Subjects to give one another the odious names of Papist and Heticick. The Protestants considered this Prohibition as levelled entirely against them, because they clearly understood, that a disobedience to it would be punished in them, but not in their Adversaries. After that, all sorts of unlawful Assemblies were forbid, and this Article had the same construction with the foregoing. By another Clause of the Proclamation, it was forbid to preach without her special License. A Man must have been wilfully blind, not to see, this was intended to exclude the Protestants out of all the Pulpits. Finally, the Queen said, it was her intention, no Man should be punished for the last Rebellion, without her Order. Hereby, she left all in fears. The Proclamation ended with saying, the Queen was resolved to punish rigorously all those who should foment pernicious designs; but she hoped to have no cause to execute the severity of the Law. This Clause naturally inspired the Protestants with terror, for it was easy to foresee, that Religion and the Laws were going to be changed, and that those who submitted not blindly to the new Statutes, would be considered as Rebels.

The same day this Proclamation was published (4), came on the Trial of the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Warwick, Sir Andrew Dudley, Sir John and Sir Henry Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer. Upon the Evidence of Palmer, and Sir John Gates, King Edward had consented to the Execution of his Uncle the Duke of Somerset, and they were become the principal Confidants of the Duke of Northumberland. The Queen made the Duke of Norfolk Lord High-Steward at the Trial of these three Lords. He was still under condemnation, since the Act of Attainder against him had not been reversed. But the Queen had granted him a Pardon, which indeed was not dispatched till eleven days after. It was thought, without doubt, that the Queen's promise was sufficient, otherwise it is not easy to conceive, by what fort of right, a Man under Sentence of death could pre-1553. side in a capital Trial, or even give his Vote (5).

The Duke of Northumberland being brought before his Peers, desired Information upon two Points, before he answered to the Articles exhibited against him. The first was, Whether a Man acting by Order of Council, and the Authority of the Great Seal, could be guilty of Treason? The second was, whether Persons who had acted with him in the same affair, and were equally guilty, could fit as his Judges? This doublets related to the Marquis of Winchester, and the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who were actually Members of the Council when Jane was proclaimed, and had given orders for her Proclamation. After a short Consultation, it was answered, that the Great Seal of an Usurper could give no Authority nor Indemnity to those that acted by such a Warrant. To the second Point, he was answered, that none of the Peers who sat in Judgment upon him, having been either condemned for, or even accused of the same Crime, could be deprived of their Right upon a bare surmise or report. It belongs to the Lawyers to consider whether these answers are very solid. It seems, as to the first, that if this maxim was admitted in its utmost extent, it would draw after it very dangerous Consequences. Let us, for instance, suppose an Usurper upon the Throne of England, it is certain the Adherents to the lawful King cannot avoid great danger, which way soever they turn. If they obey the Usurper, they will be guilty of Treason when the lawful King is on the Throne; if they refuse Obedience, they will be punished by the Usurper. It seems that the maxim which allows, that every Subject ought to be faithful to the King on the Throne, and who exercises the Sovereign Power, is liable to fewer Inconveniences. As to the second, let the Peers insist never so much on their Privileges, it is contrary to Reason and Equity, that Accomplices of a Crime should sit in Judgment on him who committed it with them, when it is notoriously certain, they were equally guilty. At least 'tis unlikely, this maxim should be approved by the Judges of the Realm, if there was the least room to believe the Accomplices would vote for the accused, which might vary easily happen.

The Duke seeing these two Points determined against him, confessed himself guilty, and submitted to the Queen's mercy. The other two Lords followed his example, and they were all three found guilty of High-Treason. Of the seven condemned, three were destined to execution, the Duke of Northumberland, Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer. The Bishop of Worcester (6) being sent to the Duke with the message of death, he confessed to the Bishop, and declared, he had always been a Roman Catholic in his heart. He made the same Confession on the Scaffold; but it was still doubted whether this was done in hopes of a pardon (7), or he had really dissembled during the whole course of his Life. It is pretended, that to engage him to this publick declaration, he had been flattered with the hopes of his Pardon, even tho' his head were laid on the Block. He died unlamented, his past conduct having given no person whatever, any cause to love him. His two Companions were executed the same day, being the 22d of August.

The Proclamation lately published by the Queen concerning Religion, plainly shew'd in what Spirit she designed to rule. But immediately after, there were more convincing proofs. The Inhabitants of Suffolk relying on the Queen's promise, and having transgressed the Prohibitions contained in the Proclamation, the Court sent an order to the Magistrates of that County, to look strictly to the execution of it, and rigorously punish the Disobedient. Upon this the Inhabitants, not believing the Queen would break her word, after the great service they had done her, sent Deputies to pray her to remember what she had promised them with her own mouth. This Petition was rejected with great haughtiness, and thought the more offensive, as it justly reproached the Queen with failure of her 1553. word. They were answered, that Subjects were not to controul the actions of their Sovereign, and Dobbe (1), one of their number, was set in the Pillory for speaking more freely than the rest.

A few days after, Bradford, one of the two Ministers who had refused Burn, was sent to Prison, and Rogers, his Companion, confined to his House. Afterwards he was also thrown into Prison. The great Changes meditated by the Ministers, made them afraid of meeting with obstacles from those who had most credit with the People, and therefore they were glad on divers pretences to secure them. These Proceedings made the Protestants think they were going to be exposed to a terrible Storm.

At the same time, all the Bishops deprived in the Reign of Edward, were restored, by Commissioners appointed by the Queen to examine the Causes of their Deprivation. Five Roman Catholic Bishops, Bonner, Gardiner, Tunstall, Day, and Heath, were substituted in the room of five Reformed (2). Gardiner was made Chancellor at the same time, and a few days after, a Commission was given him by the Queen, empowering him singly to grant Licences to Preachers, in consequence of what he had before injoined by her Proclamation. Some Ecclesiastical Protestants not thinking proper to submit to this Order, were sent to Prison. Hosper Bishop of Gloucester, [Errar Bishop of St. David's], and Coverdale Bishop of Exeter, were of this number. The first were imprisoned, the last commanded not to stir out of his House without leave.

After the Roman Catholics plainly saw the Queen's intentions, they had not patience to wait for the Restoration of their Religion by public Authority, but boldly celebrated Divine Service in several Places, according to the old Rites before the Reformation; and though this was against Law, the Court connived at it, and silently approved it.

At the same time, the Partiality of the Queen and her Ministers appeared evidently in favour of the Roman Catholics against the Protestants. Judge Hales, who had alone refused to sign the Instrument which transferred the Crown to Jane Grey, was thrown into the Marshalsea, for charging the Justices of Kent to conform to the Laws of Edward not yet repealed, or rather for being a Protestant (3). For the same reason Montague, who had been forced to assist in drawing the forementioned Instrument, was turned out of his Office, fined in a thousand Pounds, and succeeded by Bromley, who had drawn and signed it without scruple.

In fine, since the short time the Queen had been on the Throne, Protestants were every where injured and oppressed, the Magistrates not venturing or caring to protect them. Peter Martyr, Professor of Divinity in Oxford, finding himself exposed to the Insults of the Enemies of his Religion, was obliged at last to leave the place, and retire to the Archbishop of Canterbury. But Cranmer, whose ruin was resolved, was little able to protect him. Mean time, Banner launched out into Invectives and Raileries against Mr. Canterbury, as he was pleased to call him, and published every where, that he was so resigned to the Queen, that he had promised her a solemn Abjuration of his Errors. Cranmer refuted this Calumny in a writing. He called the Queen herself to witness, that he had never made her any such Promise, and offered to maintain publicly, the truth of what he professed, if the Queen would grant him leave. This writing being published, Cranmer was called before the Star-Chamber. He owned himself the Author, though it was published without his consent, and contrary to all Men's expectation, was dismissed without any Punishment. But the Queen was not satisfied, though she was advised to treat Cranmer with the same moderation, he himself had used whilst he was in Authority. The Queen herself owed her Life to him, which was saved merely by his Solicitation, when her Father Henry VIII. had deligned to put her to death (4). To this advice was opposed, That if the Queen treated with mildness the chief of the Hereticks, they would all grow obstinate and insolent, but the punishment of Cranmer would intimidate the Champions of Heresy. This latter advice was very agreeable to the Queen, who had conceived a mortal aversion to the Archbishop, by reason of the Sentence of Divorce pronounced by him against the Queen her Mother; this injury making a stronger Impression upon her, than the Service received from him afterwards. So, three days after, Cranmer being cited before the Council, was sent to the Tower, on an Accusation of Treason, and of publishing seditious Libels. Old Lattimer, who had been Bishop of Worcester in the Reign of Henry VIII. had been sent thither the day before.

Shortly after, the Court came to a resolution of sending away all Foreigners that were come on the publick Faith and Encouragement. Peter Martyr, and a Polish Professor named John a Lascio, were included in the number (5). This was the only Act of Mildness and Equity shewn in this Reign, with reference to Religion. But this sufficiently discovered what was intended against the English Protestants. The Court's daily Proceedings before the repeal of any one Law, so intimidated those who had Religion at heart, that great numbers passing for Frenchmen, withdrew out of England into foreign Countries (6). Those who made haste to escape the impending Storm, were wisest and happiest. For soon after, others, who had taken the same resolution, were arrested, by an Order sent to all the Ports, to suffer no Person to leave the Kingdom as a Frenchman, without a Pass-port from the Ambassador of France.

It was time now for the Queen to reward those who had done her Service. The Earl of Arundel was made Lord-Steward, Sir Edward Hastings, a Peer of the Realm, and some others who had early declared for the Queen, had Employments and Dignities conferred on them (7). But the Earl of Suffex (8), who had been her General, obtained an Honour unusual in England; namely, to be covered in the Presence of the Queen, as it is practised in Spain. He had his Letters Patents under the Great Seal, the 2d of October.

As the Parliament had been summoned to meet the 5th of October, it was necessary for the Queen to be crowned before. The Ceremony of the Coronation was performed the 11th of that Month, with the usual Solemnity, by the Bishop of Winchester, who forgot not one formality practised before the Reformation. The same day a general Pardon was published, but with so many exceptions, that few Persons could receive any benefit from it. All those who had been arrested before September were excepted by Name (9).

Then came out a Proclamation (10), by which the Queen discharged the Subsidies granted by the last Parliament to the King her Brother, for the payment of his debts (11). This was to gain the good Will of the ensuing Parliament, and render it subservient to her designs with respect to Religion. Before the Parliament met (12), the Archbishop of York was sent to the Tower on a general Accusation of several capital Crimes. Six days before, John Vesey, some time Bishop of Exeter, but deprived in the last Reign, was restored by an order of the Queen. This was with intent to strengthen the Catholic cause in the Upper-House.

The Court had resolved to abrogate all the Laws made in favour of the Reformation, and to restore the antient Religion. This was not to be done without the Concurrence of the Parliament. But if Elections had been left free, it would have been difficult, not to say impossible, for the Queen to succeed in her design. The number of the Reformed was without comparison greater than that of the Roman Catholics, and consequently the Elections would not probably be favorable to her. But besides the ordinary ways made use of by Kings to have Parliaments at their devotion, all sorts of Artifices, Frauds, and even

(3) Rapin by mistake says, he was fined a thousand Pounds, which was part of Montague's punishment. — Hales was first put into the Marshalsea; thence removed to the Counter, and after that to the Fleet; where he was so disordered at the report of the Cruelties which the Warden told him were contriving against those who would not change their Religion, that it turned his Brains, and he endeavoured to kill himself with a Penknife. He was afterwards set at liberty, but never recovered his Senses, so that at last he drowned himself. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 248.

The present Baron asserts this antient Right of his Family in the Reigns of the late and present King.

No. 45. VOL. I.

1557. Violences, were practised in this. As care was taken beforehand to change the Magistrates in the Cities and Counties, and there was not one almost but was a Roman Catholic, or had promised to be so, every thing tending to the Election of Catholic Representatives was countenanced. On the contrary, those who were suspected of an inclination to chuse Protestants; were discouraged by menaces, actions, imprisonments, on the most frivolous pretences. In several places, things were carried with such violence, that Protestants were not allowed to assist in the Assemblies where the Elections were to be made. In short, in places where it was not possible to use these direct means, by reason of the Superiority of the Reformed, the Sheriffs, devoted to the Court, made false Returns: That is, they sent to Court the names of some Persons as if lawfully elected, though they had but an inconsiderable number of Votes, or perhaps none at all. As the disputes arising from such Elections can only be decided by the House of Commons, it is easy to imagine, that a House composed of such Representatives failed not to approve all Elections favorable to the Court, and reject all others if the least contestable. This is one of the greatest Abuses belonging to Parliaments, and which is but too frequent whenever the Kingdom is rent into Factions. By these methods, the Court secured a House of Commons ready to comply with their Suggestions, and whose Members had an Interest in the change of Religion, or were indifferent to all religious Establishments.

As to the Upper-House, which cannot be thus modelled to the liking of the Court, the Queen probably laboured to successfully to engage it in her interests, that she found no opposition from the Peers. It is very strange, that the Lords, who but a few Months before were all Protestants, and had in their whole Body but seven or eight, who usually opposed the Laws made in Edward's Reign in favour of the Reformation, were become almost all zealous Catholics in Queen Mary's. I pretend not to decide in which Reign they dissembled their Sentiments; but it is too clear that in the one or the other they were guilty of a base and scandalous Prevarication. Mean while, to make this House still more complying, the Court took care beforehand to make changes amongst the Bishops in favour of their designs. Besides both the Archbishops and the Bishops of Gloster and Exeter, in actual Imprisonment, six others had been changed, as has been observed. Probably all the rest, excepting two, were for preferring their Sees to their Religion. The two I except, were Taylor Bishop of Lincoln, and Harley of Hereford, who were even thrust out of the House the first day, for refusing to kneel at the Mass. Such was Queen Mary's first Parliament, composed of a House of Commons, filled with the Creatures of the Court; and of a House of Lords, who, through Fear, Avarice or Ambition, dissembled their Sentiments, or, a few excepted, thought all religions alike. It is easy to foresee what is to be expected from such a Parliament.

In the first Session, which lasted but eight days, care was taken that nothing should be moved with regard to Religion. The only publick Act was a declaration of Treasons and Felonies, by which nothing was to be judged Treason, but what was in the Statute of the 25th of Edward III. or Felony, but what was so before the 1st of Henry VIII. This Act seemed unnecessary, since the like had been passed since Henry's death. But as some Crimes, not contained in the Statute of Edward III. had been since declared Felony, the intent of this was to abolish the late Acts. It is true, this might have been attended with another Inconvenience, namely, the discharge of several Persons then in prison, had not an express Exception been made of all who were committed before the last of September, who were likewise excepted out of the Queen's general Pardon.

By a private Act, the Attainder of the Marchioness of Exeter, executed in the Reign of Henry VIII. was reversed, and her Son the Earl of Devonshire restored to all his Honours. Then the Parliament was prorogued from the 21st to the 24th of October.

In the second Session, the designs of the Court were more open. The Divorce of the Queen's Mother was immediately repealed. This Act passed in fewer days than Henry had spent years in prosecuting the Divorce (1).

In the Preamble it was said, "That the Marriage of Henry with Queen Catherine was not contrary to the Law of God, and that Man ought not to put asunder what God hath joined : That King Henry's scruples had been suggested to him by malicious Persons, and supported by the decisions of some Universities, which had been previously forced by Corruption and Bribery : That Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury had rashly pronounced Sentence of Divorce, upon the Authority of these Decisions, and other groundless Conjectures, and by a blameable Presumption had thought himself more knowing than all the other Doctors." Upon these Foundations, the Parliament repealed the Sentence, and all the Acts to confirm it. Gardiner, chief Promoter of this Act, must have been past all shame, to make the Parliament talk thus of Henry's Divorce, in which he was principally concerned, even before Cranmer was known to the Court, which he had himself approved and advised, and at which he had assisted as Judge. But such was the character of the Man.

The Princess Elizabeth being thus again declared illegitimate by an Act which restored Mary, found a great change in the Behaviour of the Queen, who no longer showed her any affection. It is even pretended, that another secret cause alienated Mary from her, and that was, her Love for the Earl of Devonshire, whom she had some thoughts of marrying; but that this Lord, too indifferently perhaps, continued to pay his Respects to Elizabeth.

The 31st of October, the Lords sent down to the Commons a Bill for repealing Edward's Laws concerning Religion; and six days after the Commons sent it back with their Approbation. By this Act it was ordained, that no other Form of publick Worship should be allowed from the 20th of December, but what had been used in the last year of Henry VIII. This shows Gardiner's influence on the Parliament, since this Act precisely followed the Plan he had propoed.

Another Act passed, decreeing the severest Punishments against all who should molest any Preacher for his Sermons, or disturb him in any part of the divine Service. The same Punishments were ordained for those who should profane the Sacrament, or pull down Crosses, Crucifixes or Images.

The Commons at the same time sent up another Bill against those who came not to Church or the Sacraments, when the old Service should be set up. But the Lords thought not proper to go so far at once.

Shortly after, the Parliament revived an Act of the last Reign, forbidding any to the number of twelve or more, to meet with design to change the established Religion, and declaring the Offenders guilty of Felony, that is worthy of Death. This Act was directly contrary to that made by this very Parliament, to repeal all new Treasons and Felonies. But the pretence of Religion covered all.

In this Session the Act of Attainder against the Duke of Norfolk in Henry's Reign, was reversed, on pretence that all the necessary formalities were not observed (2).

These were the most remarkable Transactions of this first Parliament, which, in few days, overturned all that had been done with regard to Religion in the Reign of Edward VI (3). King Henry's Laws were not yet to be touched, because they had difficulties concerning which the Pope was first to be consulted.

The 3d of November (4), the Parliament still sitting, Jane Grey, Guilford Dudley her Husband, two other Sons of the Duke of Northumberland (5), and Cranmer Archibishop of Canterbury, were brought to their Tryal. They all confessed their indictments and received Sentence of death as Traytors (6) Cranmer's Sentence rendered him incapable of possessing any Benefice, and consequently his Archbishopsrick was void in law. But two reasons obliged the Queen to dispense with the ordinary Forms, and leave Cranmer, though condemn'd, in possession of his dignity. The first was, that intending to restore the Clergy to all their Privileges, he was resolv'd this Prelate should be canonically degraded; but this could not be done till the Laws of Henry VIII. were repealed. The second was, that by a refinement of Self-love, he was willing to pardon Cranmer his Treason, to make the World believe, he proceeded against him from no motives of private Revenge. But at the same time the de-

257. If the Queen did in earnest forgive him the Treason, it might be owing to this Appeal: That is, if the Queen the Treason in earnest, for the taking away his Life afterwards, leaves it a very disputable Point, whether this Injury, added to the Divorce of her Mother, or his Reliance on, wrought mortally on his Reconcilings. — The Attendants of Cranmer, the Duke of Northumberland, Marquis of Northampton, &c. was confirmed afterwards by the Parliament; and the Bill for it was read in the House of Commons the 27th, and 28th, of November, and December 4. See Journ. Comm. and Journal of the Proceedings of the House of Commons in the 15th, p. 361.

1553. voted him to death as a Heretick, as soon as any Laws should be made upon that subject: as if the only acted out of pure zeal for Religion. Therefore at present, the Archbishop's revenues were only sequestred, and himself detained in Prison till a proper time for his execution.

Since Mary's accession to the Throne, he had appeared to be wholly employed in these publick Transactions. But at the same time, he was forming secret designs which were not known, till ripe for execution. The News of King Edward's death was no sooner spread in the World, than the Court of Rome conceived hopes of re-uniting England to the Holy See, and even began to project it. Cardinal Dandini, the Pope's Legate at Brussels, as of himself, sent Commendane, afterwards Cardinal, to found Mary's Inclinations. Commendane being unknown in England, easily concealed himself under a borrowed name, and repairing to London, obtained a private Audience of the Queen (1). This was soon after her coming to that City, since the Envoy was present at the Duke of Northumberland's execution, which was on the 22d of August. At this Audience the Queen told Commendane, the designed the restoration of the papal Authority in England, and prayed him to intercede with the Pope, to send Cardinal Pole as Legate. But the intimated to him, that the discovery of this Secret would blast the design. The Pope communicating to the Confraternity his Intentions of sending Pole into England, found at first great opposition. The Cardinals feared to expose the Honour of the Holy See, in sending a Legate without a solemn embassy from the Queen. But the Pope telling them, he knew more of this Affair than he thought fit to communicate, they complied with his Proposal.

At the same time, the Emperor was projecting a marriage for his Son Philip with Queen Mary. Gardiner was in the Secret, whether it arose at first from him, or was only communicated to him by the Emperor. However that be, this Prelate neglected no endeavors to accomplish it. The News of Pole's Nomination to the Legateship was equally disagreeable to the Emperor and Gardiner. Commendane had doubtless divulged at Rome Queen Mary's Question to him, whether Pole might not have a dispensation to marry? This occasioned a belief, that it was her intention to make him her Husband. The Emperor being informed of this, and apprehensive that Pole's presence might obstruct the design he was meditating, resolved to use his endeavors to prevent this Legation, or at least to retard it as long as possible. On the other hand, Gardiner could not without the utmost concern think of Pole's Arrival, who might intercept his views upon the See of Canterbury, and perhaps the Smiles of the Queen herself. And indeed there was danger, that if this Cardinal, who neither loved nor esteemed him, should insinuate himself into the Queen's favour, as it was very likely, he would use his credit to ruin him. He was therefore to find some expedient to keep him at a distance, and none was more natural, than an insinuation to the Queen, that this Cardinal's zeal for the Holy See would prejudice the affairs of Religion in England: That the People were first to be managed and persuaded to own the Papal Authority, to which they were extremely averse: That besides, Pole was not Enemy enough to the Protestants; and Religion, in the present conjuncture, required to be conducted by other maxims than those of that Cardinal. The Emperor, on the other side, believing it his interest to keep Pole where he was, wrote the same thing to the Queen, and represented to her, that Pole would ruin her affairs, let her Intentions be ever so good.

In fine, he proposed her Marriage with his Son, and supported his Proposal with all the Reasons most apt to persuade her. Above all, he set forth the necessity of a foreign power in restoring Religion in England, or at least of an alliance capable to inspire terror into those who should oppose her designs: That an alliance with the Emperor and Spain was doubtless most advantageous, as France being able to form projects in favour of the young Queen of Scots, who was to marry the Dauphin, was in interest concerned to raise and foment disturbances in England. Mary was much pleased with this Proposal, which was probably made her about the beginning of November. Besides a zeal for Religion, which might induce Gardiner to second the Emperor's designs, he saw a considerable advantage for himself; namely, the securing his own Credit, since Philip would be indebted to him for his Marriage. Mean while, Pole was to be kept at a distance till the Pope's Marriage was concluded; and this the Emperor did first by his own authority, in detaining him in his Dominions (2); but afterwards got the Queen to send an Express (3), to acquaint him that the interests of Religion required a stop in his Journey, because the Nation was not yet disposed to own the Papal Authority.

While the Legate was thus detained in Germany or the Low-Countries, he tried several times to obtain leave to continue his Journey: but it was still in vain. He knew not to whom this usage was owing, and perhaps was never fully informed. However, he held a constant correspondence by Letters with the Queen on the affairs of Religion, but his Counsels were secretly opposed either by the Emperor or Gardiner. It was his opinion, that, laying aside all ceremony, the Kingdom should immediately be reconciled to the Holy See. Gardiner, on the contrary, believed, the Marriage ought to be concluded before the Reconciliation was mentioned, that the consideration of so powerful an alliance might awe those who were inclined to stir. He thought Pole, and would have had others think him, a weak Man, a shallow Politician, and of no use in the Cabinet. Pole, on the other hand, believed Gardiner a very improper Person to direct the affairs of Religion, because, in his opinion, he relied too much on his Intrigues and the arm of flesh. Their little esteem of each other ended at last in an open enmity.

The design of the Queen's Marriage was not conducted with sufficient secrecy, to keep it from the Commons. They were so alarmed, that they sent their Speaker with twenty of their Members, to pray the Queen not to marry a Foreigner. This convinced the Queen, she could expect no more Supplies from the Commons, if she refused to satisfy them in that point. But as she had no such intention, she chose to dissolve the Parliament (4). Gardiner improved this conjuncture, to the obtaining Conditions from the Emperor, which he could not otherwise have expected. He represented to him, that the English were so averse to this Marriage, that the worst was to be feared, unless he complied with two things absolutely necessary. The first was, his consent, that the Treaty of Marriage should contain Terms so advantageous to England, as to silence the most zealous opposers. The second was, his remitting considerable Sums to gain those who would be wanted to curb the People, or who could most easily induce them to rebel. The Emperor not doubting of Gardiner's zeal for his interest, approved the advice, and left it entirely to him to prescribe the Conditions of the Marriage; and moreover, put into his hands twelve hundred thousand Crowns, to be disposed of as he saw fit (5). These particulars were printed in a little Book, in form of a Petition to the Queen, by the English Exiles at Strasburgh. The Author added farther, that Gardiner denied common Justice in the Court of Chancery to those Persons, who would not engage to second the Queen's intentions.

While the Parliament was assembled, the Convocation held its Sessions according to custom. It is not known whether any Bishops, consecrated in the time of King Edward, appeared in the Upper-House. If any did, the number could be but small, and of such too, as the Lords vouchsafed to receive into their House; that is, Men who were not likely to oppose any measures. Care was taken to fill the Lower-House with Persons entirely devoted to Transubstantiation. The Court; so that only six Members (6) had the inclination or courage to oppose the decision made in favour of Transubstantiation (7). These six Members demanded a regular Disputation on this Subject, which was granted. But three of them declined the Dispute (8), well foreseeing what would be the result. The other three stood their ground: so a Disputation was had (9). But the Roman Catholics, upon want of better Arguments, received those of their Advocates with Hootings, Reproaches, Menaces, and conti-

Of this the Emperor made so little a secret, that when, a year after, some Towns in Germany, that had lent a part of this Money, desired to be repaid; he answered them, that he had lent his Son 1200,000 Crowns to marry him to the Queen of England, and had yet received of him only 300,000 Crowns, but he had paid Security for the rest, and the Merchants were bound to pay him 100,000 l. quished. This at least is the account given by the Pro-

1554. In the beginning of the year 1554, a magnificent Am-bassy arrived at London from the Emperor, with the Count of Egmont (2), at the head of it, to settle the Articles of the Marriage. The Queen intrusted Gardiner with the management of this Negotiation (3), or rather with the care of drawing the Treaty, since, probably, every thing material was agreed before the arrival of the Ambassadors.
That able Politician had a double design. The first was, to have such Conditions inserted in the Treaty, as the Parliament might approve. The second was, to exclude the Spaniards from having any share in the Government.

The Emperor complied with every thing, in the belief, no doubt, that his Son would find ways to elude the observation of the Articles, which should restrain him too much.
To be convinced that this was his thought (4), let it only be considered, that so able a Politician as Charles, would never have parted with twelve hundred thousand Crowns, to procure for his Son the empty Title of King of England. For indeed the Treaty, as will appear, promised him no more. In all probability, Gardiner had the same thoughts with the Emperor. But the business was to dazzle the Parliament with Conditions advantageous to the Nation, for whose Interests though he affected a great zeal, he was probably but little concerned for what might happen after his death. Mean while, he acquired a high Reputation, the Publick ascribing to his Capacity and Prudence the Terms of this Marriage, which seemed to secure England from all Philip's attempts. The principal Articles of this Treaty, which was signed the 12th of January 1554, a few days after the arrival of the Ambassadors, were as follows:

That Philip, in virtue of this Marriage, should, jointly with Queen Mary, enjoy the Title of King of England, while the Marriage subsisted; saving always the Rights, Laws, Privileges, and Customs of the Kingdom of England. It was likewise stipulated, that the Queen should have the sole disposal of the Revenues of the Kingdom, the nomination to all Employments, Offices, and Bene-fices, which should be conferred on the natural Subjects of her Majesty, and no others.

That the Queen likewise should bear the Titles belonging to her Husband.

That her Dowry should be sixty thousand Pounds of Flemish Money, forty Gros each (5), of which forty thousand should be assigned to her upon Spain, and twenty thousand upon Brabant, Flanders, Hainault, and Holland.
That she should enjoy this Dowry in the same manner it was enjoyed by Margaret, Sister of Edward IV, and Wife of Charles Duke of Burgundy.

That the Children born of this Marriage, should inherit their Mother's Estate, according to the custom of the respective Countries.

With relation to the Father's Estate, it was agreed, That the Archduke Charles, Son of Philip, should succeed to the Kingdoms of Spain, Naples, Sicily, the Duchy of Milan, and all other Properties and Domains situate in Lombardy or Italy; but in default of Charles and his Issue, the eldest Son of Philip and Mary should succeed to the same Sovereignities.

That the first born of Philip and Mary should inherit Burgundy and the Low-Countries, from which the Archduke Charles should be excluded, as the Children of Philip and Mary were excluded from Spain and Italy.

That the younger Sons and Daughters of Mary and Philip should have their Appenages and Portions assigned them in England, without prejudice however to what they might expect from Philip their Father, or Charles, their Grandfather, in the Low-Countries, or Burgundy.

That in case only Daughters proceeded from this Marriage, the eldest should succeed to Burgundy and the Low-Countries, provided that with the consent of the Infante Don Charles, her Brother, she married a Husband out of these Countries, or the Dominions of the Queen her Mother. That on her refusal or neglect to perform this Covenant, Prince Charles should preserve his Right to the said Countries, with Obligation however to assign a Portion to his Sister, both out of Spain and the Low-Countries.

That if Prince Charles died without Issue, the eldest Son or Daughter of Philip and Mary, should succeed as well to Spain and Italy, as the other Dominions.

Lastly, it was expressly agreed, that in all the fore-mentioned Cases, those Children who should succeed to either the paternal or maternal Estates, should leave them possessed of all Laws, Rights, Privileges, and Customs belonging to the respective Countries, and should administer the Government by the Natives of the said Countries.

A CLAUSE annexed to the Treaty.

By this Clause it was expressly covenanted, that before the Confirmation of the Marriage, Philip should solemnly swear to the observance of the following Articles:

That he would retain no Domestick, who was not either an Englishman, or Subject of the Queen, nor bring any Foreigner into England, to give uneasiness to the English.
That if any of his Retinue transgressed this Article, he should be punished in such manner as should be thought convenient.

That Philip would make no alteration in the Laws, Rights, Statutes, and Customs of England.

That he would never take the Queen out of her own Dominions, unless at her own particular request; nor carry out of England any of the Children born of this Marriage, without the consent of the Nobility.

That if the Queen should die first, without Children, he would pretend to no Right upon England, or its dependencies, but leave the Succession to the rightful Heir.

That he would carry out of the Kingdom no Jewels, or other valuable things: Nor alienate any thing belonging to the Crown, or suffer any Person whatsoever to seize them.

That England should never by virtue of this Marriage, be concerned directly or indirectly in any War depending between France and Spain; but that the Alliance between England and France should subsist and remain in full force.

That he would not give any occasion of Rupture between France and England.

It would be very difficult to discover what advantages England could receive from this Marriage, if the Interests of the Sovereign and his Ministers were not commonly confounded with those of the Kingdom, though frequently very opposite. The Court had in view the Restoration of the Roman Catholic Religion in England, and therefore believed they wanted the assistance of Spain. On the other hand, this Marriage was advantageous to the Chancellor, who strengthened his Credit with Philip's protection. But at the same time England ran a great risk of falling under the dominion of Philip, who, probably, meant not to be bound with Chains of Parchment.

The day after the Treaty was signed (6), the Queen granted a Pardon to the Marquis of Northampton, who had been condemned with the Duke of Northumberland.
We have before seen that about the end of the Reign of Edward VI, the Court had taken measures to prevent the Company of the German Merchants, called the Still-yard, from engrossing the whole Woollen Trade, in prejudice to the English, as till then had been practiced. For this purpose the Parliament had laid a heavy Duty upon the Goods, whether exported or imported by that Company; and this Act was renewed in Mary's first Parliament. But the beginning of this year, the Queen to gratify the Hanse Towns, suspended the execution of these Acts for three years, and discharged the Company of German Merchants from the payment of the extraordinary Taxes imposed upon them, all Acts to the contrary notwithstanding. This was the first effect of the Queen's Alliance with the Emperor.

After the Treaty of the Queen's marriage with Philip was made publick, complaints and murmurs were every where heard. The Protestants in particular believed themselves lost, and feared to see erected in England a Spanish Inquisition. But they were not the only murmurers. Independently of Religion, the greatest part of the Nation was not free from fears of King Philip's introducing the Spanish Tyranny into England, of which the Indies, the Low-Countries, the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the Duchy of Milan, afforded recent instances.
In a word, few Persons could believe that the Emperor had agreed to the Articles stipulated in the Treaty, with any design to observe them. At last, these murmurs grew into a conspiracy against the Queen, of which the marriage was either the cause or pretence. The Duke of Suffolk, Sir Thomas Wyatt (1), Sir Peter Carew, formed the design of a general Insurrection. Carew was to act in Cornwall, Wyatt in Kent, and the Duke of Suffolk in Warwickshire, which is in the Center of the Kingdom.

Carew managed so ill, that his Plot was discovered (2), and one of his Complices arrested, before he had concerted his affairs. This sent him into France, and Wyatt, upon his flight, hastened the execution of his enterprize, tho' it was the design of the Conspirators to wait the arrival of Philip for a more plausible colour to their Insurrection. Wyatt therefore resolving to push his point, though he was yet unprepared, went to Maidstone with a few followers, and gave out, he took arms to prevent England from being invaded. Afterwards he marched to Rochester, from whence he writ to the Sheriff to desire his assistance. But the Sheriff instead of espousing his cause, requir'd him to lay down his Arms, and assembled Forces to oppose him.

This Rebellion alarmed the Court (3), where nothing was ready to disperse it, the Queen having dismissed her Forces, when the thought herself out of danger. Wherefore she sent a Herald to Wyatt with a full pardon, if he would lay down his Arms in twenty four Hours. But he refused the offer of pardon. Mean time, the Court was so unprepared, that the Duke of Norfolk was sent with only six hundred of the City Trained-Bands (4), commanded by an Officer named Bret. Whilst this was doing, the Sheriff of Kent (5), as he was going to join the Duke of Norfolk, met and defeated Knevet, who with some Troops was marching to join Wyatt, and killed sixty of his Men. This ill Success alarmed Wyatt, that he had now resolved to consult his own Safety (6), when an unexpected Accident infused him with fresh courage. Sir George Harper, one of Wyatt's Adherents pretending to desert him, went to the Duke of Norfolk, and so artfully managed the Trained-Bands, that they took part with the Rebels, and quitting the Duke, joined Wyatt (7).

With this Reinforcement, and his other Troops, making together a Body of four thousand Men, Wyatt march'd towards London (8). He met near Depford two Messengers from the Queen, who in her Name ask'd what would content him. He demanded the Tower and the Queen's Person to be put into his hands, and the Council to be chang'd, as he should think proper. This demand being rejected, the Queen repaired (9) to Guild-Hall, and acquainted the Magistrates with Wyatt's answer. She then spoke of her marriage, and told them she had done nothing in it, but by the advice of her Council. And, to give them a proof of the confidence she reposed in them, she resolved to stay in the City, tho' many advised her to withdraw to the Tower (10).

Wyatt in the mean time continued his march, and reach'd the Borough of Southwark the 3d of February, expecting to enter the City without any difficulty. But the Bridge being strongly barricaded and guarded, he was obliged to march along the Thames to Kingston (11), ten miles from London. Here he found the Bridge broken, and spent some hours in repairing it. He then pass'd to the other side with his Army, increas'd now to near six thousand Men. After that, he continued his march to London, and, after some time lost in repairing one of his broken Carriages, reach'd Hyde-Park about nine in the Morning, the 7th of February. The time uselessly spent in repairing the Carriage, rendered his undertaking abortive. For in that interval Harper, who had been so serviceable in bringing over the Trained-Bands, deserted, and posting to Court, discovered his intentions to march through Westminster, and enter the City by Ludgate. This advice came seasonably to the Earl of Pembroke and Lord Clinton, who, at the head of some Troops, had resolved to engage him as he entered the City. But observing, he was entangling himself in the Streets where he could not extend his Troops, they thought it better to let him pass, after Orders given to shut the Gate through which he designed to enter.

Park, and entering Westminster (12), pursued his march through the Strand, in his way to Ludgate. As he advanced, care was taken to cut off his Retreat by Barricades and Men placed at all the Avenues. He believed himself now at the height of his wishes, when he found the Gate into the City shut against him. He then first discovered his danger, and perceiving it was impossible to retire, lost all courage. As he was endeavouring to return, a Herald (13) came to him, and exhorting him not to sacrifice the lives of so many followers, he surrendered quietly (14), and was sent to Prison. This unfortunate Man, who doubtless had but a slender Capacity, foolishly imagined, without having good assurances, that the City of London would declare in his favour, and this proved his ruin. If his measures had been better taken, the Queen and her Ministers would have been greatly embarrassed, at a time when the Government, weak as it was, had already created many enemies. But the ill success of this enterprize so strengthened the Queen's authority, that henceforward she found no more resistance. After the taking Stow. of Wyatt, his Men being dispersed, were taken at pleasure, and filled the Prisons.

While Wyatt was acting in Kent and London, the Duke of Suffolk, had made but small progress in the County of Warwick. He would not have been so much as suspected, had not an Express been seized, sent to him by Wyatt, to inform him of the reasons which had obliged him to hasten his undertaking, and to pray him to be as expeditious as possible. Upon this advice, the Earl of Huntington had Orders to arrest him. The Duke was informed, and, being not yet secure of fifty Horse, chose to conceal himself in the House of one of his Domesticks (15), who basely betrayed and delivered him to the Earl of Huntington, by whom he was conveyed to the Tower, the 11th of February. Such was the success of this Conspiracy. Had it been managed by abler heads, it might have been attended with great consequences. But few Men of reputation cared to put themselves under the Conduct of such Leaders. If it had caused only the death of the principal Actors, they might have been said to meet the just Reward of their folly. But it produced two considerable effects, one fatal to an illutrious and innocent Person, and the other, to all Protestants. Not that Religion had any share in this Conspiracy, Wyatt himself being a Roman Catholic, and the Queen concerned in her Proclamation, not accusing the Protestants, though since, some Historians have been pleased to brand them. But as the Queen's authority was strengthened by the ill success of this undertaking, she turned it entirely to the ruin of the Reformed, and the Reformation. The Duke of Suffolk being concerned in the Conspiracy, the Court easily understood his design was to replace his Daughter, the Lady Jane, on the Throne, and this determined the Queen to sacrifice her to her own safety.

Two days after the taking of Wyatt, a Message was sent to Jane Grey and her Husband to bid them prepare for death. Jane, as she had long expected it, received the Message with great resolution. Mean while, Dr. Beckman, who brought it, and had orders to exhort her to change her Religion, preposterously imagining the desired some time to be determined, obtained three days respite of her execution. But she let him know, it was no satisfaction to her. She was well assured, the jealousy of the Government would not suffer her to live, and therefore she had employed the whole time of her Confinement in a preparation for Death. Some have believed, that without this last Attempt of the Duke of Suffolk, the Queen would have spared his Daughter. But as afterwards such numbers were put to death for their Religion, it is not likely, that Jane, so firmly attached to the Protestant Religion, would have been more mercifully used than the rest, even though the Queen could have prevailed with herself to pardon her Treason. Be this as it will, she was executed the 12th of February, after seeing the headless body of her Husband pass by her, as he was brought back from execution to be interred in the Chapel of the Tower. She shew'd to the last moment a great constancy and piety, and an immoveable adherence to the Reformation, owning however herself guilty of a great Sin, in accepting a Crown which be-

Next, Wyat was brought to his Trial, where he offered to make great discoveries if his Life might be saved. He accused even the Princess Elizabeth, and the Earl of Devonshire (2) as concerned in the Conspiracy. This did not prevent his Sentence, but only gained him a respite of two Months, because of the hopes of drawing from him considerable discoveries. Mean time the Earl of Devonshire was committed to the Tower (3), and the Princess Elizabeth, though indispensible, was brought to London, and closely confined in White-Hall (4), without liberty to speak to any Person. On the 11th of March following she was sent to the Tower.

The 14th and 15th of February, Bret, Commander of Wyat's Forces, and fifty eight more, were hanged. Some days after (5), six hundred Prisoners, with Halters about their necks, waited on the Queen, and received their pardon. But this was not capable to efface the impression made in Men's minds, by so many executions, for a Conspiracy in which was no effusion of Blood. The fault was thrown on Gardiner, who was accused of leading the Queen to an excessive Jealousy of her Authority, and the most extreme rigour. An Affair happened at the same time, which also greatly alarmed and filled the People with fears of the Queen's intending to rule with too extensive a power.

Sir Nicholas Throgmorton being accused, and tried as an Accomplice in the Conspiracy, was acquitted by his Jury for want of sufficient proof to condemn him. For this the Jury was severely fined. So the Juries were deprived of the liberty of judging according to their consciences, and instead of being governed by proofs, they were to examine how the Court stood affected to the Prisoners, and by that determine their Verdict. This rigour exercised upon the Jury, was fatal to Sir John Throgmorton, who was found guilty upon the same evidence on which his Brother had been acquitted.

The respite granted to Wyat had a quite contrary effect to what the Court expected. This unhappy Man, who had accused Elizabeth and the Earl of Devonshire only in hopes of a Pardon, finding he must die, fully cleared them in his second Examination. And for fear his last Declaration should be suppressed, he renewed it at the Place of execution (6). As there was no other proof against them, and their Accuser himself had acquitted them with his last breath, no Process could be formed against them, though Gardiner passionately desired the death of the Princess. Nay, it is very probable, the Queen would have gladly consented to it, could she have supported her rigour with any colour of Justice (7).

After Elizabeth had suffered a long and severe Imprisonment in the Tower, she was removed to Woodstock. This was not intended as a favour, but to take her out of the hands of the Lord Chandos, Lieutenant of the Tower, who had treated her with great humanity and distinction. She was at Woodstock committed to the Custody of Sir Henry Beningfield (8), who paying her no such respect as she had received from the Lord Chandos, gave her room to suspect a design against her Life. It is even pretended that certain Persons officiously undertook to murder her, in the expectation of pleasing the Queen and her Ministers; but that the strictness with which she was kept denied them all access.

The Queen's
Orders a-

Act. Pub.
XV. p. 376.

The disturbances occasioned by Wyat's Conspiracy being entirely appeased, the Queen resumed her first design of an utter destruction of the Reformation. Though to this the Authority of Parliament was necessary, she failed not to anticipate the design by her own Authority, in virtue of her Supremacy which herself detested, and yet scrupled not to use against the Protestants! For this purpose, she gave Instructions to the Bishops to visit their Dioceses. Their Instructions drawn by Gardiner, contained a bitter Narration of all the pretended disorders introduced into the Church in the Reign of Edward. She afterwards gave the Chancellor a particular order to purge the Church of all married Bishops and Priests.

Some days after (9), the Queen granted a special Communion to Gardiner, and five others (10), to deprive four Bishops who were married, namely, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of St. David's, Chyfter and Bristol, and all in actual Confinement (11). Two days after, the same Commissioners were ordered to deprive the Bishops of Lincoln, Gloucester, and Hersford, for having believed themselves ill, and preached erroneous Doctrines. The Pretence to deprive these Bishops by a bare order of the Queen, was taken from the Letters Patents of King Edward, in which it was provided, that they should hold their Bishopricks so long only as they behaved well, and therefore it was no injustice to deprive them, since their Conduct was displeasing. This was the Pretence, but the true reason was, the Court's desire to fill these Sees with their Creatures, before the meeting of the Parliament. As to the inferior Clergy, Dr. Burnet pretends, that of sixteen thousand then in England, twelve thousand were turned out for having Wives (12). And indeed in the Collection of the Public Acts, we meet with an infinite number of Prelations to Livings, which sufficiently show the Alterations made in the Church. Mean time, in consequence of the Act of Parliament, the Mals was every where reformed, with the Liturgy used in the end of Henry VIII's Reign. Such was the Constitution of the State and Church when the new Parliament met the 2d of April 1554 (13).

The care of the Court to have a Parliament at their devotion, had not been less than in the foregoing year. Nay it was so much more successful, as Gardiner had money in his hands to gain the Electors and Representatives. The Court had a double design, the first to have the Queen's Marriage approved; the second to restore the Pope's Authority. For the first, it was not sufficient to have Representatives well inclined to the intended Alterations in Religion, it was farther requisite, they should be little zealous for the Good of their Country, since the Queen's Marriage put England in evident danger of becoming one day a Province to Spain. For the second it was necessary, not only that most of the Commons should be convinced of the Romish Doctrines, but also should be really Papists, that is, perfwaded that Religion could not subsist without a Pope. Now the Men of this opinion were not very numerous among the Roman Catholics. There were many more, who believing Transubstantiation, Invocation of Saints, Adoration of Images, &c. were however perfwaded that the Papal Authority was by no means necessary to the Church, and were well content with its Abolishment. To have Persons returned proper for the designs of the Court, or to gain those who were not so compliant, it was that Gardiner used all his Interest with the Emperor and Queen to promise Penfions. This was done with so little caution and secrecy, that with regard to a great number of Members, their Penfions were known. The Parliament when met, was so obsequious to the Queen's Will, that she was sometimes obliged to check the impetuous Zeal of the Commons.

The first Act passed in this Session gave occasion to many reflections: but the intent of it was unknown till long after, in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, when a certain Person, let into the secret, discovered it to the Earl of Leicester. The Bill was brought in by the Speaker. It imported, "That as the Laws declarative of the Royal Prerogatives had been made in favour of Kings, it might be pretended that the Queen had no right to them: it was therefore declared, That these Prerogatives did belong to the Crown, whether it was in the hands of

III. p. 537. Burnet, Tom. III. p. 287. Had the Queen immediately dispensed Gardiner, the might have been thought innocent of so barbarous a design. But the Confidence and Trust in which he continued till his Death, gave a Suspicion at least that he would not have been displeased with an Obedience to the Warrant, which could have denied her Knowledge of, as it wanted her Hand, and perhaps obtained a belief by a Sacrifice of the Counsellors concerned in it. Queen Elizabeth herself afterwards took that method in the affair of Mary Queen of Scots.

(12) The Queen had at first summoned this Parliament to meet at Oxford, because that Place had showed itself very obedient and forward in restoring the Papal Religion; and London, on the contrary, did not much favour her Proceedings about Religion, and had given her some Jealousy, during Wyat's Insurrections. But she altered her Mind. Hollingshead, p. 1102.

"Male or Female: and whatsoever the Law did limit or appoint for the King, was of right also due to the Queen, who was declared to have as much Authority as any of her Progenitors." This Bill occasioned some Debates in the House of Commons. Some feared that the pretence of securing to the Queen her just Rights, covered a design of enlarging them beyond their just bounds, and that the last Clause, that she had as much Authority as any of her Progenitors, might encourage her to exercise the same Power as William the Conqueror, who stripped the English of their Lands, to bestow them on Foreigners. The Queen's Marriage with the Prince of Spain still increased this suspicion, by the fear of having a despotick Government, like that of Spain, introduced into England. It was therefore thought proper to alter the words of the Act, in such manner as they should secure to the Queen all her legal Rights, without giving her an opportunity to usurp such as were not so.

The first Motion to it, Burnet, Tom. II. p. 277.

Occasion of it, Burnet.

Burnet, Hollingb. styro.

The Bishoprick of Durham restored to its antient Rights, and the Act of suppression repealed. The Duke of Suffolk's Sentence confirmed, and the Treaty of Marriage.

Burnet.

The Court found no fault with this Correction. Gardiner, who promoted the Bill, had no intention to make the Queen absolute, but to prevent Philip from seizing the Government on pretence of Sex. The example of Henry VII. furnished a just cause of Fear. That Prince had at first no pretension to the Crown, but what flowed from his Marriage with Elizabeth, Daughter of Edward IV. However, when he afterwards found himself sufficiently strong, he resolved to reign in his own right, as Heir to the House of Lancaster. Philip might have done the same thing, as defended from the same House. So that here Gardiner consulted at once the Interest of the Nation, and his own. It was the Nation's Interest, that Philip should not have any opportunity of seizing the Government. Gardiner's likewise required the same, because if Philip should once become master of England, the administration of affairs would probably be put into the hands of Spaniards, and consequently, Gardiner be excluded. In a word, the true occasion of Gardiner's Bill was this: A certain Person had contrived a model of Government, according to which the Queen was to declare herself a Conqueror: or assert, that as she came to the Crown by common Law, she was not bound by the Laws which limited the regal Power, because these Restrictions were made for Kings and not Queens. This Plan was communicated to the Imperial Ambassador, who put it into the Queen's hands, and prayed her to read it with attention. The Queen doubtless read, and then delivered it to her Chancellor to examine, and give his opinion upon it. He thereby saw what was the aim of the Spaniards, and set before the Queen the consequences and peril of following, or even listening to such Counsels. In a word, he so managed her, that she threw the Project into the fire. It was not without reason that Gardiner began to be alarmed with respect to the Spaniards. Besides, that such Projects as this, gave him just cause to suspect them of some design upon the Liberties of England, there was another thing that confirmed his suspicions. This was, the Spaniards had studiously published a Genealogy of Philip, which derived him from a Daughter of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, and Son of Edward III. Gardiner therefore thought it high time to break the Spanish measures; and this he undertook to do by the fore-mentioned Act. But he took particular care not to be known for the Author, for fear of forfeiting Philip's favour (1).

In this Session the Bishoprick of Durham, suppressed in the end of the late Reign, was restored to its antient Rights, and the Act of suppression repealed.

The Sentence against the Duke of Suffolk, and the fifty eight Men executed for the late Rebellion was likewise confirmed.

Lastly, the Parliament approved the Treaty of Marriage between the Queen and Philip. But as Gardiner began to fear the Spaniards, he so ordered, that the Parliament in approving the Treaty, explained more clearly, and enlarged the Articles, by which the Government of the Kingdom was declared to belong only to the Queen.

No more was desired of the Parliament in this Session (2). If the Zeal of the Commons to please the Court had been indulged, many rigorous Acts against the Reformation and the Reformed would have been made. But the Lords, by the Court's direction, threw out the Bills sent by the Commons on this subject. Without doubt, the Ministers thought it not proper to begin the persecution before the Consummation of the Queen's Marriage, lest some unforeseen accident should retard the Prince of Spain's arrival. For this reason the Parliament was dissolved (3) the 25th of May, after the Queen's principal desire, the approbation of her Marriage, was obtained.

At the end of this Session of Parliament, the Court thought proper to interrupt the Convocation, in order for a new Conference to be held at Oxford, concerning the Eucharist. The Protestants complained publicly of the treatment they had met with, in the dispute held at London. From hence occasion was taken to lay a new snare for them, by appointing another Disputation, in the presence of the University of Oxford, as if more justice was intended them. But this was in effect only to give them a fresh mortification. If the Court had meant to act with sincerity, they would never have chosen, as they did, for managers of the dispute on the Protestants side, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, all Prisoners in the Tower, and the two first, without controversy, the most learned and able Men of their Party. But as it was resolved to confound them, otherwise than by reasons and arguments, the Court was glad to expose these three grave Prelates to the insults of their Enemies. They were therefore removed to Oxford (4), to dispute against some of the Romish Clergy, at the head of whom was Wylton, Prolocutor of the Lower-House of Convocation. This Disputation or Conference was managed like the former at London (5). The three Protestant Bishops were forced to be silent, by reason of the continual interruptions and noises which hindered them from being heard, whence it was inferred they were vanquished. Those who are curious to see the particulars of this dispute, will find them in the History of the Reformation of England. But to mortify these Bishops was not thought sufficient. The Dispute, which lasted three days, being ended, they were summoned to abjure their pretended errors, and upon their refusal, excommunicated (6).

Prince Philip being inform'd that nothing now retarded the Consummation of his marriage, left the Grain the 16th of July, and arrived the 19th at Southampton (7). At his landing he drew his Sword, and carried it naked some time. This mysterious Action was variously interpreted. Some said it signified that he would draw his Sword in defence of the Nation. Others believed, that he intimated to the English by this action, that he intended to govern them by the Sword. The Magistrates of Southampton presenting him with the Keys of their Town, he took and returned them without speaking a word. This gravity displeas'd the English, who used to be treated more affably by their Sovereigns. The Queen met him at Winchester, where Gardiner married them the 25th of July. The same day they were proclaimed King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem, and by many other Titles (8). The Emperor had lately made a present to his Son of the Kingdoms of Naples and Jerusalem. Philip was but twenty nine years of Age, and Mary was thirty eight. Many Chests of Bullion (9), brought by Philip, were landed, which no doubt were a great part of the one million, two hundred thousand Crowns, promised to be sent into England by the Emperor; but which he was not inclined to part with before the Consummation of the marriage. This infused fresh zeal for the Queen's interest, into those who had before been gained by Gardiner (10).

Philip, desirous to acquire the affection of the English, obtained pardon for Eucharist, and some others. Gardiner was the chief. Gardiner was for removing her out of the way at any rate. He apprehended, if she succeeded Mary, she would be led by her own interest to subvert whatever should be done in this reign, with respect to religion. Besides, it was known, that notwithstanding all her caution, she was reformed in her heart. Now, as it was resolved to persecute the Protestants, there was some room to fear an insurrection, under colour of asserting her rights. The Queen herself was not far from Gardiner's Sentiments; but Philip interceded for Elizabeth, and freed

1554. in this last sense, but was willing to give room to believe, that he understood it in the first. This power appearing insufficient to the Emperor, and the Court of England, the Pope gave a third not less equivocal, and which, under a heap of general Terms, contained certain restrictions, which left him free to act afterwards as he should please: for his present business was to blind the Possessors and the Parliament, in giving them a seeming satisfaction. This last power ran: "That whereas, before, he had given power to his Legate to transact with the Possessors of the Church's Goods, and to discharge them from the Rents they had unjustly received, or the Moveables they had wasted; nevertheless, to the end that the entire reduction of England might become so much the more easy, by the greater hopes which the Pope gave of condescension and compliance on this occasion, (unwilling as he was to keep back the great work of the Salvation of so many Souls, by any human considerations, and desirous to imitate the good Father going out to meet the prodigal Son) he gave power to his Legate, agreeably to the confidence he reposed in him, to transact and agree, by authority of the Holy See, with the Possessors of the Goods of the Church, for whom the Queen should intercede, and to give them a dispensation for the future enjoyment of them; with reservation nevertheless of such things, wherein, for the greatness and importance of them, he should think fit to consult the Holy See, for its approbation and confirmation."

This last Power, far from correcting what was defective in the former, was still more equivocal and useless. First, for the word transact, which was in the first Power, and remained likewise in this, it is manifest, that the Pope did not mean by it a bare acquiescence of his Legate to a possession deemed unjust, and that on this occasion, a transaction imported at least some previous reparation to be made to the Church. But for fear the term transact should not be significant enough, the Pope added in this last Power the term agree, which evidently shewed in what sense he would have this Transaction understood. Wherefore the bare acquiescence of the Legate was useless, since he thereby exceeded his Power, which was to transact and agree. Secondly, under these terms, future enjoyment, was an equivocation, since the future might imply either a perpetual or a temporary enjoyment. Thirdly, the Legate could grant a dispensation for the enjoyment of these Lands but to those for whom the Queen interceded, so that the Queen might chuse whether she would intercede for any Person: Nay, it is very likely, she would have scrupled it, since, as will appear, she herself made restitution of all such Lands as were in her possession. Fourthly, all that the Legate could do on this occasion, was insignificant without the Pope's Confirmation, who could revoke it, so that the Legate's Power was only provisional. Lastly, the obligation to consult the Holy See in matters of importance, was also an uncertain Expression, and liable to endless Cavils.

Pope Julius III, died before he was informed of the success of this affair. But if we judge of him by the terms of the Power granted to his Legate, he acted with no sincerity, and his Successor plainly refused to confirm the Legate's acquiescence. It was therefore a manifest illusion put upon the Possessors of the Church-Lands, since, according to the Canon Law, they could thereby acquire no just Title. On the other hand, they could possess them with a safe Conscience, since the Legate, at the same time that he gave his consent to their enjoyment of these Lands, denounced the judgments of God ready to fall on their heads. It will be asked, perhaps, how the English could suffer themselves to be imposed upon by so palpable an artifice? To this may be answered: First, that the King and Queen being in the sentiments of the Court of Rome, assisted the fraud as much as possible, and the Parliament, corrupted by Spanish Gold, seemed not to see what they saw. In the second place, the Legate's Powers were probably shewn only to the King and Queen, who appeared satisfied with them, and the Parliament, without examining these Powers, supposed the Legate sufficiently authorized. I have a little enlarged on this Subject, because it is very material at present, and possibly may be more so hereafter. The English may see by this, not only the impolicy of the Court of Rome's acting with sincerity in this affair, but that, though a Pope should have the best intentions towards the Possessors of Church-Lands, his consent would be insignificant. His Successors might always say, with some foundation, that he had exceeded his Power. However this be, the Possessors were, or seemed to be, satisfied, and the rather, because the Parliament made a Law which in some manner dispelled the fears of the Persons concerned. This Law imported, That whoever should disturb the Subjects, in their possession of any Lands or Goods once belonging to the Church, on pretence of any Ecclesiastical Authority, should fall into a Premunire.

The affair of the reconciliation being ended, and the Government become entirely Popish, the Parliament passed an Act to revive the Statutes of Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V, against Hereticks (1). The Commons were so hasty, that if their zeal had been indulged, they would have finished at once what the Court desired to do only by degrees. They brought in several Bills, which were rejected by the Lords, for fear of alarming the Protestants, and driving them to despair. But the Commons were almost indifferent whether their Bills were approved or rejected, because, whatever happened, their zeal for the Queen was rendered indisputable. This was the real aim of all their Proceedings.

Afterwards an Act was made by way of Supplement to the Statute of Treasons and Felonies. It was in favour of Philip that this Act was renewed, by which, if any Person asserted that Philip had no right to the title of King of England, during his Marriage with the Queen, he was to be sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, and to forfeit all his Goods: Moreover, that Prince having consented to take upon him the Guardianship of the Children he might have by the Queen, and to govern the Kingdom for a Son, till he was eighteen, and for a Daughter, till fifteen, it was also enacted, That conspiring his death during that time, should be Treason. It was likewise death, by another Act, for any to pray, that God would turn the Queen's heart from Idleness, or shorten her days (2).

The Statutes against Hereticks were no sooner revived, than the Court took into consideration how to reduce them. Their number was great, and without doubt much greater than that of their adversaries. But the latter had the Government for them. In this Party were those who were indifferent to all Religions, and these appeared the most zealous, because it was the true way to render them acceptable to the Court. On the other hand, the Protestants could not make any use of their numbers, because they were without support. Besides, many of them concealed their Sentiments, in the fear of losing their lives and fortunes. Others, by a principle of Conscience, chose to suffer, rather than resist. So that those who would have used force against the attacks of their Enemies, would, probably, have been ill supported, and the rather, because the Emperor would not have failed to assist the Queen, had it been necessary. The Protestants therefore, with the greatest consternation, saw a storm ready to fall on their heads, without any possibility to avoid it.

In the Council, held at Court on this Subject, Pole was for gentle methods rather than force, thinking this would only inflame, instead of curing, the Evil, and at most, would but increase the number of Hypocrites. He added, that the best means of converting the Protestants, was the Reformation of the Clergy, whose irregular lives had first given birth to Heresy. Gardiner, on the contrary, maintained, that only rigour was capable to have any good effect upon the Protestants. That in the Reign of Henry VIII, it was notorious, all submitted to the Statute of the six Articles, through fear of punishment. As Gardiner had in many things complied against his Conscience, he could not believe the others had more resolution than himself. For this reason he thought, the punishment of some of the most obstinate, would be attended with a blind compliance in all the rest, to whatever was enjoined. Hence it appears, he was little concerned to gain Men's hearts, provided the prevailing Religion found no more opposition. The Queen, who was a flaming bigot, embraced his opinion. But to show Pole that his Counsels were not wholly neglected, he charged him with reforming the Clergy, and left to Gardiner the care of extirpating Heresy.

Towards the end of the year, the Queen sent Viscount Montague (3), the Bishop of Ely, and Sir Edward Kerne sent to Rome, with the Tender of Submission to the Pope from the King, the Queen, and the three States of the Realm.

1555. vice, very readily undertook to execute it. He it was who in spite of all the difficulties which naturally occurred in the Queen's Marriage, had at last accomplished it. He it was also, who, by his intrigues, had found a way to dispose Parliaments to favour the Queen's intentions, with regard to Religion, and had effected the work of restoring the Roman Religion and the Pope's Authority. He thought therefore nothing more was wanting to complete his Glory, than the forcing the Protestants into the Pale of the Church, or at least to an outward submission to the Laws newly enacted, which is the utmost bounds of Man's power. For this purpose, he resolved to begin with Hooper and Rogers. The first had been Bishop of Gloucester; the other was a Clergyman of great repute among the Protestants. It was he who with Bradford had rescued Burn from his danger when he preached at St. Paul's. This Action, charitable as it was, had received so ill a construction, that the Court took occasion from it to arrest Rogers, in order to remove out of the way a Man, who was regarded as one of the Chiefs of the Protestants, from his great credit and influence with the People. It was an Artifice frequently used in the beginning of this Reign by the Court, to imprison on frivolous pretences, those whom they designed to sacrifice, with intent to detain them till Laws were made to condemn them. Hooper and Rogers were of this number, and the first Martyrs of this Reign. They were condemned by Commissioners appointed by the Queen, with the Chancellor at their head (1), and delivered over to the secular arm. Hooper was burnt at Gloucester, and Rogers at London (2). Hooper was three-quarters of an hour in Torment, the fire not being well kindled, so that his Legs and Thighs were first burnt, and one of his hands dropped off before he expired (3). These executions were followed by those of Saunders and Taylor, two other Clergymen of the most distinguished Zeal for their Religion (4). Taylor's Punishment was remarkable for his being put into a pitch Barrel, and for having, before the Fire was kindled, a Faggot from an unknown hand thrown at his head, which made it stream with blood. Afterwards, as he was repeating the 51st Psalm in English, one of the Guards, struck him over the Mouth, and bid him pray in Latin. He was therefore obliged to be silent, and continue his ejaculations, till the moment came which was to finish all his Sufferings. But while the Fire was kindling, one of the Guards, either through impatience or pity, knocked out his Brains with a Halbert, and delivered him from more cruel Torments (5).

Gardiner finding himself mistaken in his Conjectures, and that the Punishment of these four Clergymen produced not the effect he expected, transferred to Banner a Commission, which could not but draw upon him the public hatred. This was no favour to the Protestants, for if Gardiner's Zeal was cruel, Banner's was furious.

Mean while, these few executions caused an universal Conflagration. The Bigots only triumphed. The rest who had any Sense of humanity, could not, without the last concern, behold Men exposed to such cruel Sufferings, who were accused of no crime, and solely for their religious opinions. It could not but be observed how differently the Protestants behaved from the Roman Catholics. In Edward's Reign, very few had suffered imprisonment for their Religion; and in Mary's, no Punishment was thought too cruel for those Protestants, who dared to persevere in their opinions. The Bishops themselves seemed ashamed, for, in a solemn Assembly they declared, they had no hand in these barbarities. So all the hatred fell upon the King and Queen, and particularly the King, as he was bred in a Country where the Inquisition reigned. Philip hearing of it, saw that the affection of the English would be entirely lost, if they were suffered to continue in this Sentiment. Besides, he was resolved not to be the Dupe of the Bishops, who cleared themselves at his expence. He therefore ordered his Confessor Alphons to preach before him, who, before all the Court, charged the Bishops with the Cruelties complained of by the whole Kingdom (6). He even challenged them to produce in the whole Scriptures one passage, which allowed Christians to burn Men for matters of conscience. It was not without an oath that a Spaniard was heard to exclaim against burning Heretics, and condemn cruelties so common in Spain. The Bishops were so amazed, that the fire remained extinguished for some Weeks, but about the middle of March they were rekindled, the Bishops chusing to incur the public hatred, rather than not persecute the Protestants. The truth is, the Court was no less inclined to cruelty than the Bishops. But each had a mind to throw the whole blame of the Persecution on the other. Banner Bishop of London, distinguished himself by a Fury unbecoming not only a Clergyman and a Christian, but even a Cannibal. From this time the executions of the Protestants were continued, with a barbarity which clearly showed, that those by whom they were ordered, were not at all forced. The Bishops condemned without mercy all who were brought before them, and the civil Magistrates executed the Sentences, even more rigorously than commanded by the Laws (7).

About the end of April, the Princess Elizabeth was conducted from Woodstock to Hampton-Court, where Gardiner, attended by a great number of Privy Counsellors, exhorted her feriously to merit the Queen's Pardon by an ingenuous confession of her crimes. But the positively denied to have ever justly offended the Queen. At last Philip prevailed for an Enlargement of her liberty, at a Seat in the Country (8), where she was permitted to retire. As she knew all her actions were narrowly observed, she avoided concerning herself in any Affair which might give the least Suspicion. During the rest of this Reign, she applied herself wholly to her Studies, and made a considerable Progress. But still she led an uncomfortable Life, as she was forced to dissemble her religious Sentiments, to hear Mass, and frequently confess herself, to escape the dangers she was continually exposed to (9). In this she was a little less scrupulous than her Sister Mary had been in Edward's Reign. But it may be said for her, that there was a great difference between the Characters of Edward and Mary. The fear of Death could not oblige Mary to dissemble her Religion, because she was never threatened with it, whereas Elizabeth saw death continually before her Eyes upon the least advantage against her.

While the Queen was thus expressing her Zeal for the Romish Religion, she felt a Load upon her conscience which she could no longer bear. This was the possession of the Abby-Lands adjudged to Henry VIII. Pope Julius III. pretended to consent that the Possessors of the Church Lands should not be disturbed. But he plainly showed that nothing was farther from his Intentions, for even before the Affair of the Reconciliation was ended, he published a Bull, excommunicating all who had taken possession of any Church or Abby Lands, as well as the Princes who favoured or assisted them. Gardiner indeed had endeavoured to remove the Queen's uneasiness, by telling her, this Bull concerned Germany alone, and had no Authority unless received in England. But it was easy to see, that a defect of Formality could not excuse a practice in England, which was condemned by the Pope as a heinous crime in Germany. Be this as it will, the Queen, who believed herself near the time of her delivery, would not run the risk of dying excommunicate. She sent for her Ministers (10), and told them it was her fixed resolution to part with the Church Lands in her possession, to be disposed of as the Pope should judge proper. At the same time she ordered them to acquaint the Legate with her intention,

In King Edward's Reign he returned to England, and was made Prebend of St. Paul's, and Reader of the Divinity Lecture in the same Cathedral. On the 28th of January, he was convened before the Commissioners, excommunicated in the 29th, and burnt February 4. He left a Wife, and eleven Children. At the stroke he had it in his Power to have saved his Life by a Recantation: But neither Hopes nor Fears could prevail on him to desert his Religion. 1555. and give him a list of those Lands that still continued in the Crown.

Pope Julius died the 23d of March, a few days before this Restitution. Marcellus II. succeeded him the 9th of April. The new Pope was preparing to make a great Reformation in the Church; but Death surprised him whilst he was meditating this project, the 22d day after his Exaltation.

The news of Marcellus's Death being brought to England, the Queen formed the design of raising Pale to the Pontificate. She even made some advances towards it, but on the 23d of May the Cardinals, assembled in Conclave, erected Cardinal Caraffa, who assumed the Name of Paul IV. The See had not of a long time been filled with a Pope more haughty, or more proud with his power. He was no sooner raised to the Papal Chair, than he refused to carry his Authority as high or higher than any of his Predecessors. The Ambassadors of England (1) arrived in Rome the very day of his election, but were not admitted to audience till a Month after. This delay was owing to Mary's assuming the title of Queen of Ireland, which the Pope would not suffer, pretending that the Roman Pontiff only had a right to erect Kingdoms. As the Ambassadors had no Instructions to relax on this Article, their audience would have been long deferred, if the Pope had not thought of this expedient. He privately erected Ireland into a Kingdom (2), and at the same time sent to the Ambassadors to acquaint them, that otherwise he would not suffer them to give their Queen that Title in a public audience. This difficulty being removed, the Ambassadors were admitted to audience, and the Pope with great Ceremony told them, that in token of his esteem of the King and Queen of England, he had erected Ireland into a Kingdom, by virtue of his power to create new Kingdoms, and supplant old ones. Afterwards, in private audiences, he warmly pressed the Restitution of the Church-Lands, and told the Ambassadors, that he expected the whole should be restored without any exception. He said also, he intended to have the payment of St. Peter's Pence continued; for which purpose he would shortly send a Collector into England; and that the English were not to expect St. Peter would open the Gates of Heaven to them, so long as they usurped his Patrimony on Earth. The Ambassadors, not to exasperate this haughty Pontiff, were contented to answer him with submission, but did nothing, as indeed they had no power to meddle with these points.

While this pass'd at Rome, the Privy-Council being inform'd, that the Justices of Peace, and particularly those of the County of Norfolk, were indulgent to the Protestants, sent instructions to them to act more agreeably to the intentions of the Court. This shows the Bishops were not alone guilty of the cruelties exercised against the Protestants, but that the Court was equally possessed with this furious zeal. In these instructions was an article enjoining the Justices to have Spies in every Parish, for giving information of all Persons who were remiss in their Duty in point of Religion. This was to like an Inquisition, that it was imputed to the Councils of the Spaniards, which render'd them extremely odious, there being nothing more contrary to the English humour and government. Notwithstanding these instructions, and the Court's severe orders, the Violences already committed occasioned such murmurs, that Bonner himself, whether thro' fear, or some other motive, moderated his Fury so far, as to bend away, without trial, Persons brought before him for Heresy. This conduct drew from the King and Queen a severe Letter to him (3), in which, after expressing their Surprise, they exhorted him not to be remiss. This was sufficient to renew the Persecution with more fury than before. Bradford, who had been some time under Sentence of death, was burnt in July (4). Ridley Bishop of London, and the venerable old Latimer (5), who had been Bishop of Worcester in the reign of Henry VIII, suffered Martyrdom in November. I omit many other Martyrdoms in several places of the Kingdom, because my design is not to write a History of the Church. Let it suffice to say, that in the course of this year, sixty-seven Persons were burnt, amongst whom were four Bishops, and thirteen other Ecclesiastics (6).

When the King and Queen writ to Bonner to rekindle his zeal, the Queen believed herself upon the point of being delivered. The 29th of May, the Courtiers were in a readiness to convey the news to different parts of the Kingdom (7). In the beginning of June, a rumour was every where spread, that she was delivered of a Prince. The Bishop of Norwich sung Te Deum in his Cathedral. One Priest more officious than the rest, described in his Sermon the Lineaments of the new-born Prince. But this pretended Pregnancy ended at last in some moles cast forth by the Queen at several times. This was a grievous disappointment to the Queen and the whole Court (8). King Philip was no less dismayed. He had only married in hopes of having Children by the Queen, and thereby uniting England with the monarchy of Spain. This accident, and perhaps the opinion of the Physicians that there was no likelihood of any Children, entirely destroying these hopes, he grew weary of a Wife, who had neither youth nor beauty, and resolved to apply more closely to his other affairs. Besides, he was doubtless inform'd by the Emperor his Father, of his intention to resign to him his Spanish Dominions. He left England therefore the 4th of September (9), to go into Flanders, leaving the Queen extremely mortified at his coldness, of which she was but too sensible.

Before the King's departure, a discovery was pretended of a Conspiracy against the Queen. Several Persons were arrested, and some put to the Torture. But as no Confession was drawn from them, very likely this Conspiracy was only a false surmise, designed to incense the Queen against the Persons accus'd.

In the course of this year, a strict Inquiry was made after them who had pillaged the Churches and Monasteries, and particularly after those who were employed in the visitation under Henry VIII. This was a good expedient to draw large Sums from those Men, who were forc'd to open their purses to escape a severer punishment.

The Parliament met the 21st of October, and did nothing considerable, besides the making an Act to approve and confirm the Queen's resignation of the First-Fruits and Tenth (10). The Lords were desirous to make a Law, to confiscate the Estates of those whom the fear of Persecution had driven out of the Kingdom; but the Commons rejected the Bill. Most of the Members began no longer to pay the same deference to the Court as

- (5) These two excellent Prelates were burnt together at Oxford, October 16. Their behaviour was comparable to any thing left upon Record of the primitive Martyrs. Ridley was born of a good Family in Northumberland, and brought up at Newcastle School, and Pembroke Hall in Cambridge; of which last he was Master. He was Chaplain to King Henry VIII. by whom he was promoted to the See of Rochester, and translated by King Edward VI. to that of London. He was one of the ablest Champions of the Reformation. His Piety, Learning, and solidity of Judgment, were admired by his Friends, and dreaded by his Enemies. The Night before his Execution he invited the Mayor of Oxford and his Wife to see him die. And when the good Woman melted in Tears, he spoke to her with an Assurance, which was capable to banish her Sorrow, in the thought that so much Firmness on his melancholy an occasion, could be the only Gift of Heaven, inspiring and animating him against his approaching Agony. He comforted Latimer at the Stake, who was as ready to return the kind Office. He was so little diverted by the Torments before him, that he even gave a serious Attention to the sermon preached by a famous Beggar; and was sufficiently calm to have answered the execrable Parts of it, which he offered to do; but he was not allowed to display his Eloquence and the Queen, that either the Temptations of the Bishoprick of London might be confound in the Losses, or their Fines refused out of his Goods, seized when he was imprisoned. His Torment was lingering by the ill-placing of the Faggots to burn him, and his Legs were almost consumed before the Fire reached his Vitals. Latimer was burnt at Dorchester in Leicestershire, and brought up at Cambridge. He was made by King Henry VIII. Bishop of Worcester, which See he resigned, as is related in the former Volume. He had a noble Simplicity, and in his sermons arraigned the Vices of great sinners with plainness, which, unadorned with Human Eloquence, found a way to their Hearts, and made the Felix of the Age tremble before him. One illustrious Robber daunted in his Hands of Money stole from the Publick, or the Treasury, moved by one of his Discourses on Restitution, which pierced his Conscience, and obliged him to sacrifice Gain to Godliness. He comforted Ridley at the Stake (who had done as much for him, and, unobserved with all the Tumults of reigning Popery, prophesied, that they Two should light such a Candle in England, as by God's Grace would never be extinguished. formerly, whether their Penfions were withdrawn after a compliance to almost whatever was desired, or they would not be the instruments of restoring to the Clergy an Authority so odious to the Nation. Besides, most People were grown weary of the cruelties exercis'd against innocent Men. However this be, the Queen met with great mortifications in this Session. When she desired a Supply of money, the Commons, with great freedom, replied, it was not just to burden the People with expences which they might easily have supplied, if she had kept the Church-Lands. So, it was with great difficulty that she obtained a moderate Subsidy (1). The Parliament, seeming resolv'd not to be directed any more by the Court, was dissolved the 9th of December (2).

It is not surprising that the good Intelligence between the Queen and the Commons began to decrease, since the Minister, who had hitherto been employed to manage that House, was no longer in the world. I speak of Gardiner, who died in the beginning of this Session, in which he had been but twice present (3). He was seized with his sickness the very day he received the news of the death of Ridley and Latimer, which he impatiently waited for. He refused to sit down to dinner till he had received it, and was without that Satisfaction till four in the afternoon. He then dined with a good appetite, and after dinner was seized with a suppression of Urine, which brought him to his Grave in few days. It is said, that during this indisposition he felt some remorse for his past conduct, and sometimes said he had err'd with St. Peter, but not mourn'd with him. He was a Man entirely attached to the World, of great Wit, and of equal craft and dissimulation (4). He directed his Talents solely to the supporting and augmenting his own Authority. Pope Paul IV. promised him a Cardinal's Hat. It is also pretended, that to procure the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, promised to Pole, he had so flander'd him to the Court of Rome, that the Pope had resolv'd to recall, and even punish him as a favourer of Heresy, because he did not approve the violent methods practis'd for the Conversion of Protestants. Gardiner's hope of succeeding to the Archbishoprick, was the reason that Cranmer was suffer'd to live; because Gardiner waited till Pole was recalled. 'Tho' in all appearance, his religion was that of the Church of Rome, he had conform'd to all Henry VIII's changes. But the hope he had groundlessly conceived, that Henry would at last return to his first Sentiments in Religion, put him upon some practices which rendered him suspected, and robbed him of the fruit of his dissimulation. During the reign of Edward, he dissembled so far as to comply outwardly with the Laws concerning Religion; but at the same time he sufficiently discover'd that it was with regret. To this was owing his deprivation, those who then manag'd the religious affairs, being perswaded that his dissimulation did more harm than good. In the reign of Mary, he was no longer forced to conceal his Sentiments. Nay, perhaps he affect'd a greater zeal, than he really had, for the Romish Religion, to recommend himself the more to a bigotted Queen. By this he acquir'd her favour, and became her first Minister, having artfully gain'd the Emperor to his interest. When he saw his Credit firmly establish'd, he turn'd his revenge upon his Enemies into Barbarity. They had been contented to detain him in Prison; but he could only be satisfied with burning them alive. Ridley and Latimer, amongst others, felt the terrible effects of his Vengeance. He had not so long desir'd the Satisfaction of causing Cranmer to perish in the flames, if his own interest had not induced him to spare his life for some time. It is pretended he was natural Son of Richard Woodville, Brother to Queen Elizabeth, King Edward IV's Wife, and that this was the cause of his so sudden advancement to the Bishoprick of Winchester, in the reign of Henry VIII. Dr. Burnet has clearly prov'd, in his History of the Reformation, that Gardiner was one of the principal Authors of Henry's Divorce with Catherine. This, one would think, should have rendered him equally odious with Cranmer to Queen Mary: But his zeal for the Romish Religion effac'd all. After his death, the Chancellorship was executed by Commission (5), from the 13th of November to the first of January following, when Heath Archbishop of York had the Seals deliver'd to him.

The day after dissolving the Parliament, the Queen received a Bull from Paul IV. erecting Ireland into a Kingdom, this Pope presuming, that the Erection made in the Reign of Henry VIII. was null and invalid. Probably, the Queen, who was full of scruples, was not displeased to receive this Bull without her desiring it.

The King's absence, and Gardiner's death, did not hinder the fires from being rekindled about the end of this year, for the burning of Protestants. This shows, that Philip and Gardiner were not the only Authors of these violences, but that the source of them lay in the Queen's furious bigotry.

It was likewise about this time that Charles V. resign'd all his Spanish Dominions to Philip at two different times (6). The following year, he resign'd likewise the Imperial Dignity to his Brother Ferdinand (7). Paul IV. long refus'd to own the new Emperor, pretending, that the resignation of the Empire ought to have been made to him (8).

The 21st of March, Cranmer suffer'd the Martyrdom to which he had long been destin'd. He had been declared Heretic from April 1554. But this Declaration was attended with only a bare Excommunication, the power of the Judges, who had condemn'd him, reaching no farther. At last, in September 1555, he was tried at Oxford before two Commissioners (9), one delegated from the Pope, and one from the Queen. His Accusation contain'd, That he had been twice married: That he had kept a Wife secretly in the Reign of Henry VIII. and openly in that of Edward: That he had published heretical Books, forsaken the Communion of the Romish Church, and denied the real presence of Christ in the Sacrament. He own'd all these facts, and upon his Confession, was cited to appear before the Pope within eighty days; a needless citation, since he was detain'd a Prisoner. The 14th of February, Bonner and Thirlby were sent to Oxford to degrade him. Bonner execut'd his Commission with his usual infolence, and with bitter raileries and invectives against Cranmer, during the Ceremony. But Thirlby melted into Tears. Cranmer was cloth'd in Pontifical Robes made of Canvas, to render him ridiculous, and then stript of that ludicrous attire, piece by piece, according to the Ceremonies of degradation practis'd in the Church of Rome (10). But what was ridiculous, was, his being condemn'd for Non-appearance at Rome, though he was all the while a close Prisoner.

Death should of course have immediately follow'd the sentence of the Commissioners, and his degradation. But so many snares were laid to overcome the cunfancy of this Prelate, that, by infirmity, and the hopes of saving his life, he was prevail'd with to sign an Abjuration (11). His enemies, it seems, should have been satisfied with engaging him in this weakness, but his death was what they want-

He was not fiery, he said, to be thus set off, with all this Pageantry from another to the Church of Rome, but declared it to be great Injustice to condemn him for not going to Rome when he was shut up in Prison; and deny'd the Pope had any Authority over him, appeal'd from this sentence to a free General Council. Burnet, p. 333. 1556. ed, and nothing less would content them. The Queen, who pretended a merit in forgiving him his private offences, and in being moved only by a zeal for Religion, seeing all her measures broke by his Abjuration, pulled off the mask, and signed a Warrant for burning him, notwithstanding his Abjuration. Then it was that Cranmer came to himself, and, full of shame and confusion, retracted at the Stake, and resolved, the Hand which had signed the fatal Abjuration, should first suffer. He held it extended in the fire till it dropped off (1), and then was observed to beat his Breast with the other. Thus he expired, testifying a repentance for the fault he had committed. His Heart was found entire in the ashes, after his whole Body was consumed, which occasioned divers reflections, foreign to my purpose. The Enemies of the Reformation triumphed in the fall of this Prelate, and the Protestants excused him in the best manner they could (2). Pole was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury the day after his death. It seems he had his Congé d'élire with his Election, and his Bulls from Rome dispatched before this time, because the order for the restitution of the Temporalities bears date the 21st of March, the day of Cranmer's death (3). It is therefore without foundation that Pole is accused of hastening his death, to take possession of his Archbishoprick, because there was almost a month between the Queen's Warrant for burning Cranmer, and the Execution. Pole had no need of Cranmer's death to be possessed of the Archbishoprick, vacant ever since his Predecessor's Condemnation. And indeed, he was now Archbishop of Canterbury before Cranmer died, having been elected in England, and approved by the Pope, as is expressed in the Order for restoring the Temporalities, dated the 21st of March.

All the rest of this year was a continual and violent Persecution of the Protestants. The furious Bonner, who had the care of punishing Hereticks, not contented to burn them one by one, sent them in Troops to the flames; so that in the year 1556, eighty five perished by his barbarity. The very Women were not spared, and the fury of the Persecutors fell upon innocent Infants. In the Isle of Guernsey, a Woman big with Child being condemned to be burnt, and the violence of the fire bursting her Womb, a Boy fell into the flames, which being snatched out by one more merciful than the rest, was, after a short consultation, thrown in again by command of the Magistrates who assisted at the execution.

While by these violent Proceedings the utter ruin of the Protestant Religion was endeavoured, the Queen, on the other hand, laboured to support that of the Church of Rome, by repairing old Monasteries, and founding new ones (4). Perhaps she had more advanced her design to reform the religious Houses, had not the Nobility and Gentry taken the alarm. It happened, even in the last Session of the Parliament, that some of the Commons, upon hearing a Proposal concerning that affair, laid their hands on their Swords, and boldly said, They knew how to defend their own Properties. The Queen seeing so many obstacles, and not thinking it proper at that time to push the affair, resolved to wait a more favorable opportunity, and proceed gradually. Mean while, she gave a Commission to Bonner, and some others, to raze out of the publick Records whatever had been done by Henry VIII. against the Monks and the Pope, and particularly the accounts of the Visitations of Monasteries, and the Renunciations of the Papal Authority by the Monks. This has made the Ecclesiastical History of that time very defective, and yet, notwithstanding the care of the Commissioners, many Records of this nature escaped their diligence, and remain to this day.

The War still continuing between France and Spain, without the Intervention of the English, Philip was desirous of either a Peace or a Truce, to have leisure to fix himself firmly on the Throne, lately resigned to him by the Emperor his Father. His Queen had mediated for this Peace or Truce, and obtained, that the two Kings should send their Ambassadors between Calais and Ardes, where they had indeed met the 21st of May the last year, but without coming to any conclusion (5). The Advancement of Paul IV. to the Papal Throne, rendered the Peace still more difficult. He was a Pope of the most extravagant pride, and though fourscore years old, was forming vast Projects. He cannot be better compared than to Julius II. He had two Nephews, one a Cardinal, and the other Governor of the Ecclesiastical State, and both mortal Enemies of the Family of the Coligni, whose ruin they had resolved, and consequently the King of Spain's, who supported it. To effect their design, they persuaded the Pope their Uncle, that they had discovered a Conspiracy formed against him by the Spaniards. In consequence of this pretended discovery, they opened the Packets of the Duke of Alva, Viceroy of Naples, and therein pretended to find incontestable proofs. They committed Cardinal Colonna to Prison, and arrested the Envoys of Philip and the Queen of England. Then they seized Palliano and Nettuno, two Towns belonging to the Colonna.

But not satisfied with this, they soon after induced Pope Paul IV. to make a League with France, who was in actual War with Philip. For this purpose, he proposed to him the Conquest of the Kingdom of Naples, and offered him all his forces to execute that design, provided he would assist him in the War he had undertaken. This Proposal being laid before the Council of France, the Cardinal of Lorraine supported it with all his Interest. This Cardinal had then such influence over the Court, that no Person almost durst contradict him, though it was easy to see that a League with the Pope could bring no advantage to the King. The Cardinal's aim was to procure for his Brother, the Duke of Guise, the command of the Army which should be sent into Italy.

This League, offensive and defensive, was therefore begun at Paris, and signed at Rome, where the Cardinals of Lorraine and Tournon had repaired the beginning of October 1555. The Pope promised the Investiture of Naples to a Son of France; and the King, on his part, engaged to send into that Country an Army of twelve thousand Foot, five hundred Men at arms, and as many light Horse. But shortly after, by the mediation of Mary, Henry II. of France and Philip concluded a five years Truce, signed the 5th of February, 1556. The Pope complained loudly, that the King of France had left him to the vengeance of the Spaniards. Indeed, the Duke of Alva had now approached Rome, and taken some places, and amongst the rest, Ostia, which the Pope's Nephews had neglected to store. In this extremity, the Pope and his Nephews had no other refuge, than to prevail with the King of France to break the Truce with Spain. It was with this view that Cardinal Caraffa repaired to Paris, as Legate à Latere, declaring, that he came to effect a Peace between the two Crowns. At the same time, the Pope loaded with praises the Queen of England, for mediating a Truce, and exhorted her not to leave her work unfinished, but endeavour to change the Truce into a firm and lasting Peace. Mean time, the Legate, by his Intrigues and magnificent Pro-mises, prevailed at last with the King to break the Truce, without alleging other reason, than that the Pope was offended by the Spaniards, though his Holiness had first declared War against Spain.

In January 1557, Cardinal Pole visited both the Universities. Whilst he was at Cambridge, Bucer and Fagius, two German Divines, dead some years before, were ridiculously cited before the Commissioners to give an account of their Faith, and upon their non-appearance, both were condemned to be burnt. This Sentence was followed by a Warrant from the Court to execute it, and the two Bodies in their Coffins were tied to stakes, and consumed to Ashes (6). At Oxford, Peter Martyr's Wife was dug out of her Grave by order of the Legate, and buried in a Dunghill, because having been a Nun, she had broke her Vow. At first a Process was intended against her as a Heretick. But as she had never learned to speak English, no witness could be produced to swear, he had ever heard her utter any Heresy. If all had been thus dug up, who might have been presumed to die Hereticks since the Reformation, there would have been work enough. In all appearance, the suffering Peter Martyr to go out of the Kingdom was heartily repented. If the Body of his

(3) Repton by mistake says, he was made Archbishop the day Cranmer died. Though he had been elected, and approved by the Pope, Pole thought it indecent to be consecrated as long as Cranmer lived, yet, his obduracy the next day for it, brought him under the Suspicion of having procured his Death, so that the Words of Elizab to Alab concerning Nabab, were applied to him, Thou hast killed and taken possession. Burnet, Tom. 2. p. 340.

1557. Wife was thus treated, what must he have expected, had he been still in the hands of his Persecutors (1) ?

The violences hitherto acted upon both the dead and the living, had a quite contrary effect to what the Queen had imagined. The Ecclesiasticks only continued their rage; but the Magistrates began to relax, and scrupled to be the Instruments of these Barbarities. The Council being informed of it, writ circular Letters to all the Towns, to inflame their zeal in the Persecution of Hereticks. But these Letters produced no great effect.

The Queen and her Ministers enraged to hear from all parts that the number of the Protestants increased rather than lessened, resolved, as some have assured, to erect an Inquisition in England, like that in Spain. To this end, a Commission was granted the last year, empowering twenty one Commissioners (2) to sit upon Trials of Heresy, with a power so unlimited, that no other Rules were prescribed than their discretion, nor any Person whatever exempted from their Jurisdiction. This was followed by a Persecution, in which seventy nine Protestants perished.

While these things passed in England, the Duke of Guise arrived in Italy, with the Army designed for the Conquest of Naples. He stayed some time at Rome, where he found nothing ready of what the Pope had promised. Nevertheless, he entered the Kingdom of Naples in April, where he performed no great Exploits. Shortly after, he was recalled by the Pope to the relief of Rome, closely blocked up by the Duke of Alva.

On the other hand, Philip finding, the French had broken the Truce, resolved to exert his utmost to establish his reputation in the beginning of his Reign. He raised for this purpose an Army of fifty thousand Men, who were to act in Picardy; and to make himself more formidable, tried all ways to gain the Queen to his Interests, notwithstanding the Agreement in their Marriage Articles, and his Oath to give no occasion of Rupture between England and France. His Creatures about Mary perpetually insinuated to her, that she was ill treated by the King of France, who not content with receiving the English Fugitives that retired into his Dominions, had even given Penions to several. These insinuations began to operate on the Queen. But to put her quite out of humour with Henry, an artifice was used, which succeeded according to the desires of those who contrived it, probably, to do Philip service. Dr. Watton, the English Ambassador in France, sent for one of his Nephews to Paris, and gave him proper instructions to accomplish the Project. This young Man applying himself to one of the King's Gentlemen, desired a private audience of the King, saying, he had an affair of great consequence to communicate to his Majesty. The King refusing to see him, ordered him to apply to the Constable of Montmorency. Watton, in his Conference with the Constable, told him, he was sent by the Inhabitants of Calais, who were generally Protestants, and desirous to put themselves into the hands of the French King, provided they might have liberty to profess their Religion. The Constable listening to this Proposition, bid him explain how it might be effected, and liking the Project, told Watton to come to him again and talk of this affair. But Watton (3), instead of returning to the Constable, crossed the Seas back into England, and made his report to the Queen and her Ministers of what passed at Paris. Whereupon the Queen thought the King of France was no longer to be regarded, since, in the midst of Peace, he was forming projects to surprise Calais. It appears, that in February she had resolved upon a rupture with France (4), since, by an Order of the 10th of the same month, Commissioners were sent to the Sheriffs and Justices of Peace to levy forces, and have them in a readiness to march upon the first notice. Shortly after, another affair happened, which furnished her with the desired pretence to declare War against France.

One Stafford (5) having secretly obtained assistance from the Court of France, assembled some English Fugitives, and embarking them, landed them in Scotland, towards the end of April, and marched directly to Scarborough, where he seized the Castle, and published a Manifesto against the Queen, pretending she had forfeited all her right to the Crown, by introducing Spaniards into the Kingdom. He had even the boldness to assume the Title of Protector of England. But the Earl of Westmorland assembling some Troops in the North, retook Scarborough, and made Stafford Prisoner, with three of his accomplices (6).

King Philip arrived the 20th of March (7) in England, where eight thousand Men were ready to pass into the Low-Countries. Shortly after his Arrival, the Queen sent a Herald to declare War against France. The 17th of June the eight thousand English (8) under the Conduct of the Earl of Pembroke left England, and joined the Spanish Army commanded by the Duke of Savoy; after which Philip himself departed in July (9) to return to Brussels.

The Duke of Savoy having made a feint, for a Month, to attack several Places in Picardy, fell suddenly upon St. Quintin (10), which was in ill condition, and had only a Garrison of three hundred Men. All that the Constable, who commanded the French Army, could do, was to detach his Nephew Admiral Chatillon with three thousand Men, to throw himself into the Town. The Admiral succeeded in part, having got in the Night through the Quarters of the Beliegers. But instead of three thousand, only seven hundred followed him, the rest having lost their way. With this Reinforcement he made a gallant defence, in hopes that the Constable, though much weaker than the Enemy, would use all possible endeavours to relieve him, and indeed nothing was neglected by the Constable. He was even so successful as to throw Andelet, Brother of the Admiral, into the Place with five hundred Men. But in his return, after his Success, he was attacked by the Duke of Savoy, who routed his Army, killed two thousand five hundred of his Men, and took him Prisoner. In this Battle, called the Battle of St. Lawrence, (because fought on the 10th of August, the Day dedicated to that Saint,) France lost a great number of Princes and Noblemen killed or made Prisoners (11). The Confinement was so great, that if the Duke of Savoy had marched directly to Paris, it was believed nothing could have prevented his Entrance. But instead of this, he drew back to his lines, and eight days after carried the Town by storm (12), and took the Admiral Prisoner on the breach. All France exclaimed against the Pope, who had occasioned this Rupture. But the Blow was struck. The King of France's last Resource was to call the Duke of Guise out of Italy, where he was making no great progress.

When the Pope heard the Queen of England had declared War against France, he was so angry with Pole, as if he could have hindered it, that he recalled all his Legates (13), including Pole in the number; but Karne the English Ambassador remonstrated to him by some Cardinals, the Mischief which from thence might ensue to Religion. At last, after many Solicitations and Remonstrances, the Pope, without revoking his order, promised only it should not be notified to Pole, and told the Ambassador he was inclined to continue the Cardinal in his Legation, if the Queen should desire it. This was before the Battle of St. Lawrence. But when News of the loss of this Battle, and the recalling of the Duke of Guise were brought to him, he was again extremely incensed against Pole, and resolved to sacrifice him to his Revenge. For this purpose he sent the Pope's Confessor to Rome, and creating him Cardinal, put into his hands the Bull of Pole's Revocation, and appointed him for his Legate in England. But the Queen, being informed of this, writ to Poyto who was on his return, that if he offered to let foot in England, she would bring him within the Præmunire. This Letter stopped his Journey (14). Mean while, though the Pope's Brief was not delivered to him, Pole obtained from the Functions of his Legate, being unwilling to give the haughty Pontiff a plausible pretence of Complaint, who had long hated him.

When the Duke of Guise had quitted Italy, the Pope, unable to defend himself against the Duke of Alva, who was near Rome, made a Peace with Spain, and left France 1557. in the lurch (1). By a secret Article of this Treaty, Pole was restored to his Office of Legate.

The Duke of Guise returns to France. Henry solicits the Queen-Regent of Scotland to break the Peace with England, and that Princess was as ready to oblige him. But she had a powerful Party against her, which was for preserving the Peace. Wherefore, as she could not bring the States to the resolution she desired, she took another course to accomplish her design. She fortified Ayrmouth, contrary to an express Article of the Treaty lately concluded with England; and thereby engaged the English to oppose it with force. This produced indeed a Breach between the two Nations (2); and the Scotch Army under the Conduct of d'Oysel, even entered the Frontiers of England. But the States still hoping to repair the Breach made in the Peace without their Consent, required d'Oysel, by an express order, to return, which he was forced to obey. The Regent seeing how low her Authority was, pressed the Court of France to hasten the Marriage of the Queen her Daughter with the Dauphin, to the end that Prince being in possession of Scotland, might be more master of its Forces and Counsels. Henry improving this advice, immediately sent Ambassadors into Scotland to settle with the States the Marriage-Articles (3).

The War which was preparing in Scotland, and that already began in France, greatly embarrassed the Queen, because she wanted Money. She tried to raise money by way of Loans: but without success. She was therefore obliged to call a Parliament for the 20th of January, though with regret, because she feared, that to obtain a Supply, she should be forced to remit her Severities against the Protestants.

About the end of the year, Philip gave notice to the Queen of a design forming by the Court of France upon Calais, and made her an offer of his Forces to strengthen the Garrison, which he knew to be weak. This advice, being laid before the Council, was immediately suspected to be an Artifice of Philip, to put himself in possession of Calais, on pretence of reinforcing the Garrison. This, though a bare supposition, was not entirely improbable. Mean while, the Counsellors, as if it had been a most evident Truth, could not believe that France had any intention to besiege the Town, though it was not provided with the fourth part of the necessary Troops and Ammunition. It seemed, that the sole reputation of the Town was to be its Security. So, the advice was neglected and nothing done for its relief, though the Governor, William Lord Wentworth, was not wanting in his Solicitations (4).

Nothing less was to be expected from a Council composed chiefly of Ecclesiastics, who were only intent upon the ruin of the Protestants! After so shameful a neglect of providing for the safety of Calais, the Queen and her Ministers were in the utmost consternation, upon the news that the Town was actually lost (5). The Duke of Guise besieged it the first of January, and carrying the Fort called Newnambridge (6), which commanded the Avenues from the Land, and also the Ribant which commanded the Harbour (7), obliged the Governor to capitulate the seventh day of the Siege. After he was Master of the place he ordered all the English to depart, as Eduard III. had expelled the French two hundred and ten years before. Then he sat down before Guines, commanded by Lord Grey (8), with a Garrison of eleven hundred Men. But the Garrison was so discouraged by the loss of Calais, that on the first attack, they quitted the Town, and retired into the Citadel. Mean while, the English Governor perceiving the French were fallen to plundering, made a Sally and beat them out of the Town; but despairing to keep it, set it on fire, and retired. Soon after, the French closely invested the Citadel, and in an Assault the Garrison lost three hundred Men. After this, the Governor seeing no possibility of a longer resistance, surrendered himself Prisoner of War with his whole Garrison. The Castle of Hames, situated in an almost inaccessible Marth, might have made some resistance; but the Garrison fled, and left it to the French. Thus in the middle of Winter, and in less than fifteen days, the English lost all the remains of their ancient Conquests in France, by the Incapacity of a Queen, whose thoughts were wholly ingrofs'd by one affair, as if the destruction of the Protestants had alone merited her application; and by the negligence, if it deserves no worse name, of her Council. Such was the Fruit, England reaped from her alliance with Spain, notwithstanding all Gardiner's care to prevent a mixture of Interests between the two Crowns. The non-performance of this article shows, how the rest would have been observed, if Philip, had he had any Children by the Queen, could have introduced himself, as their Guardian, into the Government of the Kingdom.

The Loss of Calais made great noise in England. The Protestants took occasion to arraign the Government; and the Creatures of the Court were so confounded, that they durst not open their mouths in justification of the Ministry. Some accused them of Treason, others of Incapacity, and their most zealous Adherents could not but own their negligence. The two Governors of Calais (9) and Guines were the most unhappy. Besides the loss of their reputation, the Ministers, to insinuate to the People that these places were lost by their fault, suffered them to remain prisoners, and no care was taken for their release. But no one had a more lively Sense of this loss than the Queen (10). She perfectly knew the value of Calais after it was taken, which rendered England always formidable to France, because the English could, in twenty-four hours, land great Armies in that Kingdom. The Greatness of the loss has since been still more sensibly felt. From that time, France, except when distracted with civil wars, no more showed for England that regard, she was before forc'd to pay.

Immediately after the taking of Calais, Philip strongly pressed the Queen to make a vigorous effort to recover it, before France had time to repair and fortify it. But it was not possible for the Ministers to find means to execute such an Undertaking. Upon a computation of the necessary expence for the Fleet and Army, it was judged dangerous, considering the general discontent, to load the People with so great a burden, even though the Parliament could be brought to a compliance (11). This was sent to Philip in a letter of thanks for his advice and offers. But besides this reason, there was another of great weight, namely, the fears of the Ministry, the Council, and the Queen her self, that the siege of Calais would oblige them to interrupt the persecution. So, in the belief that one year more would suffice to destroy the Reformation and the Reformed, they judged it proper to defer the Siege of Calais till a more convenient Season.

The Parliament (12) which met the 20th of January, did nothing considerable, besides granting a Subsidy to the Queen, after the Clergy had led the way (13). The House of Commons was filled with perpetual complaints

Philip pressed the Queen to make a vigorous effort to recover it, before France had time to repair and fortify it. But it was not possible for the Ministers to find means to execute such an Undertaking. Upon a computation of the necessary expence for the Fleet and Army, it was judged dangerous, considering the general discontent, to load the People with so great a burden, even though the Parliament could be brought to a compliance (11). This was sent to Philip in a letter of thanks for his advice and offers.

This affair being finish'd, the Friends of the Court brought in a Bill to confirm all the Queen's Letters Patents, without explaining themselves farther. This was strenuously oppos'd by one of the Members, who urg'd that a power so unlimited would put the Kingdom in danger, and the Queen in a capacity to dispose of the Crown from the right Heir. The Commons were offend'd with these insinuations against the Queen, and sent the Member to Prison (1). But tho' the Queen seem'd pleas'd with the zeal of the Commons for her reputation, she clearly saw how far they were from any thoughts to deprive the Princess Elizabeth of the Crown. It is not known what was the intent of so general a confirmation: but 'tis likely, the Authors had some view disadventagious to Elizabeth.

In April, this year, the Dauphin at last married Mary the young Queen of Scots (2). After many difficulties the States of Scotland granted the Dauphin the Title of King of Scotland, upon a solemn promise from his Father, that he should content himself with the bare Title, and not concern himself in the Government of the Kingdom.

The Princess Elizabeth in great dangers.
Burnet.

The Princess Elizabeth was now in more danger than ever. The Queen sensibly declined in her health. She had not been well manag'd during her pretended Pregnancy, because she having committed herself to the care of Women who only flatter'd her, she had neglected to consult the Physicians, who might have prevented the consequences of that accident. From that time she never enjoy'd a sound health. She was naturally melancholy, and this temper was increas'd by her many mortifications in the two former reigns. Afterwards, the disgust of the King her Husband, of which she was but too sensible, still augmented her melancholy; and the loss of Calais, brought her to such a state, that she could bear the sight but of very few Persons. The Body sympathized with the mind, and she felt herself grow daily weaker. In this condition, she was troubled with the same reflexions on her Sister Elizabeth's account, that had before disturb'd Edward on her's; namely, that after her death, what she had with so much pains establish'd, would be infallibly overturned. The Bishops were strongly perswad'd of this.

Strype.

They were not ignorant that Elizabeth, whatever pains she took to conceal it, was a Protestant in her heart, and even inclin'd to be so from her temporal interest. Hence some were perpetually insinuating to the Queen, the necessity of putting her out of the way. Gardiner had been of this opinion, and frequently said, it was in vain to lop off the Branches while the Tree was suffer'd to stand. It is astonishing this advice had never been follow'd! The Queen was a Bigot to the last degree. It gave her no remorse to spill human Blood, when Religion was the pretence. So, in all appearance, she would not have spared a Sister, whom she consider'd as a Bastard, had not God suffer'd the Politicks of Philip to prevail over the zeal of the Queen his Spouse. For at the very time I am speaking of, when the Spirit of Persecution render'd Men deaf to reason, justice and humanity, to what can be ascrib'd, but to the particular protection of Heaven, the preservation of this Princess, whom so many reasons demanded as a sacrifice to the Romish Religion? but God who has set bounds to the Sea, restrains also the fury of Persecutors, and prevents them from massacring those

Some time after the Prorogation of the Parliament, the King of Sweden sent a Gentleman to Elizabeth to inform her of his design to demand her in marriage, and to desire her consent (3). This Mellenger desiring a private audience, she would not grant it, without first knowing his message. After she was inform'd, she sent him a positive answer, that she would receive no such proposal, but by the Queen's direction. The mellenger replied, his Master acted like a Lover, who would not espouse a Princess, without being first sure of her consent, by which he testified his esteem for her; but when she had once allowed his addresses, he would then, as a King, demand her by his Ambassador. But this was not capable to make her alter her resolution. On the contrary, she signified to him, that the King of Sweden would oblige her, in thinking no more of her. This Answer, one would think, should have satisfied the Swedish Ambassador, then arriv'd in London, since the King their Master resolv'd not to marry Elizabeth without her consent, and yet they propos'd the marriage to the Queen. This gives occasion to suspect, that the Swedish Gentleman who desir'd a private audience of the Princess, had not received his Commission immediately from the King his Master, but from the Ambassadors, and that the Queen's Ministers had induced them to found the Princess, in order to draw her into a Snare. However this be, presently after, the Queen order'd her to be told (4), that she was pleas'd with her answer to the Swedish Gentleman: That the Ambassadors had in their King's Name demand'd her in marriage, in which she desir'd to know her mind. Elizabeth answer'd, she was content with her condition, and that if the Queen would allow her to pursue her own inclination, she protest'd, a single life was to her preferable to a marriage with the greatest Prince in the World. Thus the affair proceeded no farther.

Strype.

The loss of Calais, and the Session of the Parliament, had given some respite to the Protestants. But in the end of March, the Persecution was renew'd with greater fury than ever. The Queen herself, exceeding her Prerogative, published a Proclamation, "That whoever had any heretical Books, and did not presently burn them without reading, should be esteem'd Rebels, and executed without delay by the martial Law." On the other hand, she expressly forbid to pray for those who were executed, or even to say, God help them. This caus'd the Author of the History of the Reformation judiciously to remark, that it was not so much the Conversion, as the Destruction of those they call'd Heretics, that the Bishops desired. A convincing Proof of this was seen shortly after. One Benbridge being tied to the stake, through the violence of the flames, cried out, I recant. Whereupon, the Sheriff (5) order'd the fire to be immediately extinguish'd, and the Sufferer sign'd an abjuration dictated to him. But soon after he received an Order from Court to burn the condemned Person, and come himself to London, where he was committed to Prison. The fury of the Persecutors was so extreme, that though they were going to lose the Queen, they ceased not these severities. About a week before her death, five Persons were burnt at Canterbury, and in this last year of her Reign, thirty nine Protestants suffer'd Martyrdom in several places. Authors are not agreed concerning the number of those who died in the flames during Mary's Reign. Those who say the least, reckon two hundred and eighty four; but others affirm, that in the two first years of the Persecution, which began in 1555, eight hundred were put to death (6).

(2) They were married April 28. Buchanan writ an Epithalamium upon this Marriage, which was one of the best perform'd Pieces of Latin Poetry. (5) According to Fox's account, and Bish p. Burnet's Calculation, there were two hundred and eighty four burnt in all. A Paper found among the Lord Burghley's MSS. makes the Number of those that were burnt to be two hundred and ninety. The same Lord Burghley, in a Treatise writ in the year 1583, reckeneth on the number of those that died in that Reign by Imprisonment, Torture, Fire, and Execution, to be near four hundred. But the Author of the Preface, to Bishop Ridley's Book, De Vera Domini, who according to Bala, (de Scrip p. 684, 731.) was H. II. in 1555, &c. T. 1. p. 11. the two first years of the Queen's Persecution, there were above eight hundred, put to the most cruel kinds of death for Religion. The reason of this Diversity may be, that no exact List was kept, at the time, of the Persons committed to the Flames, but the accounts of them were afterwards gathered by several Persons, according to the best Intelligence they could receive from their Friends, throughout the several Parts of the Kingdom. However this be, it is generally acknowledged, That there were burnt five Bishops, one and twenty Divines, eight Gentlemen, eighty four Artificers, one hundred Household Servants and Labourers, twenty six Wives, twenty Widows, nine Virgins, two Boys, and two Infants. Sixty four more were persecuted for their Religion; wherein fifteen were whipped, sixteen perished in Prison; and twelve were buried in Dugbills. It is observable, that the Persecution rag'd most in Bonner's Diocese, and in Kent. Fox, as Heylin reckons it, in all the Province of York, there was but one brought to the Stake; and but three in the four Welsh Dioceses. In those of Exeter, Wells, Peterborough, and Lincoln, there is mention but of one a piece; of two in that of Ely, and of no more than three a piece at Bath and Salisbury; in those of Oxford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford none at all. And now, not to let both hellish and bloody Judges pass without some Reflection, I shall observe with Mr. Gellier, That, "to destroy People for points of mere speculation, and which have no ill effect on Practice and Civil Government, seems very remote from the Spirit of Christianity. Supporting Truth on the persecuted Side, yet to burn a Man because he will not sell his Conscience, and turn Hypocrite, is strangely unaccountable. Men can't believe what they please: Their Understandings

1558. While these Tragedies were acting in different places of the Kingdom, the Queen, who was deeply affected with the loss of Calais, was willing to make one effort to repair it. Philip had advised to try to seize Brisl. For this purpose, he put to Sea a Fleet of one hundred and twenty Ships (1), commanded by the Lord Clinton (2), who landed at Conquest, and burnt that small Town, but the Country rising upon the English, obliged them to retire to their Ships, with the loss of six hundred of their Men (3). The whole Country being in Arms to oppose a second descent, and fresh Troops daily arriving in these parts, the English Admiral, who had only seven thousand Men, thought it not proper to engage in any new action; and returned. Such was the benefit the Queen reaped from this expensive Armament. She was now sensible, that the continuation of the War would procure her no advantage, and readily consented to a Negotiation then proposed for a Peace between France, England, and Spain. Cambray was the place appointed for the Congress, which was opened in October (4).

The Parliament meeting the 5th of November, the Queen demanded assistance to continue the War, in case the Negotiation should miscarry. The House of Commons was little inclined to grant her request, that she was obliged to send the Chancellor and ten other Lords, to lay the ill state of her affairs before them, and pray them to hasten the necessary Supplies. This Solicitation producing some effect, the Commons debated, that and the two following days, upon a Subsidy. But the Queen's death put an end to their consultations.

She had been some time afflicted with a Dropsy, which being much increased the beginning of November, carried her off the 17th of the same month, in the 43d year of her Age, after a Reign of five years, four months, and eleven days.

Cardinal Pole followed her within sixteen hours. He was a Prelate of a sweet and moderate Temper, who would have been glad to bring back, by fair and lawful means, the English to their ancient belief, but approved not the methods of Fire and Sword. This gave his Enemies room to represent him as a little inclined to the Protestant Religion; or at least, as one of too tender a disposition for that time. Neither the Queen, nor Philip, nor the Pope, nor Gardiner, nor the Bishops, substituted in the place of the ejected Protestant Bishops, were Persons to be guided by his moderate maxims. Accordingly, Pole was never consulted on Religion, though in all other affairs the Queen placed a great confidence in him. Pope Paul IV. was his sworn Enemy. It was he who by his slanders prevented his ascending the Papal Throne on the death of Paul III, though he was elected in the Conclave. From that time believing, Pole could not forgive him such an injury, he never ceased doing him ill offices. And when he was himself Pope, he often gave him marks of his enmity. It is even pretended, that when he recalled him from his Legation, to put Poye in his room, he intended to punish him severely for having been too gentle to the Protestants. But Philip and Mary took him into their protection (5).

The excessive Bigotry of Queen Mary is evident from the History of her Reign. To this she joined a temper cruel and vindictive, which she endeavoured to confound with zeal for Religion. But when it was not possible to unite them, she plainly shewed, she was inclined to Cruelty, as well by Nature as Zeal. She had the misfortune to be encouraged in this disposition by all who approached her. King Philip was naturally morose. Gardiner was one of the most revengeful Men living. Bonner was a Fury; and the other Bishops were chosen from amongst the most cruel and barbarous of the Clergy. This was the Quality by which alone a Man was thought worthy of the Episcopal Dignity. The persecution therefore against the Protestants in this Reign, has nothing which ought to seem strange. Dr. Burnet says, Mary had a generous disposition of Mind. It were to be wished, he had given us some passages of her life, where this generosity appeared: For my part, I find but one action to approve in her whole Reign. This was her rejecting the Spanish Ambassador's Project, to make herself absolute at the expence of the Laws and Liberties of the Nation. She discovered no great Capacity in the Government of her Dominions; and the loss of Calais, though there was not something more odious, would be an everlasting blot upon her Reign.

"are not all of a size. Things don't stand in the same Light, and strike with the same force on every Body. Besides, if the Roman Catholics believed the Reformed such notorious Heretics: If they believed they would be so ill received in the other World, why did they not use them gentler in this? Why did they hurry them to eternal Destruction before their time?" We may justly affirm, that such Wisdom is this, did not proceed from above, but was earthly, sensual, and devilish. *Calist. Eccl. THE Death of Mary, tho' foreseen, struck the Counsellors and Ministers with astonishment.
They were all of the prevailing Religion; and had advised, or at least approved the Persecution which the Protestants lately groaned under, and now, in all likelihood, the Protestants were going in their turn to govern. Mary's death was therefore concealed for some Hours, to give time to consult what was to be done. But as the Parliament was sitting, it was not in their power to decide any thing concerning the Succession, especially as it was clearly settled by the Will of Henry VIII., authorized by an Act of Parliament which had never been repealed. Their Consultation therefore ended only in a Message to inform the Parliament of the Queen's Death. This was all that could be done on this occasion.

The News was first communicated to the House of Lords, who immediately considered the rights of the Persons who might pretend to the Crown. If this Affair had been left to the decision of the Civil or Common Law, there would have been no small difficulty, so much had Henry perplexed it by his Divorces, and by contradictory Acts of Parliament.
But in England, the Parliament, which includes the King, Lords, and Commons, is the supreme Legislator, and,
when force does not interpose, the validity of its Laws are unquestionable. Henry VIII. obtained an Act, im-powering him to settle the Line of Succession as he should think proper. He placed Elizabeth next to her Sister Mary, though both had been declared Bastards. This sufficed to give Elizabeth a Right, which the Parliament could not contest, since it was a parliamentary Right, as founded in the Act to empower Henry to settle the succession. Besides, every one knew the Dissolution of that Prince's Marriage with Ann Bolyn, and the Act, which, in consequence of the Divorce, declared Elizabeth illegitimate, was the pure effect of the King's Caprice, and of the Compliance, rather than Justice, of the Parliament.

But though the Lords should have thought to exclude Elizabeth from the Succession, on what other Person could they have fixed, without exposing the Kingdom to great danger? It will be proper, briefly to explain this, as a thing very requisite to the Sequel of this Reign.

Upon Mary's Death, three Princesses could pretend to the Crown, namely, Elizabeth Sister of the late Queen; Mary Queen of Scotland, Grand Daughter to Margaret, eldest Sister of Henry VIII.; and Frances Duchess of Suf- folk, Daughter of Mary, younger Sister of the same Prince. Elizabeth supported her Right upon the Will of the King her Father, authorized by Act of Parliament. Mary could object, that Elizabeth had been declared a Bastard by an Act still unrepealed: That no Bastard had ever ascended the Throne of England:
That the Laws of the Country gave Bastards no share in the inheritance of their Fathers, and consequently the Succession was devolved to the Posterity of Margaret, eldest Daughter of Henry VII. It could be alleged for the Duchess of Suffolk, that Elizabeth being a Bastard, and the Queen of Scotland a Foreigner, and not even placed in the order of Succession by the Will of Henry VIII. the Crown ought to fall to the Posterity of Mary, second Daughter of Henry VII. It is not necessary to examine here these several Pretensions, because, probably the Parliament, which made the decision, proceeded not so much upon the Laws, as upon Policy, and the interests of the Kingdom. The Queen of Scotland had married the Dau-ghin, Heir-apparent to the Crown of France. In adjudg-ing the Crown to her, England would have been in danger of subjection to, or dependency on France. This alone was sufficient to exclude her. The Duchess of Suffolk could not have been placed on the Throne with any colour of Justice, since she only derived her Right from the Will of Henry VIII., which was equally favorable to Elizabeth.

1558. Besides, such a choice would have infallibly thrown the Kingdom into a civil War. It was, probably, for these reasons that the House of Lords declared for Elizabeth. It seems, however, that a great difficulty was to occur. All England, and particularly the House of Lords, made profession of the Romish Religion, and it was scarce to be questioned, that Elizabeth was a Protestant in her Heart. But two things, doubtless, conspired to remove this obstacle. The first was, that the Bishops and Catholic Lords were persecuted, that Elizabeth, should the desire it, would find it difficult to change the established Religion. They even believed her of a temper so complying, that she would rather conform to the Rites of the Romish Religion, as she had done for some years, than hazard the causing of disturbances, which might be fatal to her. If Camden's Testimony is to be entirely credited, Elizabeth made no scruple to declare herself a Catholic, during the Reign of her Sister. The Lady Elizabeth, (says this Historian) now guiding herself as a Ship in tempestuous weather, both heard divine Service after the Romish manner, and was frequently confessed, and at the pressing instances and menaces of Cardinal Pole, through fear of death, professed herself a Roman Catholic.

The second reason which, probably, prevented the Lords from insisting on her exclusion, was, that though they all professed the Catholic Religion, they were not however all Catholics. Many, and perhaps the greatest number, had only dissembled their sentiments during Mary's Reign. But being freed from all danger by her death, they could speak boldly, and oppose those who pretended to exclude Elizabeth on account of her Religion; this reason not being of more force against her, than it was against Mary, after Edward's death.

However this be, the House of Lords declaring for Elizabeth, the Commons were sent for, and acquainted by the Chancellor with the Queen's death, and their resolution, which was readily and unanimously embraced. The same day Elizabeth was proclaimed Queen at the usual places, with the acclamations of the People. The Protestants thanked God that he had at last delivered them from persecution, in placing on the Throne a Princess, who, very likely, would be favorable to them. It is true, that among the Papists some looked on the death of Mary, and the advancement of Elizabeth, as a mortal wound to their Religion; but others were not sorry to see a stop put to those barbarities, which dishonoured it. As for those who made not Religion the chief object of their thoughts, they were easily comforted for the loss of a Queen, under whom England had not much flourished, and who had lost the only place which commanded respect from France. They believed to have reason to expect better things from the new Reign.

Elizabeth being informed of the resolution of both Houses in her favour, left Hatfield (1) the 19th of November, and came to London with a numerous train of Lords and Ladies (2), and an infinite crowd of People, testifying their Joy by the loudest Acclamations. She was twenty five years old, tolerably handsome, of an air great, noble, and majestic. But she was still more agreeable to the People, by a certain natural affability, which commanded the esteem and affection of all who approached her. As she had a large share of Sense and Judgment, she knew perfectly how necessary the love of her People was to her, since it was to be the strongest support of her Throne, as will hereafter appear. Wherefore, instead of losing this affability, in being raised from a Subject to a Queen, she studiously increased it to such a degree, that some accused her of playing the Comedian, and over-acting her part.

Her first care, after receiving the Compliments on her Accession, was to dispatch Ambassadors to the principal Courts of Europe, to give notice of the late change in England (3). Lord Cobham (4) was sent to Philip, whom she esteemed her Friend, and who was moreover her ally in the War against France, the Treaty of Cambray not being yet concluded. Sir Thomas Chaloner was sent to the Imperial Court. Lord Howard of Effingham was joined in Commission with Thirlby, Bishop of Ely, and Dr. Wol-ton, Plenipotentiaries for negotiating a Peace. Sir Henry Killigrew went into Germany, to assure the Protestant Princes of the Queen's affection. Karne, who was still at Rome, where he had been Resident ever since the death of Edward VI, had Orders to notify to the Pope Mary's death, and Elizabeth's accession to the Crown (5). The Kings of Sweden and Denmark had the same notifications.

These Envoys being dispatched, the Queen formed a Council, in which she left thirteen of Mary's Counsellors, all zealous Roman Catholics, to whom she added eight new ones, equally attached to the Protestant Religion (6). With some of these last she secretly consulted about the means to restore the Reformation in England. But before I speak of the result of these consultations, a new Project of the King of Spain must briefly be mentioned.

When this Prince received the news of the death of his Queen, whether, on account of Elizabeth's Inclination to the Protestant Religion, or by her marrying some Prince of that Religion, against which he had himself openly declared, he looked upon England as lost to him. He was not even without fear, that the King of France asserting the Queen of Scotland's Claim upon England, would seize that Kingdom, and unite it, as well as Scotland and Ireland, to the French Monarchy. Wherefore, to free himself from these fears, and preserve the advantages of his alliance with England, he sent instructions to the Condé de Feria (lately arrived at London, to pay his compliments to the late Queen) to congratulate Elizabeth on her Accession, and propose his design of uniting himself with her in Marriage. Elizabeth received the Offer with marks of a particular esteem for the King of Spain, but objected their affinity as an impediment to this Marriage. This objection was foreseen, and immediately replied to by the Ambassador, That his Master would undertake to procure the Pope's Dispensation. The Queen not caring to express her little regard of such a Dispensation, civilly dismissed the Ambassador, to have time to consider of the Proposal. Three great reasons hindered her from accepting Philip's Offer. First, her persuasion that such Marriages were contrary to the Law of God, and her Father's Example in a parallel case, reminded her of her Duty. Secondly, nothing was more contrary to her intention of openly professing and restoring the Protestant Religion in England, as established in the Reign of Edward VI. Lastly, to make use of a Dispensation to marry a Brother-in-law, would have been an acknowledgment of the Invalidity of her Father's Divorce with Catherine of Arragon, and of her own Illegitimacy. If Paul IV. could grant such a Dispensation, Julius II. might have granted the same to Henry VIII, to marry Catherine of Arragon, from whence it necessarily followed, that Henry's second Marriage with Ann Boleyn was null. But on the other hand, Elizabeth had strong reasons to preserve the King of Spain's Friendship. To him she owed her life, or at least, her not being excluded by her Sister from the Succession. Mary would never have left Elizabeth in a condition of one day mounting the Throne, if the interest and solicitations of the King her Husband had not strongly resisted her zeal for her Religion. In the second place, Elizabeth was informed, that the King of France was using all his Credit at Rome to have her declared illegitimate, in order to procure the Crown of England for his Daughter-in-law, the Queen of Scotland. Lastly, England was in a very ill state. The loss of Calais, Guisner, and Hames, the Crown debts contracted by Henry VIII, and increased by the Guardians of Edward VI, and an exhausted Treasury, gave Elizabeth just cause to fear, she should be unable to oppose a vigorous attack. To this may be added, she was engaged in a War with France and Scotland, unsupported by any other alliance than that of Spain, so unkindly had Mary been of every thing where Religion was not concerned. Her business therefore was to end these two Wars with honour; but this was not to be done without Philip's assistance, and consequently it was not proper to give him any just cause of complaint, for fear of his deserting England in the Negotiation of Peace. These reflections threw the Queen into great perplexity. She was fully resolved, to refuse the King of Spain's Proposal, but was uneasy about the manner. Though the alleged scruples of Conscience, it did not free her from the importunities of the Conde de Feria, who persisted, that a Dispensation from the Pope was more than sufficient to remove them. He told her likewise, that as his Master had made this overture purely from his extraordinary esteem for her, he would be the more displeased if it was rejected. At last, the Queen being thus pressed, found no surer or readier way to extricate herself out of this difficulty, than by hastening the execution of her design, to make a change in Religion, not doubting that this once effected, the King of Spain would cease his importunities.

(5) The haughty Pope told Karne, That England was held in Fee of the Apostolick See, and Elizabeth could not succeed, being illegitimate. That it was great boldness in her to assume the Crown without his Consent; for which reason she deserved no favour at his hands; but if she would renounce her Pretensions, and refer herself wholly to him, he would show a fatherly affection to her. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 374.

This resolution being taken, the cause to be examined before her Cabinet Council, the proper methods to execute it, the inconveniencies it might be attended with, and the means to prevent them. The greatest Obstacles to this affair, were to arise either at Home or Abroad. At home, from the great number of Catholics, and the opposition of the Bishops and inferior Clergy. Abroad, from the Pope, who in all likelihood, would thunder his Censures against the Queen, and expose the Kingdom a prey to the first Invader. This might give cause to fear, that the Kings of France and Spain would use this pretence to make war upon the English, as excommunicated Heretics, and to stir up Scotland, which was entirely directed by the King of France. Upon the inconveniencies at home, it was considered, that though the Kingdom appeared wholly Catholic, it was far from being really so. That the fear of punishment ceasing, the greatest part of the People were manifestly inclined, to return to the Religion which they had been forced to forsake in the last Reign; but however, it would not be very difficult to have a Parliament favorable to the Queen's intentions, by employing means which rarely fail of success, when used with discretion: That for this purpose, the Magistrates of the Counties and Towns were to be removed, and Protestants put in their places, who would use their Credit and Authority to have such Representatives returned, as were proper for the execution of the intended design: Lastly, That it was absolutely necessary not to leave any zealous Catholic in the Council, or in any other Office which influenced the Subject: That when the Reformation should be once established by public Authority, it would be easy to subdue the Clergy, by depriving the Bishops and most obnoxious Ecclesiastics, and by removing in the Universities, the Masters and Professors, who were most averse to the new establishment.

As for the obstacles from abroad, it was considered, that the Pope was not formidable in himself, and his thunders were thrown away upon those who despised them: That a contempt of him was the ready way to conquer, provided the Kingdom was put in a posture of defence. That indeed it was to be feared, the King of France would assert the claim of the Queen of Scotland, but that the King of Spain was too wise to suffer so great an accession to the Monarchy of France, as England and Ireland: That from whatever quarter the mischief came, whether from France or Spain, Henry and Philip would always be jealous of each other, and the assistance of one of them might be safely relied on: That if the King of France offered Peace it ought to be embraced on any terms, as Scotland would be included in the league: but if he was for continuing the war, all the danger would be, his powerfully assisting the Scots to invade England: That therefore, the northern Frontiers were to be secured, after which, a good Fleet would no endanger any Succours sent from France, that without doubt that Kingdom would soon grow weary of so burdensome a War: That besides, it was unlikely that Philip, in the Negotiation of Peace, would abandon England to the King of France's ambition: That a Peace thus concluded with France and Scotland, would afford time at least to provide against their attacks.

Such was the result of this Council, after which the Queen summoned a Parliament to meet the 23d of January, according to the resolution taken therein. At the same time, Doctor Parker was intrusted with the care of revising the Liturgy of Edward VI., and was ordered to communicate his Labours only to some chosen Persons (2).

Mean time, the Protestants growing impatient, and preaching publicly in several places, the Queen took occasion to publish a Proclamation, which clearly shew'd her intentions. She allowed the Gospels and Epistles, with the Lord's Prayer, Creed, Litany, and Ten Commandments to be read in English, but forbid all preaching on controversial Subjects, or any change in the Romish Rites, till it should be otherwise appointed by the Parliament. In this she followed the steps of the deceased Queen.

Queen Mary's Funeral, which was solemniz'd with great Pomp, finished this year (3). But before we proceed to the events of the next, it is necessary for clearness sake, to describe the affairs of the neighbouring States.

The War between France and Spain was manifestly drawing to a conclusion. The two Kings, equally weary of a War from which neither could expect any advantage, had kept their Armies all the Campaign in a state of inaction, for fear of obstructing a Peace. At last the Countess of Montmorency, who had been Prisoner in the Low-Countries ever since the Battle of St. Quintin, having made some Overtures of Peace to Philip, the principal articles were settled, after which, the two Kings sent their Plenipotentiaries to Cercamp, and then to Cambray. The principal obstacle to a Peace was the King of France's resolution to keep Calais, and Philip and Mary's insisting upon its being restor'd. But Mary dying, Philip no longer supported the interests of England with the same ardour as before, at least when he deputed of marrying Elizabeth. It was that expectation which caused him to stand out some time, and delay the conclusion of the Peace till the following year.

The 14th of March, Ferdinand I. was declared Emperor by the voluntary resignation of Charles V. his Brother, who enjoyed but two years, the repose he had chosen in relinquishing the care of his worldly concerns. He died the 17th of September (4).

As Scotland is to afford materials for great part of Elizabeth's History, a very particular account must be given of the affairs of that Kingdom. Without an accurate knowledge of what passed in Scotland, Elizabeth's conduct and policy cannot be understood.

The Queen Dowager of Scotland, Mother of the Queen Dauphiness, obtained the Regency of that Kingdom by the interest of the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine her Brothers; but was supported only by the Protestants. The Earl of Arran Chief of the House of Hamilton, had unwillingly resigned the Regency, though his resignation procur'd him the Duchy of Chateaubault in France (5), with twelve thousand Livres a year in land. The Archbishop of St. Andrews, his natural Brother, incessantly blam'd his imprudence, and by his Cabals amongst the Clergy, gave disturbance to the Regent. To break the measures of this Prelate, he turn'd to the Protestants, who were now grown considerable. This method succeeded, but withal she was oblig'd to connive at the meetings of the Protestants, and this indulgence greatly increas'd their number and strength.

Things remain'd in this state till the breach between France and Spain. As England coupl'd the cause of Philip II, and the Regent of Scotland could not possibly induce the Scots to declare war with Mary, she advis'd the King of France to hasten the Dauphin's marriage with the young Queen, and accordingly it was solemniz'd in April, 1558. This gave a considerable Turn to the affairs of Scotland. The Clergy, knowing how the Court of France stood affect'd to the Followers of the new Religion, did not question to be supported in their attempt to reduce the Protestants within the Pale of the Romish Church. On the other hand, the Regent no longer wanting the Protestants, began to look more coldly on them. To begin the work, the Archbishop of St. Andrews having summon'd before him an aged Priest (7), who had discontinued the Mass, ordered him to be burnt alive in his Archiepiscopal City, to the great grief and discontent of the Inhabitants. This Lillay being made, the Bishop cited a Minister called Paul Mifsan with design to make him suffer the same punishment, but as they saw the People began to be mov'd, the Trial was deferr'd to another opportunity. Some time after, a

(1) Basil, Clerk of the Council, gave this Advice to Sir William Cecil, who the Consultation was held about reforming Religion: That the Parliament under Queen Mary should be declared void as the first was under a heretic, and the Title of Supreme Head, was set out in the Statute to the contrary, but it was taken away by Law; from whence he inferred, that there had been no true Parliaments, and consequently the Laws of Edward were still in force; but this Proposal was rejected. Burnet, Tom II. p. 376.

(2) The Persons employed in this Rev. (1) were, according to Burnet, Dr. Matthew Parker, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Richard Cox, afterwards Bishop of Ely, Dr. May, Dr. Bill, Dr. Thomas Pilkington, afterwards Bishop of Durham, Sir Thomas Smith, Mr. Des d'Wichhead, Mr. Edmund Grindal, afterwards Bishop of London, and then Archbishop of Canterbury. The management of this Affair, and the care to have it done, was left to William Parr Master of Requests, Francis Russell Earl of Bedford, John Grey of Ely, and Sir William Cecil. Cameron, p. 371.

1558. profection annually made at Edinburgh (1), raised a fort of Commotion, which shewed that the Protestants were no more afraid to appear. The Regent had a farther conviction, when he was told that Mifan, condemned for Non-appearance, was openly protected in the County of Fife. These were as preludes to what was to follow. In fine, some Gentlemen of Fife and Angus, dispersing themselves through the Counties, encouraged the Protestants to stand upon their defence, and not suffer their lives to be taken away on pretence of Religion, demonstrating to them that their number was greater in Scotland than That of the Catholics. This occasioned an Association under the Hands and Seals of the Associates, and was the first that was formed in Scotland in defence of the new Religion. The Protestants perceiving themselves stronger since this Association, which was called the Congregation, sent to the Regent a Petition, that the worship of God might be in the vulgar Tongue, and the Communion given in both Kinds, which was strongly opposed by the Bishops. But the Regent being told, that an absolute Refusal might throw all Scotland into a flame, he endeavoured to soften the Bishops, by a promise of her protection at a more seasonable juncture. Mean time, he permitted the Protestants to celebrate divine Service in their own Tongue, provided this was done without Tumults, or publick Assemblies in Edinburgh and Leith (2). But the Clergy not liking this politic circumspection of the Regent, met together to consult upon this affair, and resolved to prosecute the Heretics with the extremest rigour. The Protestants deputed John Arscin, afterwards Earl of Mar, to the Bishops assembled, to demand of them, that divine Service might be performed in the vulgar Tongue; but this was unanimously rejected. Such was the situation of the affairs in Scotland, when Elizabeth ascended the Throne of England, and till the end of the year 1558.

In the beginning of the following year, Elizabeth conferred Honours on some Persons, whom she was pleased to distinguish, whether on account of their Merit, or because she expected some important Services from them. William Parr, Marquis of Northampton, who had been sentenced to death in the Reign of Mary, and afterwards pardoned, was restored to his Honours. Edward Seymour, eldest Son of the late Duke of Somerfet, was created Earl of Hertford, notwithstanding all the precautions of the Duke his Father, to cause his Titles to descend to the Children of his second Marriage. Thomas Howard, second Son of the Duke of Norfolk, was created Viscount Bindon. Henry Carey, the Queen's Cousin (3), and Oliver St. John, were raised to the Dignity of Barons. All these Peers were Protestants, and consequently very proper to promote the Queen's designs in the House of Lords.

These Promotions being over, the Queen was crowned in Westminster Abbey (4), with the usual Ceremonies. The See of Canterbury being vacant, this Office belonged to the Archbishop of Tork, but he, with the other Bishops, refused to assist at the Solemnity, because Elizabeth by Proclamation, and by admitting into her Council, Men who passed not for good Catholics, had sufficiently declared against the Church of Rome. Oglethorpe of Carlisle was the only Bishop that at last was persuaded to do the Office, notwithstanding the murmurs of his Brethren. It seems, that the Bishops thought the Ministry of a Bishop so essential to a Coronation, that, in refusing to perform the Ceremony, they could deprive the Queen of her Dignity.

The Parliament meeting the 25th of January (5), Sir Nicolas Bacon, Keeper of the Great Seal (6), opened it with a Speech, in which he displayed the Merits of the new Queen, with bitter reflections on the late Ministry for the loss of Calais. He told them, that the Queen desired an immediate application to the affairs of Religion; that a division in that respect, was one of the Evils which called for the most speedy Redress. He exhorted the Parliament to proceed between the two Extremes of Superstition and Irreligion, which might re-unite the Adherents of both Religions in the same publick Worship.

Dr. Burnet has so largely described in his History, the manner of restoring the Reformation in England by the Parliament, that I believe I may be excused descending to particulars, and the more, as this Subject chiefly relates to Church-History. I shall content my self therefore with only pointing to the Acts made in this Session, to spare the Reader the trouble of turning over his History. I shall however observe, that this Author seems to have been mistaken in placing the Acts (most of which were made in February and March) after the Peace, which was not concluded till April. But this is not very material.

At first, to try how the Parliament was inclined, a motion was made in the Lower-House, for restoring to the Crown the Tents, First-Fruits, and Improvements, [under the Crown, rendered by Queen Mary.] This motion was immediately approved; and the House of Lords consented to it, notwithstanding the opposition of the Bishops (7).

The 4th of February, the House of Commons addressed to the Queen in a very dutiful manner, and represented to her, how necessary it was for the happiness of the Nation, that she should think of marrying. The Queen graciously thanked the Commons, and told them how much she was pleased, that they had neither limited Time nor Place. She added, that by the Ceremony of her Inauguration, she was married to her People, and her Subjects were to her instead of Children: They would not want a Successor when she died; and for her part, she would be well contented, that the Marble should tell Posterity, HERE LIES A QUEEN THAT REIGNED SO LONG, AND LIVED AND DIED A VIRGIN.

Some days after, the Lords passed a Bill to recognize Elizabeth for lawful Queen, in virtue of an Act of the 35th of Henry VIII. Some thought it strange that the Sentence of her Mother's Divorce, and the subsequent Act declaring Elizabeth illegitimate, were not annulled. C Camden says, this omission was with design, and Burnet reports the reasons which determined the House of Lords to be silent on this point. The first was, that the possession of the Crown purged all defects, according to a received maxim, when Henry VII. mounted the Throne. But this reason had not appeared sufficient to Mary, who was in the same case with Elizabeth, and yet had procured a repeal of that Act, which declared her illegitimate. The second reason was, that this Act could not be repealed, without casting some dishonour on the memory of Henry VIII, and it was the Queen's interest rather to conceal than publicly expose her Father's weakness. I own, this reason appears to me very unsatisfactory. For why was the reputation of Henry VIII. to be spared, if it could not be done without endangering the safety of the reigning Queen? Besides, it was not exposing Faults which till then had been concealed, but Faults known to all the World. The third reason was, that too scrupulous an inquiry on this head, would render the Queen's Right more uncertain, instead of making it less disputable. This, probably, was the prevailing reason, though to suffer the Sentence and Act to subsist, seems to have been equally dangerous. It was establishing a Precedent in favour of Bastards, which might have ill consequences. And who knows but it may ill affect future Ages? Besides, this regard for the honour of Henry, left an eternal blot upon the memory of Elizabeth. At least her Enemies, and particularly the Queen of Scotland, were thereby furnished with a plausible pretence to wrest the Scepter from her, if a favorable opportunity offered. Dr. Burnet thinks the conduct of this Parliament equally Pious and Wise. I allow the first: But the continued endeavours to dethrone Elizabeth, wholly founded on the Sentence of her Mother's divorce, and the subsequent Act, will not permit me to believe it Wisdom to leave them unrepelled.

The Act to recognize the Queen's Title being passed, the Parliament turned to the Affairs of Religion, and made divers Statutes, which I shall but just mention.

The first appointed the Publick Worship to be performed in the vulgar Tongue (8).

The second restored the Queen to her right of Supremacy in the Church of England.

The third renewed and confirmed all the Acts made in the Reign of Edward VI, concerning Religion. And in this many others were included.

(1) September 1. St. Giles's day, whom the Inhabitants of Edinburgh honour as their Patron. Buchan. l. 16.

(2) Buchanan and Melvil differ in relation to the time when this Toleration was granted to the Reformed. Rapin.

(3) Her Cousin German by Mary Boleyn.

(4) January 14. Stow p. 635. The 15th, says Sandford, p. 509. and the 25th according to Hollingsb. p. 1180. But it appears from Rymer's Fœd. that it was on the 14th. A Patent was granted to Henry Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundel, to perform the Office of High-Constable on the day before the Coronation, and the Office of High-Steward on the Coronation-day. Rymer, Tom. XV. p. 494. 495.

(5) It met the 25th, and was prorogued to the 25th.

(6) He was the first that was by Patent created Lord Keeper. Formerly those that were Keepers of the Seal, had no Dignity nor Authority annexed to their Office; they did not hear Causes, nor preside in the House of Lords, but were only to put the Seal to such Writs or Patents as went in course; and so the Seal was only put in the Hands of the Keeper, but for some short intervals. But now Bacon was the first Lord-Keeper that had all the Dignity and Authority of Lord-Chancellor conferred on him. He was Father to the great Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans, and was one of the most learned, most pious, and wisest Men of the Nation. Burnet, Tom. II. p. 380.

(7) This Bill was read in the House of Lords, January 30, 31, and February 4. and in the House of Commons, February 6, 17, and 21. The Bishops that opposed it were, Heath Archbishop of Tork, Banner Bishop of London, Pates Bishop of Worcester, Kitching of Landaff, Bayne of Coweney, Turberville of Exeter, Sir of Gloucester, Oglethorpe of Carlisle. Dewes's Years, p. 19.

(8) And accordingly it began to be so on May 8, which was Wednesday. Stow, p. 639.

1559. The fourth restored to the Queen the nomination of the Bishops. By this Statute likewise many others were confirmed, made in the Reign of Henry VIII. against the Pope. The Queen was empowered to put the exercise of her Supremacy into what hands she should think proper. Moreover, all persons in publick employments were obliged to swear, that they acknowledged the Queen to be the supreme Governor in all causes, as well Ecclesiastical as Temporal, and that they would be true to her Majesty, and should bear the Queen true Allegiance. Whoever refused this Oath, was declared incapable of holding any publick Office. Lastly, divers Penalties were enacted against any, who, by word or writing, tended to set forth or advance any foreign power in the Kingdom.

By a sixth, the Parliament impowered the Queen to reserve to herself the Lands belonging to the Bishopsricks, as they became void, giving in lieu of them their full value in impropriated Tythes.

By a seventh Act, all Religious Houses were annexed to the Crown.

By an eighth, the deprivation of Popish Bishops in King Edward's Reign was declared valid.

In a word, the Parliament, in this Session, restored Religion to the same state as in Edward VI's Reign, and after a Grant of a Subsidy, two Tenths, and two Fifteenths, with Tunnage and Poundage for the Queen's life it was dissolved the 8th of May (2).

Among the Bishops then in England, some there were, who had complied with all the Changes in Religion since Henry's Breach with the Pope. Of this number were Heath Archbishop of York, Tanshal Bishop of Durham, Thirley Bishop of Ely, and some others. These chose to absent themselves from the Parliament, because, as they saw the Queen's intention, they durst neither openly oppose it, nor assist in restoring the Reformation, after so publick a desertion of it in the last Reign. Both appeared to them equally inconvenient. Other Bishops strongly opposed these Acts, but with no success. Some of the Lay-Peers also endeavoured to stem the torrent, and even entered their Protests, but their number was very small. To say all in a word, the same thing happened in this, as in the Parliament under Henry, Edward, and Mary, that is, the Court caused to be enacted almost whatever they pleased. This is not very strange, with regard to the House of Commons, where the Members may be changed every new Parliament. But the readiness wherewith the House of Lords consented, one while to Acts favouring the Reformation, another while, to those establishing the Romish Religion, is much more surprising.

The Supremacy with which the Queen was lately invested, with power to depute any Persons to exercise it in her name, gave rise to a new Court, called the High-Commission Court. It was composed of a certain number of Commissioners, who exercised the same power, which had been formerly lodged by Henry VIII. in a single Person, with the Title of Viceregent.

While the Parliament was taken up with affairs of Religion, some Preachers having in divers places delivered Doctrines from the Pulpit, tending to overthrow the Reformation, the Queen, following the Precedent set her by Edward and Mary, forbid all preaching without a special Licence under the Great Seal. This fired the Lower-House of Convocation, and produced a Petition to the Queen, in which were boldly asserted the Doctrines of the Church of Rome. This gave occasion to a Proposition for a Conference between nine Doctors, on each side, to examine the reasons of Both. This Conference was held the beginning of April. But the Roman Catholics reflecting, that they had undertaken more than they could answer, in thus bringing the Doctrines of their Religion into question, without being authorized by the Pope, refused to give their reasons in writing, though that had been agreed. At last, they plainly declared, it was not in their power to dispute on Points already decided (3). They had not been so scrupulous in the Reign of Mary, because then the success of the Conference was known beforehand. This gave the Protestants cause to triumph, and pretend that their Adversaries durst not enter the Lists.

To finish what I have to say at present on Religion, I shall only add, that the Reformation having been established by publick Authority, of 9400 beneficed Clergymen in the Kingdom, only fourteen Bishops (4), twelve Archdeacons, fifteen Heads of Colleges, fifty Canons, 1100 eighty Parochial Priests, chose to quit their Preference rather than their Religion. Their Places being filled with Protestants, England became entirely reformed, very shortly after having seen the Reformed sent to the Flames. It is now time to return to Political Affairs.

While Philip had any hopes of marrying Elizabeth, his Plenipotentiaries assembled with those of England and France at Calais, to the Crown of England. But when his expectations were disappointed by the change in England with regard to Religion, he deserted Elizabeth, and made a separate Peace, or at least settled, with France the principal Articles. It is pretended that in this Treaty, by which France resigned 198 Places to Spain, or her Allies, in exchange for three only, there was a secret Article of a mutual promise between the two Kings to extirpate Heretics. This done, the Spaniards, from Parties, as they were before, became Mediators between France and England. But they acted so faintly, that it was plain, they did not much concern themselves in Elizabeth's Affairs. Philip's defection therefore obliged the Queen to conclude a Peace on any Terms, the Continuation of the War being no way favorable to her Affairs, or to the measures she was now taking to introduce the Reformation into England. By a Treaty therefore signed the 2d of April, it was agreed,

That the King of France should have Calais, and the other places in Picardy conquered upon the English, eight years; after which, he should be obliged to restore them to the Queen of England.

That within the space of six Months, seven foreign Merchants, not Subjects of the French King, should engage for the payment of 500000 Crowns of Gold to Elizabeth, as a penal Fine, in case the Restitution of the Places within the time limited, was either refused or delayed by Henry or his Successors. And that notwithstanding, whether the said Sum was paid or not paid, the King of France and his Successors should remain under the Obligation to restore Calais and the other Places, as they engaged by this Treaty. Moreover that the King of France should deliver to the Queen, as Hostages till the promised Security was given, Ferry de Faix Count of Candale, and Capitai de Buch, Lewis de St. Maure Marquis of Nefle and Count of Laval, Gaston de Foix Marquis of Trans, Antoine du Prat President of the Parliament of Paris, and the Lord Nantouillet.

These are the exprefs Words of the Treaty, of which the French Historians give us only the pretended meaning, by turning them after their own manner. Mazarin says, It was covenanted that Henry should either restore Calais and the other Conquests, or if he liked it better, the Sum of 500000 Crowns, which being referred to his Opinion, there was no doubt he would keep this place, which was the Key of his Kingdom.

Neither has Father Daniel given us the very Terms of the Treaty, which perhaps he had never seen. He contents himself with relating the Sense, adding an explication which entirely changes the Nature of the Treaty. Elizabeth, says this Historian, could not without giving offence to the English, make an absolute Surrender of Calais to France. Besides, she saw the King determined not to part with it; a middle way was therefore taken, which left this Prince in possession of Calais for eight years, at the end of which he promised to restore it, on Forfeiture of 500000 Crowns to the English. That notwithstanding this payment, which was to be made on a refusal or delay of Restitution, the English were allowed to use force for the Recovery of Calais. By these last Words he explains the Sense of those in the Original Treaty. — That whether the Sum was paid or not paid, the King of France and his Successors should be bound to the Restitution of Calais, as they engaged by this Treaty. This shews how we ought to be upon our guard against the national partiality of Historians. I shall add here upon this Article, that Calais never was restored, that the 500000 Crowns were never paid, and when Elizabeth demanded Calais, at the expiration of the Term, the Court

(3) The Points to be disputed in this Conference were, Worship in an unknown Tongue, the Power of particular Churches to alter Rites and Ceremonies, and the Populay Sacrifice in the Mass. The Conference was begun the 31st of March in Windsor Abbey, before the Privy-Council, both Houses of Parliament, and infinite Crowds of People. The Protestant Divines were, Stave Bishop of Chichester, Cox, Flowerd, Gordale, Horn, Jones, Griff, Almer, and Trevel. And the Popish were, the Bishops of Windsor, Lincoln, Carlisle, Chichester, Conventry, and Landaff, Cole Dean of St. Paul's, Langdale Archbishop of Leicester, Hampford Archbishop of Canterbury, and Cochey Archbishop of Bristol. of Calais.

Another Article of the Treaty was, that neither the King of France, nor the King and Queen of Scotland, nor the Queen of England, should attempt any thing against one another, directly or indirectly, in prejudice of this Treaty. That if the Queen of England violated this Article, the King of France, and the King and Queen of Scotland should be freed from their Engagements, and their Hostages and Securities be discharged. In like manner, if the violation came from the King of France, he should be obliged to restore Calais, and the other places, as if the eight years were expired; and if he refused to make this Restitution, the Securities and Hostages should still remain bound.

That the Fortifications of Aymouth, and all others made in Scotland since the Treaty of Bauge, should be demolished.

That all the other Pretensions of the King of France, of the King and Queen of Scotland, and of the Queen of England, with all their exceptions, should remain entire, in the expectation that Providence would produce some good opportunity to terminate them by a Peace.

That the forementioned Princes or Princesses should not afford a Retreat or Protection to each other's Rebels, but reciprocally deliver them to one another.

X. 1. 515.

The same day, a Treaty was signed between the Queen of England and the King and Queen of Scotland, of which these are the principal Articles.

That neither of the Parties should fall upon the Dominions now possessed by the other, neither in Person or otherwise.

That they should give no aid to attack the Dominions of one another, to any Person, in whatsoever degree of Consanguinity or Affinity he might be related to them, or whatever might be his Quality.

That they should not receive or entertain Rebels, Fugitives, Malefactors, &c.

That in three Months, the Fortifications of Aymouth, and all others erected in Scotland since the Treaty of 1549, should be razed.

That all other mutual Claims and Pretensions should remain entire.

That in two Months, Commissioners should be appointed on both sides, to settle certain Articles, concerning which the Ambassadors of France were not sufficiently instructed.

Francis and Mary ratified this Treaty the 18th of April, and the 1st of May the Commissioners of the two Kingdoms at Upsalinton, signed a second Treaty upon the Articles left undecided in the first.

Elizabeth having concluded a Peace with France and Scotland with more ease and honour than she had reason to expect, flattered herself, she was going to enjoy a settled tranquillity. But the quickly perceived, she had little cause to triumph. Henry II. had made a Peace with her, only because Philip II. who had engaged Mary his Queen in this war, was resolved not to sign the Peace before Elizabeth had concluded her's. It was of little moment to Philip, that she found great advantages in the Peace, or the King of France observed his Treaty with her, provided it appeared to the World that Spain had not deserted England. This was all he desired, and probably what facilitated the Peace. Henry II. granted, no doubt, more than he intended to perform, as well to give this satisfaction to the King of Spain, as to disengage him from the Interest of England. He soon discovered he had no other intention.

Ambassadors from France being come to Brussels to see the Peace sworn, Secretary Arday, who was there from the Dauphin King, and the Queen Dauphines, gave them the Titles of King and Queen of Scotland, England, and Ireland. Shortly after, Elizabeth heard, that the King of France had ordered Francis and Mary to assume the same Titles, and quarter the Arms of England in their Seal, their Plate, their Furniture, that no one might be ignorant of their Pretensions. Sir Nicolas Throckmorton the English Ambassador in France, complained of this Usurpation with great freedom, but the frivolous Answer to his Complaints let him see the little regard France had for his Mistress. Mesnari says, the Ambassador was told, That this was agreeable to the Custom of Germany, where the Cadets, or younger Branches, bore the Title and Arms of the chief of their Family (1). Camden adds, that the Court of France pretended, that all Princes and Princesses had a Right to bear the Arms of their House with a Bar. But, besides that Francis and Mary bore them without any such distinction, they moreover assumed the Title of King and Queen of England (2). In short, the Court of France being pressed upon this Affair, answered the Ambassador, that the King and Queen of Scotland had only taken the Arms of England to oblige Elizabeth to quit those of France. To this Throckmorton replied, That twelve Kings of England had carried the Arms and Title of Kings of France, without being obliged by any Treaty to quit them. But his reasons were not heard, and notwithstanding all his Complaints, Francis and Mary still bore the Title they had usurped. Camden affirms, the Constable of Montmorency, by his arguments induced them to relinquish it, but assuredly he is mistaken. Thus though the Court of France would not openly declare their Thoughts of Elizabeth, it was manifest, she was regarded as a Bastard, and the Crown of England was pretended to be devolved upon Mary. Accordingly, Elizabeth did not suffer herself to be deceived. From this time she considered Mary as a dangerous Rival, and the Princes of Lorraine her Uncles, the Authors of this usurpation, as her most mortal Enemies. The death of Henry, a little after, instead of discouraging the design to place Mary on the Throne of England, only gave it fresh vigour. The Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine, governing all under Francis II, Successor to Henry, never ceased inciting the young King to send Forces into Scotland, to render himself absolute master of that Kingdom, and then attack Elizabeth from that quarter. But because this project was founded upon the present situation of the Scotch Affairs, it is necessary to resume the Recital at the place where I left off the last year.

Shortly after the Marriage of the young Queen with the Dauphin, the affairs of Scotland began to be terribly embroiled. The Princes of Lorraine having formed the design to attack England by Scotland, believed it impracticable, till the King and Queen were rendered absolute in their Kingdom. They knew, it would be difficult to persuade the States of Scotland to be the instruments of their ambition, in making war upon Elizabeth, in order to place the Crown of England on the head of their Queen. The number of Protestants was now so considerable in Scotland, that they were almost masters in the Assemblies of the States. Consequently, it appeared impossible, to draw them into the Project of dethroning a Protestant Queen, who was establishing their Religion in England, to place a Catholic Queen on that Throne, who would thereby be enabled to destroy the Reformation in both Kingdoms. It was therefore necessary to find an excuse for sending an Army into Scotland, to strengthen the Catholic Party, which, probably, would be more ready and zealous to favour the enterprize. It was with this view, Melvil, that they obtained of Henry II. an order to the Queen-Regent, and to d'Orsly, Commander of the French and Scotch Forces in the Pay of France, to suffer no other Religion in Scotland than the Roman Catholic (3). They easily foresaw, this Order would produce troubles in Scotland, and furnish them with a pretence to send thither an Army.

The Regent, upon the receipt of this Order, began to execute it, with publishing an Edict (4) conformable to the King's Will, or rather of the two Princes his Brothers, who, as will afterwards be seen, had not discovered their whole Project to the King. The Protestants, in several Deputations to the Queen-Regent, represented to her the unreasonableness of rigour, considering their number, but she would hearken to nothing. At this time, the City of Perth, alias St. John's Town, having publicly embraced the Reformed Religion, the Regent summoned the States to Sterling, and cited thither the Reformed Ministers, in order to banish them the Kingdom by a solemn decree (5). The Ministers appeared at Sterling to defend their Cause, being attended with infinite crowds of People unarmed, who were come to assist them in their defence, agreeably to the custom of Scotland (6). The Regent, astonished at the sight, prayed John Arskine to prevail with the Multitudes to retire, promising that nothing should be decreed in the States against the Ministers. Arskine succeeded, and the Ministers, with all their Atten-

But they were no sooner gone, than they were condemned for Non-appearance, according to the Citation. Arskine was so enraged, to be made the Queen's instrument to deceive the Protestants, that he resolved to be revenged. For this purpose, he went to the Nobility of Strathern, Angus, and Moray, who were assembled upon the News of what passed at Sterling, and persuaded them to take Arms.

This News being brought to Perth, Knox the Minister, a celebrated Preacher, animated the People by a Sermon, which, while the principal Citizens were at dinner, sent the Rabble into the Churches, who broke the Images, and entirely destroyed the Monastery of the Carthusians. The Inhabitants of Cupar immediately followed the example of the People of Perth. The Regent vexed to see her Edict contemned, and willing to prevent the consequences of this disobedience, resolved to chastise the Inhabitants of Perth. To this end, she assembled some Forces, and, attended by the Earls of Argyle and Abol, marched directly to Perth. But approaching the Town, she was informed, the Earl of Glencairn (1) was incamped in the Neighbourhood with seven thousand Men. This news determined her to offer the Earl and his Associates certain Conditions, which were accepted. Amongst other Articles it was agreed, That the Scotch Forces on both sides should be dismissed, and the French removed at a certain distance from Perth (2). That the Queen should be respectfully received into the City, and suffered to lodge in it some days, provided she would make no alterations: Lastly, that the differences concerning Religion should be referred to the decision of the States. The Confederates having dismissed their Forces, the Regent came to Perth, and entered, with some Scotch Troops in the pay of France, which was considered by the Confederates, as a violation of the Treaty (3). But this was not all they had cause to complain of. The Regent restored the Mass in Perth, and resolving to make it a place of Arms, left a Garrison in the Town.

Hence the Earl of Argyle and James Stuart, Prior of St. Andrew's, and natural Son to James V, took occasion to declare against the Regent, and levy forces to support the Protestants. They had some time before embraced the Reformation, though hitherto they had adhered to the Regent. Shortly after, the Inhabitants of St. Andrew's and some other Towns, declaring themselves Protestants, committed several disorders in the Catholic Churches. Whereupon the Regent assembled an Army, composed of two thousand French, and one thousand Scots, and, giving the command to the Duke of Chateleant, sent him to chastise the Inhabitants of Cupar, who had declared next after those of Perth. But the Duke hearing, the Confederates were marching with superior Forces, to give him Battle, informed the Regent of it, who was then at Falkland. She tried at first to amuse them with new Propositions, till she had re-inforced her Army. But the Confederates perceiving her artifice, marched to Perth, and became masters of the Town in few days. Afterwards, Stone, Sterling, and Linlithgo, were secured by them, and as their Army daily increased, the Regent and d'Oysel were obliged to withdraw to Dunbar.

Mean time, the Regent had writ to the Court of France, that James, Prior of St. Andrew's, was the principal Author of the troubles of Scotland, and that, being natural Son of James V, he designed to seize the Crown. The Princes of Lorrain, Brothers to the Regent, embraced this occasion to insinuate to Henry II, that Religion was not concerned in the troubles of Scotland, and was only made the pretence to wrest the Crown from the Dauphin and the Queen his Spouse. By this insinuation, they had inspired the King with the resolution of sending a good Army into Scotland, and he had now begun his Levies in Germany. But the Constable of Montmercy having discovered the design of these Princes, to engage him in very difficult Projects, prevailed with him to proceed no farther, till he was more particularly informed of the Scotch Troubles. The business was only to find a Person in whom the King could confide. The Constable offered, for this purpose, James Melville, a Scotch Gentleman, his domestick, and gave him his Instructions, in the presence of the King himself. These Instructions were, as he says himself in his Memoirs, "That the King had been informed by the Cardinal of Lorrain, that James Stuart, Prior of St. Andrew's, pretended, under colour of Religion, to usurp the Kingdom unto himself; and that the King desired to know certainly, if this was the source from whence the troubles in that Kingdom flowed; or whether Stuart was moved to take Arms only for Conscience sake, in defence of his Religion, himself, his dependants and associates. In the first case, the King was resolved to hazard his Crown, and all that he had, rather than that the Queen his Daughter-in-law should be robbed of her Right; and he resolved to send an Army to Scotland for that effect, though he would gladly shun the trouble thereof, if it were possible. That in the second case, if it was only Religion that moved the Scots, the King would have no concern in their affairs, but committed their Souls unto God, for he had difficulty enough to rule the Consciences of Frenchmen. And it was the Obedience due unto their lawful Queen, with the Body, that the King desired. That finally, he could not persuade himself, that the Scots had made an Insurrection against the Regent without cause, and therefore desired to know if the Regent had any ill will to the Scots, by whom, and at whose instance. That if d'Oysel, who was reported to be choleric, hasty, and too passionate, was not acceptable to the Scots, that the King had been ill informed by the Cardinal of Lorrain, to engage him to send an Army into Scotland, and of this, probably, the Constable meant to give him a demonstration, by the Report Melville was to make him. In effect, Melville having had a Conference with the Queen Regent at Falkland, and afterwards with the Earl of St. James, reported that the Queen Regent was so far from the thoughts of aspiring to the Crown, that he was ready to banish himself perpetually out of Scotland, on the first orders from his Majesty (4).

Henry II, being dead before Melville returned to Paris (5), the confederate Scots preposterously imagined, there was no farther danger, and most of them returned to their homes. The Regent and d'Oysel being informed of it, resolved to improve this negligence, and marched with some troops to Edinburgh, hoping to surprize those who remained there. But the Duke of Chateleant and the Earl of Morton knowing, the Confederates were arming again with all possible diligence, waited on the Regent, and persuaded her to consent to a Truce from the 24th of July to the 10th of January. This Truce was equally necessary to both Parties. The Confederates wanted to put themselves in a posture of defence; and the Regent hoped, that in this Interval, she should receive a powerful aid from her Son-in-law the King of France. Accordingly, at the Solicitation of the Princes of Lorrain, he immediately sent her a thousand Foot, with the promise of a more considerable Supply.

During these transactions, the Earl of Arran, Son to the Duke of Chateleant, being at the Court of France, and receiving notice that he was to be arrested on some pretence, made his escape, and came to Scotland. As he was, after the Duke his Father, next Heir to the young Queen, he believed, upon some well or ill-grounded advices, that the Duke of Guise and Cardinal of Lorrain designed to secure, and perhaps murder him, for fear, if the Queen died, he should mount the Throne, for he had declared himself a Protestant. He was no sooner in Scotland than he gained his Father to the Confederates, who put him at their head.

Mean time, the Regent and d'Oysel were busy in fortifying Leith, and storing it with all sorts of provisions, designing to make it a place of Arms, and to expect there, the Supplies that were to come from France. The Confederates pretended this to be a breach of the Truce, whether they proceeded upon some general maxim, or on some particular Articles of the late Treaty. However this be, after some fruitless complaints to the Regent, they assembled their forces, and marched to besiege Leith. But as they suffered themselves to be amused for some time, they came too late, and finding the place in a state of defence, desisted from the siege. Shortly after, the Regent having received a new supply of two thousand Men commanded by La Druffe, continued the fortifications of Leith, with greater application than ever. The Confederates once more desired her to give over the work: but were not heard. As the saw herself sufficiently strong, she only answered by sending a Herald, with an order to lay down their Arms. Their indignation to be thus deceived by the Regent, induced them at last to publish, that they would treat as enemies all that obeyed her orders. But they were little able to make good this Bravado. The Regent knowing, they were at Edinburgh in small number, marched, the beginning of November, with all her forces to attack them, and so surprized them by her unexpected arrival, that they deserted Edinburgh, and retired to Sterling. When they were there, they sent William Maitland of Lidington to desire her assistance. Indeed, the French Troops still continuing to pursue them, obliged them also to quit Sterling, and retire to the Mountains, where they divided into two Bodies, to embarrass their enemies, who gave them no rest. Some time after, they received Letters from William Maitland, giving them hopes of a good Success of his negotiation. Such was the origin of the Scotch troubles, on which I have been forced to enlarge, the better to show what concerns Elizabeth was to have in them, since she was their principal object. As this is a material point in the History of this Queen, and as, upon the knowledge of the designs formed against her repose, she regulated her conduct, I ought to support this truth by the testimony of a French Historian, who cannot be suspected in this affair. Father Daniel thus expresses himself in the reign of Francis II.

France.

“ I observ’d, that before the conspiracy of Amboise broke out, la Renaudie had been sent by the Admiral into England, to engage Elizabeth to make a diversion in Scotland, while the Calvinistical Party revolted in France, and she knew her interest too well, to neglect so favorable an opportunity of kindling or fomenting a civil war in the two Kingdoms. Whatever care she had taken to bridle the Catholics of her Kingdom, she was always apprehensive of a Party forming against her in favour of the Queen of France, who carried herself as Heiress of the Crown of England, and had quartered the Arms with those of Scotland, when she was only Queen Dauphines; and if France and Scotland had remained in tranquillity, England, was in danger of being attack’d from two quarters at once, and disturb’d at home by the still numerous adherents of the old Religion.”

Hence may be seen, what was the design of the Princes of Lorraine, in sending a French Army into Scotland. It was to preserve the Peace of that Kingdom, that is, render it entirely subject to France, in order to attack England from that side. This must be ever remembered, if it is desired to understand perfectly Elizabeth’s History. Let us now mention the affairs of France.

Affairs of France.
Mazarin.

After Henry II. had concluded a Peace with Spain, he resolved to relinquish entirely the affairs of Italy, and apply himself solely to his Project of uniting England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the Monarchy of France. His haste to cause the Dauphin his Son, and the Queen of Scotland his Daughter-in-law, to assume the Title of King and Queen of England, immediately after the conclusion of the Peace, clearly shows, he had the thing in his head, though he was not yet perhaps resolved how to execute it. Elizabeth, who was on the Throne of England, was but a Woman, and might be considered as a Bastard: She had no Ally: had lately made a great many Enemies amongst her Subjects, by her innovations in Religion: The King of Spain no longer concerned himself with her affairs; and the Pope desired nothing more passionately than to dethrone her, and place a Catholic Prince in her room. All these circumstances doubtless gave Henry hopes of success in his design. To effect which, he was to show a great zeal for the Catholic Religion, to gain the Professors of it, Princes and Subjects, to his Interests. The persecution renewed in France immediately after the Peace of Cateau, flowed perhaps as much from this as any other cause, though the King’s disposition, the Pope’s solicitations, the suggestions of the Duke of Guise and Cardinal of Lorraine, and the secret Treaty made with Spain, had but too large a share in that Tragedy.

This Prince was taken out of the World the 10th of July, in the midst of his vast Projects, by a death sudden and tragical (1), leaving for Successor a young Prince incapable to govern of himself. The two Princes of Lorraine, Uncles to the young Queen, were intrusted with the Administration of the Government under the new Reign. They removed the Constable of Montmorency immediately from the Court, and recalled the Cardinal of Tournon, sworn Enemy of the Protestant Religion. When the affairs of the Court were settled, their next care was to erect Courts of Justice called Ardenres, for condemning Protestants to the Flames. This threw the Reformed into an inevitable Necessity, of either suffering themselves to be burnt one by one, or of taking Arms in their own defence, and so furnishing their Enemies with the desired pretence, to extirpate them all at once. On the other hand, they sent two thousand Men into Scotland, under the Command of La Broffe, with Orders to join the Catholics of England for dethroning Elizabeth. Thus, their boundless Ambition engaged a young Prince, not yet seventeen years of age, to throw his own Kingdom into a Flame, and withal to undertake the Conquest of England, which of all the Countries of the World is the most difficult to be conquered.

At the same time appeared the Seeds of troubles in the Low-Countries, which soon ripened, and which it will not be improper to mention, in order to show their rise.

Charles V. had always a great affection for the Low-Countries where he was born, and had governed them with great Lenity. Indeed, after the Victory of Pavia, he had formed the Project of changing their Government, and of making of the seventeen Provinces one State, dependent on the Crown of Spain. He was incited to this by the Spaniards, who would have found their advantage in seeing him absolute master of these Provinces, where his Authority was very much limited by their Privileges. But after mature deliberation, he relinquished this Project, whether to avoid the oppressions with which the execution would have been infallibly attended, or because he believed it impracticable, by reason of the different Laws and Customs of these Provinces, each of which had been a separate state.

Philip II. his Son and Successor, resumed much the same design, and resolved to rule independent of the Laws and Privileges, incessantly alleged by these States. To this he added the Project of extirpating the Protestants, then very numerous in these Provinces. For this purpose, he obtained from the Court of Rome the erection of several Archbishopsricks and Bishopsricks, to the great detriment of the Abbots, part of whose Revenues were to be given to these new Sees. But besides the interest of the Protestants and Abbots, there was another thing of universal Concern. Philip had put Spanish Garrisons into the principal Towns, contrary to the privileges of the Provinces, and thereby plainly discovered his intention of reducing them to slavery. In fine, when he departed in September, 1559, for Spain, he committed the Government of the Low-Countries to Margaret Duchesse of Parma his Aunt (2), to the great disgust of William of Nassau, Prince of Orange, and of Count Egmont, who had both aspired to that Dignity. But what gave them the last provocation, was his leaving with the Governess the Cardinal of Granvelle their Enemy, and who was considered as the Author of the pernicious Counsels, tending to deprive the Country of its liberty. Philip was no sooner arrived in Spain, than he caused a great number of Protestants to be burnt, and by these inhuman executions, showed the Subjects of the Low-Countries what they were afterwards to expect.

To understand the sequel of this Reign, it is absolutely necessary to have a distinct Idea of the situation of the English affairs, as well with regard to the Queen’s Person, as to the People of England, and Foreigners. The wonder of this Reign lies not in the memorable Events which happened in England, while Elizabeth was on the Throne, but in the tranquillity which she caused her Subjects to enjoy, amidst the secret and open attacks of her own and their Enemies, both at home and abroad. To understand therefore the motives of Elizabeth’s Conduct, and the maxims by which she established her Government, these Enemies, their Characters, their Views, their Interests, are to be distinctly shewn. Hence also will be seen and admired the Address, with which she freed herself from all the embarrassments and snares to which she was continually exposed. For this purpose, it must be observed, that her Right to the Crown was always contested openly or tacitly; that the Papists in general considering her but as a Queen de facto, believed they might with a safe Conscience assist in dethroning her, whenever an opportunity offered. As the uncertainty of her Right was the foundation on which her Enemies built, I cannot help enlarging a little on what has been said above on this Subject.

The Parliament of England, consisting of the King and both Houses, which represent the whole Nation, there is no Englishman but what is subject to its Laws, were it only for this reason, that every Man is supposed to give his consent either in Person, or by his Representative. It was upon this foundation that Mary and Elizabeth ascended the Throne, I mean, in virtue of an Act of Parliament, empowering their Father to settle the Succession. But it may be doubted, whether foreign Princes concerned in such Acts of Parliament, are obliged to the same submission, when they believe them manifestly unjust to themselves. I shall not discuss the question, which is more usually determined by Arms than by Laws. I shall only remark, that formerly Edward III. did not think himself obliged to abide by the decision of the French Nation, which had placed Philip of Valois on the Throne. However this be, Mary Queen of France and Scotland believed herself injured, as well by the Act impowering Henry VIII. to interrupt the order of Succession according to his humour, as by the Will of that Prince. She alleged, that neither King nor Parliament had any right to place on the Throne two Daughters declared illegitimate by solemn Acts, and still left to overlook the posterity of the eldest Daughter of Henry VII. even without assigning any reason, and place in the line of the Succession, Bastards, and the Children of the younger. To these two grievances it was answered, that the English in acknowledging successively Mary and Elizabeth for Queens of England, had not followed the caprice of Henry VIII. but the order of Nature, and the law of Succession; that the caprice of this Prince lay not in his placing his two Daughters next after his Son Edward, but in his intention to exclude these two Princesses really born in wedlock: That in restoring them to their due place, Henry corrected his error, and left no room for any alteration: That the not revoking the Sentence of Divorce against Ann Boleyn, and the subsequent Act against Elizabeth, was not without good reasons, and at most, was but a defect of formality, which altered not the thing itself. As to Mary's second Grievance, that Henry had not mentioned the Posterity of his eldest Sister, it must be owned, the generality of the English were convinced of the injustice of that Proceeding. But as the case which might breed a dispute on this Subject did not yet offer, this Point was left undetermined, in hopes of the Queen's Marriage, and her having Children to succeed her.

Let us now proceed to another Reflection with respect to the foreign Princes. Mary, eldest Daughter of Henry VIII. ascended the Throne without any disturbance from abroad, whereas after her death the principal Sovereigns of Europe endeavoured to wrest the Scepter from Elizabeth. It is not difficult to assign many natural causes of the different conduct of the Princes with regard to these two Queens. The first is, that when Mary mounted the Throne, there was not a Prince in Europe, who could with any colour dispute her right. It is true, the young Queen of Scotland was in France, and destined for the Dauphin, but was not yet married. This Marriage was only projected, and could not be executed some years, by reason of the tender Age of the Parties. But supposing Henry II. should have then asserted the Claim of this Queen, he must have drawn upon himself all the Forces of the Emperor, and England. The second cause is no less natural, namely, that by the principles of the Roman Catholics, they could not contest Mary's Right without a renunciation of the Papal Authority, since the dispensation for the Marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Arragon was granted by a Pope. But Henry II. was very far from any such thought, and as for the Emperor Charles V. he was particularly concerned to support Mary's Title, who was his Cousin-German. As for the Pope, he maintained his own Rights in supporting those of Mary. Lastly, as Mary was zealous for her Religion, the Pope, the Emperor, the King of France found a great advantage in this Zeal. The Pope expected to see the Catholic Religion restored by her means in England. The Emperor immediately projected her marriage with his Son Philip. Besides a Catholic Queen in England, removed all Apprehensions of the Aid the German Protestants might receive from the English. In a word, his Zeal for his Religion gave him the satisfaction, of seeing England about to return into the Pale of the Roman Church. For the same reason, Henry II. who burnt the Protestants in France, could not but be pleased to see them deprived of the Protection they might have expected from England, if that Kingdom had continued Protestant. Thus every thing conspired to render Mary's Reign peaceable and secure. It was also this, doubtless, which induced that Queen to carry the persecution against the Protestants to such a height, well knowing they could have no hopes of assistance from abroad.

But when, after Mary's death, Elizabeth mounted the Throne, there was a change in the Interests of the Princes, as often happens by the death of a Sovereign. The Empire and Spain were no longer under the Dominion of the same Prince. The Dauphin had married the Queen of Scotland, and by that Marriage acquired a claim to England, which he had not before. Besides, the Duke of Guise and Cardinal of Lorraine were become more powerful in the Court of France, by the absence of the Constable of Montmorency, who was Prisoner in the Low-Countries. After the death of Henry II. they became still more powerful, and showed by their Conduct, they had nothing more at heart than the placing of the Queen their Niece on the Throne of England. Elizabeth could not doubt it, since she saw Francis II. and Mary still usurp the Arms of England, which they seemed to have taken at first only in obedience to the orders of Henry II. On the other hand, Philip II. who despaired of marrying Elizabeth, had entirely deserted the Interests of England, and appeared by no means disposed to support that Kingdom, which was become Protestant. Lastly, the Pope saw his Authority banished England, and no hope of gaining Elizabeth, who was evidently concerned to maintain what she had done. Thus France, Spain, the Court of Rome, not only had no reason to incline them to support Elizabeth, but it was even their Interest to dethrone her. It is very true, Philip II. would not willingly have seen England and Ireland in the hands of the King of France; but he would not have been sorry that France was to conquer England, because from so difficult an Undertaking, he would have received the satisfaction of seeing two powers most formidable to him, weakening each other. Besides, his zeal for the Catholic Religion, and his projects in relation to the Low-Countries, would have made him with great pleasure behold these two Kingdoms incapable to assist those Provinces, which already bore their yoke with impatience. As to the new Emperor, Elizabeth, if she had nothing to fear, had at least nothing to hope, from him. As for the Protestants of Germany, they then lived in a tranquillity which they would not willingly have disturbed for the assistance of England. They had found in the Reign of Henry VIII. that under the pretence of maintaining their Religion, it was designed to engage them in a War by no means agreeable to their interests. Wherefore, content with their present condition, they were not willing to be oppressed for supporting the Rights of Elizabeth, though otherwise they with pleasure saw a Protestant Queen on the Throne of England.

I have already shewn the situation of the Scotch affairs. Elizabeth was so far from expecting any assistance from Scotland, that she saw herself under an indispensable necessity to support the Protestant Party there, well knowing, it was the intention of France to attack her from that quarter. Besides the two thousand Men already sent to Cambray the Regent, another more considerable reinforcement was preparing in France, to be conducted into Scotland by the Marquiss of Elbeuf (1). This sufficiently discovered, that the Court of France, sensible of the difficulty of attacking England by Sea, was resolved to push the war on the northern Frontiers, by a junction of their Forces with those of Scotland. Thus the design of the French Court to subdue the Scotch Rebels, was only the first step by which they hoped to rise to the Conquest of England.

On the other side, Ireland gave no less uneasiness to Elizabeth. That Island was inhabited by native Irish, and English Families transplanted thither since the Conquest of it by Henry II. It was governed by a Viceroy or Lord-Lieutenant, in the name of the Queen; but his Authority was very far from being regarded, as to keep the Irish in subjection. They had amongst them many Great Men, who indeed outwardly acknowledged the Queen's Sovereignty, but believed they had a right to do themselves justice for the wrongs they pretended to have received. They made war upon one another, regardless of the Lieutenant's orders, who having but few English Forces, was unable to make himself feared. As often as there was any pressing occasion to chastise a Rebellion, or prevent the strong from oppressing the weak, new Forces were to arrive from England. But as this could not be done without expence, very often it was not determined till the last extremity. So, most of the Lieutenants finding themselves destitute of the means to force an obedience, wilfully connived at the excesses and violences of the Great, for fear of unseasonably exposing the Royal Authority. They contented themselves with filling their Purfes while they held their Commissions, and left it to their Successors to repress the insolence of the Irish. This Conduct had rendered the Lords of the Country so fierce and arrogant, that they acknowledged the Royal Authority no farther than it was necessary to protect them against their Enemies. Besides the natural Aversion of the Irish for the English, who helped not, by their conduct, to gain their affection, there was, at this time, another reason, which contributed to increase this aversion, namely, the change which the Queen had lately made in religion. The Irish had for the Pope an Attachment equal to their ignorance, which was extreme. This disposed them to listen to the solicitations of the Romish emissaries, who were continually inciting them against the Government. Elizabeth was therefore obliged

(1) The Queen of Scots' Uncle; these Forces were levied in Germany, by the Rôigneville's Assistance. Camden, p. 379.

1560. to have a constant eye upon the Transactions of that Island, knowing what credit the Pope her enemy had there.

It remains now to speak of the disposition of the English to Elizabeth. When the Queen designed to establish the Reformation, her first care was to change the Magistrates in the Towns and Counties, and fill their places with Protestants. Then, she called a Parliament, whose Members were chosen according to her desires. This Parliament revived the Laws made by Edward VI. concerning Religion. These Laws by the care of the Magistrates were punctually observed. So, a few Months after Mary's death, the publick exercise of the Roman Catholic Religion was not less criminal, than the exercise of the Protestant had been in the last Reign. The Clergy, who refused obedience to the new Laws, were deprived of their Benefices, and the Vacancies supplied by zealous Protestants. To say all in a word, the Reformation rose under Elizabeth just as the Romish Religion had been established under Mary, with this difference, that no person was put to death by Elizabeth on account of Religion. We are not however to imagine that this external change produced a real one in the mind. There are very few, who, in point of Religion, implicitly obey their Sovereigns. Those, who were good Catholics under Mary, remained such under Elizabeth; as those who really embraced the Reformation under Edward VI. continued in Mary's Reign Reformed in their hearts, under an outward Compliance. If it is therefore considered, that all the changes in religion under this and the foregoing Reigns, had been made in the same manner, it will not be difficult to comprehend, that the Roman Catholics were still very numerous in the Kingdom. Little more than twenty years had passed since the Reformation began, and in this Interval the publick Worship had been changed four times. Now it is improbable, that a whole Nation so frequently changed their opinion according to the Caprice of the Governors, though, outwardly, they submit to the publick Authority. It is certain, the number of Roman Catholics in the Kingdom was very great, even after Elizabeth had established the Reformation, though it is likely, the Reformed were still more numerous. It is therefore very natural to imagine, that those who persisted in their ancient Sentiments were secret Enemies of the Queen: that they desired the Re-establishment of the old Religion and were disposed to embrace all opportunities to place a Catholic Queen on the Throne. It was not one of the least of Elizabeth's cares to watch her own Subjects.

Maxims of Government.*

Let us briefly recapitulate what has been said. Elizabeth had for Enemies, France, the Queen of Scotland, the Pope, and all the Catholic Powers. For though Philip II. had not yet declared himself, she knew he was not her Friend, and the Sequel clearly proved it. On the other hand, she had the Irish, and a great part of her English Subjects to guard against, without having one Ally to assist her. She was therefore to seek in herself, in her Prudence, in her good Conduct, and in her own Subjects, the assistance she would have vainly sought elsewhere. To obtain speedily and willingly the aid, the foresaw would be frequently wanted, she had but one way, and that was to make herself beloved by her People. Accordingly, this was the governing maxim of her Conduct. Happily for her, the qualities of her Heart and Mind were so disposed, that the never once deviated from so necessary a rule. Wherefore it may be affirmed, that no King of England was ever more sincerely beloved by his People than Elizabeth. But to demonstrate this Elogy not to be groundless, it is necessary to be more particular upon this Subject. It is certain, that her truly Protestant Subjects were much more numerous than the Catholics. What therefore could she do better than to favour the Protestant Religion, especially, as being herself of that Religion, she could, without reluctance, act so agreeably to her Interests? Another thing which greatly contributes to procure a Sovereign the affection of his People, is so to manage the Treasury, that he be not forced to load them with unnecessary Taxes. No Prince had ever this quality in greater perfection than Elizabeth. Nay, she carried this Economy so far, that she sometimes gave occasion to her own Ministers, to charge her with Avarice. However this be, her Expences were so well regulated, that she was never seen to lavish her Treasures upon her Favourites, or expend them in things of no use. Nevertheless, this frugal Inclination, whether owing to Nature or Policy, hindered her not from being profuse of her Money, when she thought it necessary. France, Spain, and Scotland, experienced, in their turns, how well she knew to be lavish of her Treasures. Her People had so good an opinion of her Economy, that through the whole course of her Reign, she was never once denied by the Parliament, the Supplies she wanted, or complained of by her Subjects for the Taxes they were charged with. She had also another quality which won her the Esteem of the English. She would not be induced by her Ministers to bestow Offices or Honours upon undervaluing Persons. She was apprehensive of nothing more, than to render contemptible, Dignities destined for the recompence of Merit and Virtue. By this wise Conduct she avoided the disobliging of Men, who might have aspired to Honours, had they seen them bestowed on others of no greater Merit than themselves. This was a maxim from which she rarely departed, during the whole course of her Reign. Lastly, she used her constant endeavours to cause Justice to be impartially administered. Her greatest Favourites felt her Severity when they abused her kindness, and wandered from their duty. There is no doubt, her great Interest to be beloved by her People, induced her to employ all possible means to that end. But it cannot be, as some have inferred from hence, that her whole Conduct was all dissimulation, since it is by no means impossible for the Inclinations of Men to rally with their Interests. Elizabeth had a true Esteem for the Reformed Religion, and her Interest required her to support it with all her power. She was naturally an Economist, and such was the situation of her affairs, that no Prince ever had more occasion to be so. As she had true Merit herself, she esteemed it in others; and therefore could never resolve to confer Dignities upon Men who had not merited them. In fine, had she been never so little remiss with respect to Justice, there would have been danger of her Sex being depicted, and of the great Men growing by degrees too licentious.

Such were the principal means made use of by Elizabeth to gain the affection of her Subjects. Their love was so necessary, that she had no other resource. Without it, her Reign would, probably, have been very unhappy, considering the number and quality of her Enemies. The Reader therefore is to consider most of her actions, as flowing from the maxim she had prescribed to herself, to neglect nothing which might procure the affection of her People.

There was also another maxim which no less influenced her Conduct than this I have mentioned. She saw herself threatened on all sides. The Pope, France, and afterwards Spain, never ceased their open or secret attacks. It was not without reason that she feared an Union of all these Powers for her ruin. In this belief, she laboured to the utmost to cherish the troubles of the neighbouring States, and particularly of France, Scotland, and the Low-Countries; that her Enemies being employed at home, might be less able to invade her. I shall not pretend to decide, whether this way of defence against Enemies so powerful and dangerous, was agreeable to the rules of Justice. It cannot however be denied, that this was excellent Policy, and that her own Security justified this method, as she had no other to divert their attacks. Accordingly, she made frequent use of this maxim, as will hereafter appear.

I thought it necessary to prepare the Reader for the sequel of this Reign, by these reflections, which are solely designed to suspend in his mind, the prejudices inspired by the Historians of all Nations and Religions, for and against this renowned Queen. It is no small difficulty to fix the Judgment, amidst all the contrarieties which occur in the Historians. Some have considered her as the most accomplished Queen the World ever saw. They have found no fault in her. All her actions were the results of Prudence, Justice and Equity, and had no other motive than the glory of God, and the happiness of her People. They have pretended, that her love for her Subjects was so ardent, that she forgot her own interest, and thought only of rendering them happy. Not content to excuse some of her actions which deserve censure, they have even in some measure sanctified them, by insinuating, that they were the effects of her Zeal for the Glory of God, and the Protestant Religion. Others have aspersed her with all the Calumnies it is possible to invent. According to these, she exceeded the most famous Tyrants in Cruelty and Barbarity. She was extremely deceitful, and her whole conduct was one continued dissimulation, from the beginning to the end of her Reign, notwithstanding her affectation of an outward show of Religion and Virtue. To these accusations concerning her publick Administration, they have added horrid slanders upon her private life. They have represented her as a dissolute Woman, who constantly refused to marry, in order more freely to continue her leud practices. To efface both these Impressions, and incline the Reader, (if religious prejudices will suffer him) to suspend his judgment, I have previously shown the motives of her Conduct, and the maxims by which she was, and, with respect to Policy only, ought to have been governed. Her principal aim was to secure a tottering Crown, and to succeed, she followed the above-mentioned Maxims. Is it to be thought strange, that on certain occasions she a little over-acted her tenderness for her People, wherein lay her only support? But it would be just cause of wonder, that by an irregular life, and other excesses, 1560. tresses, of which she is accused, she would have acted directly contrary to what could only procure her the love and esteem of her People, of which she had so great occasion. This suffices, as I imagine, to dispel some of those Clouds by which her reputation has been darkened. On the other hand, as the saw herself assailed from all Parts, by powerful Enemies, who were continually infusing a spirit of Rebellion into her Subjects, when we shall see her fomenting the troubles of Scotland, and assisting the Huguenots of France, and the Male-contents of the Low-Countries, it will be easily known to what this Conduct is owing, notwithstanding the Flatteries of some of her admirers. Apply but the two maxims, I have mentioned, to her actions; and remember the Necessity of her always having them in view, nothing almost in her conduct will then appear, the true motive whereof may not easily be discovered. After this long, though, I think, absolutely necessary, digression, it is time to proceed to the events of the year 1560.

A Treaty between Elizabeth and the Huguenots of France.
Maitland, who was sent into England from the Confederate Scots, at last concluded the Treaty, which was signed at Berwick the 27th of February 1560 (1). Elizabeth seeing the great preparations which were making in France, and not doubting of their being designed against Scotland, thought herself, above all things, obliged to provide for the safety of that Nation, and prevent the French from being too powerful there. She had cause to fear, that if Queen Mary had Children by the King her Husband, France and Scotland would be united under one head, which it was her great interest to hinder. She concluded therefore a Treaty with Maitland, which shows her fears with regard to Scotland. The Treaty ran:

AD. Pub. XY p. 399. That she took under her protection the Duke of Chateleraut, and all the Nobility and Subjects of Scotland, to maintain that Kingdom in its Liberties and Privileges, during the Marriage of the Queen of Scotland with the King of France, and one year after.

That she promised to send, with all speed, a convenient aid of Men into Scotland, and continue them there till the French were entirely expelled the Kingdom.

That she would come to no agreement with France, but on condition of leaving Scotland in full liberty.

That she would never abandon the Confederates, while they acknowledged Mary for their Sovereign, and endeavoured to maintain the Liberty of their Country, and the Estate of the Crown of Scotland.

That if the English took any places in Scotland, they should be either demolished by the Scots, or delivered to the Duke of Chateleraut, at his own option; but that the English should erect no Fortification in the Kingdom, without the advice of the said Duke, and his Party.

That the Duke and all his Party should join the English Forces.

That they should declare themselves Enemies of those of their Countrymen, who should serve France against England.

That if England was attacked in the South, the Confederates should send to the Queen's assistance two thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse at the least; but if in the North, they should join the English Army with all their Forces.

That if the Earl of Argyre, Lord Chief-Justice of Scotland, should join with the Confederates, he should be obliged to use his endeavours to reduce the North of Ireland under the Dominion of England, agreeably to a Treaty to be made betwixt him and the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.

That the Duke of Chateleraut and his Party should give Hostages to Elizabeth, to remain in England (2) during the time that the Marriage between Mary Queen of Scots, and the King of France, should subsist.

Lastly, The Duke of Chateleraut and his Party, protested, that their intention was to be faithful to their Queen in every thing, not contrary to the Laws and Liberties of Scotland, and not tending to their subversion.

From this Treaty it is plain, Elizabeth's sole aim was to keep the King of France from becoming Master of Scotland, knowing it was intended to invade her from that quarter.

While this Treaty was negotiating, the French Forces which were in Scotland, continued their pursuit of the Confederate Scots into the mountains, contrary to the opinion of Marillac of the House of Luxembourg. This Lord, who had brought the last Succours from France (3), was for an immediate invasion of England, imagining, that on his approach, the English Catholics would all rise and join him. But the Regent, better informed of the state of England, judged it not proper to enter upon a great design with so small an army. Some time after, while the French were exulting at the sight of a flying enemy, they discovered from a mountain a Fleet at Sea, which they at first took to be the Marquis of Elbeuf's. But perceiving afterwards it was an English Fleet (4), they were of opinion that the forces sent to the Confederates by Land were not very distant. This made them retire to Leith, with design to assemble there all their forces, and wait the arrival of the Marquis of Elbeuf. But he was expected in vain, for a violent tempest dispersed his Fleet, and he returned to sail back to France, to recruit his Ships. Accordingly, the troubles in France, calling for the assistance of their forces which were sending into Scotland, and of those already there, this expedition was entirely blated.

The French forces being retired to Leith, the Confederates assembled from all places, where they were dispersed, in order to join the English army marching to their relief under the command of the Lord Grey (5). At length they came to Halingston: the first of April, being six thousand strong in Foot, and two thousand in Horse, and there expected the so much desired English Succours, which were advancing with all possible speed. The Queen-Regent fearing to be shut up in Leith, chose rather to retire to the Castle of Edinburgh, which was committed by the States to the care of John Areskin, with the express condition not to resign it without their order. Areskin received the Regent with Honour, but still preserved the Command of the Castle.

Shortly after, the Lord Grey entering Scotland (6) with an army of six or seven thousand Foot and twelve hundred Horse, was joined by the Confederates, after which, they march'd together to Leith, where the enemies were retired. It was no inconsiderable work to besiege a place which had an army within its Walls; and yet, it was undertaken, because there was no other way to drive the French out of Scotland. While they were employed in this siege, all possible endeavours were us'd by the French King, to prevail with Elizabeth to recall her forces out of Scotland. But the knew net interest too well to be imposed upon. When de Severe, the French Ambassador, first mention'd it, she answered, her Troops should be readily recalled, provided the French were so too, since France had no more right than England to send forces into Scotland. At last the Ambassador finding, after many attempts, he could not prevail, declar'd, in the presence of the Spanish Ambassador, that by sending forces into Scotland he had violated the Treaty of Cateau, to which she calmly answered, that the King of France had first infringed that Treaty, by his endeavours to render himself master of Scotland. Some time before, she had published Elizabeth a Manifesto, declaring her reasons for concerning herself in the affairs of Scotland. She there charged in plain terms the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal of Lorraine, with being the Authors of the Troubles in that Kingdom, in order to effect more easily their designs against England. To them also she wholly ascribed the injury done her by the King and Queen of France, in assuming her Title and Arms.

Before de Severe had made his declaration, M. de Valence, was come into England, to press the Queen to recall her forces from Scotland, and would have even persuaded her, that Francis II. and Mary had assumed her Title on purpose to do her honour. This excuse was more provoking than the Injury. At last Elizabeth seeing, he could not divert her from her resolution to support the Scots, told her, the King of France would restore Calais, if he would draw her forces out of Scotland. But she answered, that she did not value that City so much as the quiet of Britain. Mean time, she dispatched Montague (7) to Philip II. to inform him of her reasons for assisting Scotland. That Ambassador was to represent to him, that the Guise had projected an union of the Crowns of France and Scotland, and not to be disappointed, had concerted the murder of the Earl of Arran, who had happily

During these negotiations, the Siege of Leith was continued, but with no great Success, because of the numerous Garrison. The 15th of April, the French made a Sally, and nailed three great Pieces of Cannon (2). The 30th, the English were fiercely repulsed at an assault. The 1st of May they stormed again, but with no better success. The length and difficulties of this Siege began now to discourage them, when the Duke of Norfolk, Warden of the northern Marches of England, sent a powerful reinforcement, and came to the English Camp himself, to encourage the continuation of the Siege. They would nevertheless have hardly taken the Place, had not the Conspiracy of Amboise (3), which was then discovered in France, convinced the Princes of Lorraine, that the season was not proper for the execution of their designs against England. So, instead of sending new Forces into Scotland, they thought of recalling those already there, imagining they might want them in France. It was to this end that Monsieur Bishop of Valence, and the Comte de Randan were sent into Scotland, with full powers from the King to conclude a Peace. Elizabeth hearing of it, sent likewise Secretary Cecil, and Dr. Wotton, with the same powers (4). The Plenipotentiaries immediately agreed to meet at Edinburgh in July, and, in the mean time, concluded a Truce, which was to last till the end of their Conferences. During this Truce, the Queen-Regent died in the Castle of Edinburgh, the 10th of June.

Burnet.A Peace
negotiated,

When the Peace came to be negotiated, the French Plenipotentiaries absolutely refused to treat with the Scotch Confederates, saying, it would be an injury to the Royal Authority, because they were Rebels. This refusal might have put an end to the Congress, but, as both sides were desirous of Peace, an expedient at last was contrived, namely, Francis and Mary should grant certain conditions to the Confederates, not by way of Treaty, but as of pure Grace, and that nevertheless they should promise to observe them, in their Treaty with the Queen of England. This was in effect the same thing, but the Ambassadors, probably, with a view to some advantage, preferred this expedient. Most Historians confound, in the Treaty shortly after concluded at Edinburgh, two things, which, however, ought to be distinguished; namely, the Concessions of Francis and Mary to their Scotch Subjects, and the Treaty between France and England. As of these two things one was observed, and the other not, it is necessary to have a distinct Idea of them. The Promises made to the Scots were:

That the City of Leith should be restored to Scotland, and the Fortifications demolished.

That the King and Queen of France and Scotland should grant an Act of oblivion to the Confederates, for every thing done, from the 10th of March 1559, to the 1st of August 1560, and that this Act should be approved and confirmed by the States of Scotland, to be assembled the following August, with the consent of the King and Queen.

That for the future, the King and Queen of Scotland should not assume the Title of King and Queen of England and Ireland, nor bear the Arms of these Kingdoms.

That the Patents and other Acts which had been dispatched with that Title, should be altered, or remain of no force.

That the farther satisfaction required by the Queen of England, for the injury done her, should be referred to a Conference at London, between the Commissioners of the two Crowns.

That if the Commissioners could not agree, the Decision should be left to the King of Spain.

That the King and Queen of France and Scotland should perform the Promises made to the Scots at Edinburgh, by the Plenipotentiaries of France.

It must be observed, that Buchanan in his History, has only mentioned the Articles granted to the Confederate Scots; and Camden, in his Annals of Elizabeth, takes notice only of the Treaty between the two Crowns. This causes some obscurity in their respective accounts of the following events.

After the conclusion of the Treaty, the French and English quitted Scotland; the fortifications of Leith and Dunbar were demolished, and the Act of Oblivion sent over into Scotland, and confirmed by the States. These same States, assembled in August, made Laws favorable to the Reformation, and sent them to the King and Queen for their approbation, rather to discover their sentiments, than with any hopes of obtaining their desires, and yet, they caused these new Laws to be punctually observed.

But as to the Treaty concluded between the Crowns, Francis and Mary refused to ratify it, for a reason, the force of which is not easily conceived. It was, they said, because the Scots falsely stiling themselves faithful Subjects, had made a Treaty with Elizabeth in their own private Names, without any Warrant from the royal Authority. If this refusal had only concerned the Articles granted to the Scots, Elizabeth might have believed, that the Court of France repented of their concessions, and then the reason alleged might have had some colour. But whatever related to the Scots being already perform'd, their pretended incroachment could not render invalid a Treaty, about a difference between Elizabeth and Mary, in which the conduct of the Scots was entirely unconcerned. It was therefore easy to infer, that this weak reason was but a pretence used by Francis and Mary, to elude what they had promised in the Treaty with respect to Elizabeth. Accordingly, Elizabeth was convinced, that the Princes of Lorraine still persisted in the design to wrest the Crown from her; and this belief was ever rooted in her mind. Mary's Uncles did not then foresee how dear this proceeding would one day cost their Niece, whose grandeur they so passionately desired.

While Elizabeth was employed in these affairs, her Court was attentive to watch her motions, her conduct, and inclinations with regard to marriage. Tho' she told her Parliament, she was resolved to remain single, such resolutions were known to be liable to change, and the more, as there were many Princes, and some Lords, who desired not to make her alter her mind. Charles Archduke of Austria, second Son of the Emperor Ferdinand, the King of Sweden, the Duke of Holstein, had already made their addresses. The Earl of Arran, Son of the Duke of Chateaufort, relying on the barrenness of Queen Mary, and his Succession to the Crown of Scotland, flattered himself, that Elizabeth would prefer him to any other, in order to unite the two Kingdoms (6). To these were added others, who being her Subjects, and not daring to declare their minds so openly, were contented to leave her to guess their Inclinations, or to disclose them by means of some of her Ladies. One proceeded upon his Birth, another upon his Merit, a third upon his Mien and outward Accomplishments, apt to kindle the flames of love in the fair Sex. In short, she was indirectly assailed on all the sides which are generally thought weakest in a Woman.

The Earl of Arundel (7), of a noble and antient race, though a little advanced in years, imagined, the Queen would marry a Subject, rather than a Sovereign, and if so, that no Man deserved that honour better than he. Sir William Pickering (8), having received some particular mark of the Queen's esteem, despaired not that these first favours would be extended much farther. But no Man believed he had better grounds to flatter his hopes, than Robert Dudley, Son of the late Duke of Northumberland. The Queen visibly preferred him to all who had the honour to approach her, and gave him so many proofs of the inclination she had for him, that for some time it was believed she intended to marry him. At her Accession to the Crown, she made him Master of the Horse, 1560. and Knight of the Garter. From thenceforward, she took a pleasure to distribute her favours through him. So that by this distinction, she discovered, that she had more than a bare esteem for him. He was at Court called only, My Lord, without any other addition, which was a mark of her preference of him to all the Nobility. And yet, when his pretensions to such distinguishing favours were examined, no qualities were found in him capable to make an impression upon so discerning a Queen. His Vices far surpassing his Virtues, recourse was had to the Planets which ruled his birth, and occasioned this sympathy of thoughts. However this be, he was a favorite at Court. All affairs were imparted to him: Ambassadors gave account to him of their Negotiations: Every one applied to him for his affairs at Court, and woe to those who addressed to any other. That was an unpardonable Fault.

The Queen had two Favorites more, but of a different kind from Dudley, as they were only for the affairs of the Government. These were Nicolas Bacon, and William Cecil. The first was made Keeper of the Great Seal, with all the Privileges of Lord Chancellor. William Cecil had been Secretary of State to Edward VI. and discharged the Office so well, that if his Religion had not stood in the way, he had been continued under Mary. He was not however exposed to Persecution, whether he to artfully managed as to give no advantages against him, or his particular Merit procured him a Distinction above all other Protestants. He had an uncommon Genius, a sound Judgment, a Capacity for great affairs, an unwearied Application, and an impenetrable Secrecy, with a constant tendency to his sole view, the welfare and advantage of the Queen. It is not therefore strange if he preserved, all his Life, the favour of a Queen, who so perfectly knew her own Interest. When able Princes are blest with such Ministers, they do not easily part with them.

In the situation of Elizabeth's affairs, she wanted able and disinterested Ministers to guide her. Wherever she turned her Eyes out of her Kingdom, she saw not one Friend who was really concerned for her welfare. She had at first relied on the King of Spain; but Montague's report of his Ambassy to that Prince, disappointed all her expectations from him. When this Ambassador, after discoursing with Philip about the Scottish affairs, demanded, agreeably to his Instructions, the renewing of the ancient Alliance between England and the House of Burgundy, he found him very cold. Philip in his answer lamented the Changes made in England, with regard to Religion, and signified his concern for them. He complained, he had received no Intelligence of the sending an English Army into Scotland till it was too late, and yet he advised the Queen to have it inserted in the future Treaty between her and Mary, that if France sent Forces into Scotland, she should also have the same Liberty, and to stipulate positively the restitution of Calais. He added, he had till then prevented Elizabeth's Excommunication, and obtained from the Pope a promise, that nothing should be done in that Affair without his knowledge. As to the renewing of the Treaty, he coldly answered, it was needless. In fine, he returned, by the Ambassador, the Collar of the Order of the Garter. This convinced Elizabeth, that Philip was no longer her friend, and that his advice, which came too late, was more the effect of his Jealousy of the growing greatness of France, than of his affection for her. Some time after, she gave him a small mortification, in refusing her permission to certain English Catholics (1) to reside in the Low-Countries, and preserve their effects in England. Amongst these was Jane Dormer, Grandmother of the Comte de Feria's Lady, whom he married in England, during his Ambassy (2). This so provoked the Comte, that he used all his credit with Philip to exasperate him against Elizabeth. He even found an opportunity to force into the Inquiry, a Servant of Chamberlain the English Ambassador in ordinary for Spain. He also strongly solicited the Pope to excommunicate her, but without success. Pius IV. was for trying other means, which appeared to him more proper to gain the Queen, and were not prejudicial to his Centuries, which he could thunder against her whenever he pleased.

It was with this view, that he sent Vincenzo Parpaglia Abbot of St. Saviour into England with certain instructions, and a Letter to the Queen, exhorting her to return into the Pale of the Church, and promising to continue the general Council (3), as soon as possible. It is pretended, this Nuncio had likewise a power to offer the Queen, that the Pope would annul the Sentence of Henry's Divorce with Ann Boleyn, and the subsequent Act of Parliament, confirm the English Liturgy, and permit the English to communicate in both kinds. But these offers were not capable of moving Elizabeth: and the rather, as, probably, they were not sincere, at least, in what concerned Religion. Hence it may be observed, what opinion the Court of Rome, and all Catholics, had of Elizabeth's birth, since it was offered as a great favour to own her for legitimate Daughter of Henry VIII.

Mean time, Elizabeth very closely applied herself to the affairs of the Government, in order to render her Subjects as happy as possible, well knowing, her greatest assistance was to flow from them, in case of an Invasion, which she had reason to expect. This year, she was obliged to re-fuse the Coin to its ancient standard, which had been extremely debased in the Reign of Henry VIII. though no King had ever drawn so much Money from his Subjects (4). If Cardinal Pole may be credited, this Prince alone drew more Money from the People, than all the Kings together since the Conquest. The Monastery of Wythmar was this year turned into a Collegiate Church (5). These were the most remarkable events in England in 1560. But before we proceed to the following year, it is necessary, briefly to mention the affairs of the neighbouring States.

The affairs of France tended to confusion the beginning of the year. The Protestants seeing themselves persecuted, and condemned to the flames without mercy, thought it time to provide for their common defence. To this end, some of them, after a private Conference, formed a Conspiracy against the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal of Lorraine, the King's Ministers, and their declared Enemies. They had no Leader who openly appeared, but very likely the Prince of Condé, jealous of these two foreign Princes, had, among the Reformed, Emisaries, who intimated to them, that when things were ripe, they should not want a support. However this be, a Gentleman, named La Renaudie, projected to carry off the Lorrain Princes, then with the King at Amboise. This attempt miscarrying, was interpreted as a Conspiracy against the King himself, and twelve hundred Persons, either guilty, or only suspected to be concerned in it, were put to death. The two Lorrain Princes would have been glad, on this pretence, to have dispatched the Prince of Condé, but their measures not being yet well taken, they waited a more favorable opportunity. Some time after, the States being assembled at Orléans, the King of Navarre and Prince of Condé indifferently came thither, though they had intimation of the Court's ill designs against them. The King of Navarre indeed was not arrested, but was so carefully watched, that an escape was impossible. The Prince of Condé was imprisoned, and shortly after condemned to die. But the death of Francis (6) about the same time, prevented the execution of the Sentence, and the Prince was released.

This same year, Philip II. having carried War into Africa, against the Corsair Dragut, who had made himself King of Tripoli, his Arms were so unsuccessful, that he was forced to recall the Spanish Troops left in the Netherlands. The Inhabitants of those Provinces saw the departure of the Spaniards with great satisfaction, which would have been much increased, had Cardinal Granvelle been also recalled, for they mortally hated him, and were encouraged in their hate by the Prince of Orange, and the Counts of Egmont and Horn, his sworn Enemies.

The death of Francis II. caused great alterations in the Court of France. Charles IX. his Brother and Successor, being yet a minor, Catherine de Medici, his Mother, had the address and influence to prevail with the King of Navarre, first Prince of the Blood, to yield the Regency to her, and content himself with the Title of Lieutenant-General. Mean while, as she was not entirely without fear, that he might one day think of refusing the Rank due to his Birth, she fomented, with all her art, the dissensions which had begun to appear in the late Reign. By this means, she at last formed two Parties in the Court and Kingdom, which proved her security, as she was necessary to Both. The first was headed by the Duke of Guise, the Countess of Montmorency, and the Marshal of St. André. These three Lords were called the Triumvirs. On their side were all the Catholics of the Kingdom, into

At the head of the other Party, wholly consisting of Huguenots, (so the French Protestants (1) were called) were the Prince of Condé, the Admiral of Caligny or Châtillon, and his Brother d'Andelot. The King of Nouarre fluctuated between the two Parties, without being able to resolve, and the Queen-Regent reaped great advantages from this division among the great Men.

The affairs of France being in this situation, Elizabeth seemed to be out of danger from them. Francis's Successor had no pretence to concern himself with the affairs of Scotland, any farther than as a common ally, and he had no manner of demand upon England. On the other hand, the Queen-Regent, who had no great affection for her Daughter-in-law, was far from engaging in a War for her sake: Tho' she could have hoped to place her on the Throne of England, it was not her interest to render the House of Guisse more powerful than it was. In fine, the Princes of Lorraine, employed in struggling with their Enemies at Court, were not in condition to prosecute the Rights of the Queen their Niece. Wherefore, immediately after the death of Francis II. Mary, by the advice of her Uncles, quitted the title of Queen of England, which she had bore ever since the Treaty of Cateau. But this was not sufficient to satisfy Elizabeth. Mary being still very young, might marry some powerful Prince, and transfer to him her Pretensions. Therefore to make Elizabeth easy, this young Queen was solemnly to declare, she had no right to this Title, otherwise, she might have resumed it, when she pleased; a bare interruption being not sufficient to invalidate her Claim. By the way, Elizabeth, like her Grandfather Henry VII. was, all her life, so jealous of her Crown, that she was for ever uneasy on that account. When she heard of Francis's death, she sent the Earl of Bedford into France, with her compliments of condolence and congratulation to the new King, and ordered him to press Mary to ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh. The Ambassador discharged his Commission, and was answered by Mary, that this affair not concerning her as Queen of France, but as Queen of Scotland, she would not confirm it without the advice of the Scottish Nobility (2). Mean time, as she knew her Mother-in-law, the Queen-Regent, loved her not, she left the Court of France, and retired to Rhims, where her Uncle the Cardinal was Archbishop, to spend part of the Winter there, and afterwards, she went to reside at Nancy. While she was at Rhims, she received a visit from Martignac, la Brassé, d'Oysel, and the Bishop of Amiens, who being acquainted with the affairs of Scotland, and knowing her intention to return thither, believed it incumbent on them to give her some Instructions. She came from thence so young, that she was utterly ignorant of the Kingdom she was going to govern. Melvil says, they advised her to gain by her favours, James Stewart Prior of St. Andrew's, her natural Brother, the Earl of Argyle, who had married Jane Stewart her natural Sister, Sir William Maitland of Letlington, and Sir William Kirkcaldy Laird of Grange, and to rely on the Protestants rather than the Catholics, as the former were in all respects superior. Some time after, on her way to Nancy, she gave audience to John Lesley, sent to her from her Catholic Subjects. Lesley says himself, in his History of Scotland, that he advised her, agreeably to his Instructions, not to confide in the Prior of St. Andrew's, and to repair to Aberdeen, where she might be at the head of a good body of Catholic Troops, to restore Religion to the state it was in before the late changes. But she was too wise to follow such dangerous Counsel. The next day, the Prior of St. Andrew's, who was also come to France to pay her his respects, met her at Joinville, and gave her Counsels more suitable to the situation of her affairs. He confirmed her resolution to return into Scotland, and advised her to reign like her Predecessors, with the concurrence of the States, assuring her, it was the only way to live happy and peaceable (3). The Queen, agreeably to this advice, ordered him to return to Scotland, and prepare all things for her reception. Moreover, she put into his hands a Patent, empowering the States to meet and ordain whatever they should judge convenient for the good of the Kingdom. Thus, Lesley's pains to prejudice her against Stewart, were for once ineffectual. This Lesley, afterwards Bishop of Rosé, greatly contributed, by his Intrigues and violent Counsels, to the misfortunes which at last fell on the head of the Queen 1560. Stewart arriving in Scotland, notwithstanding Lesley's endeavours to have him arrested in France, delivered to the States the Patent which the Queen had sent by him. As almost all Scotland was then Protestant, the States employed the general power, granted them by the Queen, to establish the Reformation by public Authority. This was followed with an Order to demolish all the Monasteries, which was immediately put in execution.

Mean time, Mary preparing to sail for Scotland, sent Elizabeth d'Oysel to Elizabeth for a Safe-Conduct. Elizabeth answered, she hoped the Queen would ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh, after which, she should not only have a Safe-Conduct, but also, without being exposed to the dangers and fatigues of the Sea, might pass through England, where she should be received with all the marks of affection she could expect from a good Sister (4). Mary complained of this answer to Throckmorton the English Ambassador, so as to shew him she was extremely offended at it. She told him, "As she came into France, in spite of Edward's, she could return into Scotland notwithstanding Elizabeth's opposition: She was heartily vexed, for asking a favour, she could so well be without: That this refusal and the assistance given by Elizabeth to the Scottish Rebels, was a clear evidence, how little she desired to preserve a good understanding between the two Kingdoms: That it was matter of astonishment to her, that the Queen of England should obstruct the return of her near Relation, and most certainly presumptive Heir, into her own Country: That she could have no pretence for this, since she could not accuse her of meddling with the Affairs of England, tho' the discontent of the English gave her an opportunity. She added, she was a Queen as well as Elizabeth, and not destitute of Friends when they should be wanted: That the Treaty of Edinburgh was made in the life-time of her Husband, and if he delayed to sign it, he alone ought to bear the blame: That since she was a Widow, neither the Council of France, nor her Uncles had concerned themselves with the Affairs of Scotland: That the Scots about her were private Persons, whom she neither could nor ought to consult in so important an affair: But as soon as she had advised with the States of Scotland, she would return a suitable answer: That therefore she was hastening her return into Scotland, but Elizabeth intended to stop her journey, and so alone was the cause of the delay she complained of. She concluded with saying she had never offended Elizabeth, and prayed the Ambassador to tell her the reason of her anger."

Throckmorton replied, his order was only to receive her answer concerning the Treaty of Edinburgh: but since she desired it, he would for a moment lay aside the Ambassador, and give her his Sentiments as a private Man. Then he told her, the Queen his Mistress was very much offended at her assuming the Title and Arms of England, which she had not done in Queen Mary's Reign, and left her to judge, whether a greater indignity could be offered to a crowned head. Mary answered, she did it by the express command of Henry II. her Father-in-law, and of Francis her Husband, whom she was obliged to obey; but upon the death of her Husband, she had, when Mistress of herself, quitted both the Title and Arms: That however, she being a Queen, and Grand-Daughter to Henry VIII's eldest Sister, did not believe it injurious to any Person to bear the Arms of England, which had been done by others more remotely allied without any noise. Camden, from whom this is taken, does not mention Throckmorton's Reply. It would however be strange, that he should be satisfied with such weak reasons. Elizabeth did not only demand that Mary should quit the Title and Arms of England, but also should declare in the most express manner, that she never had any right to assume them. Nay she expected a solemn Reparation for this Incroachment, as appears by the Treaty of Edinburgh. Now Mary's quitting the Title and Arms of England, without owning she had no right to assume them, was very far from contenting Elizabeth, who would not have had any other person but herself, pretend to the Title of Queen of England. Mary's alledging that others had borne the same Arms without any offence, pointed to the Marquiss of Exeter, and the Duchess of Suffolk. But there were three remarkable differences between them and Mary. The first was, they bore these Arms by the King's special grant.

(1) They were so called, either from Ugon's Gate, in the City of Tours, where they used to meet at 8 o'clock; or from King Hug's Chast, which was the Scots-crow used in that Town to frighten Children, and which was bid to walk in the Suburbs in the Night, it being the usual Time and Place where the Protestants were wont to meet. Charles IX. forbid this Name by an Edit. Thuanus, l. 24.

(2) This Affair being thus put off from time to time, Queen Elizabeth began to suspect some Plot was hatching against England, and therefore resolved to prevent it. Accordingly, she dispatched Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, to cultivate a good understanding between the English and Scottish Nations. Camden, p. 385.

(3) Camden speaks quite otherwise of James Stewart. Rapin. Camden says, he advised Queen Elizabeth to intercept Mary in her Passage, and that Lidington was also of the same Mind, left at her return, she should treat the Protestants of Scotland with extreme rigour, not as Traytors, but Heretics, as Queen Mary of England had done before her. Camden, p. 387.

(4) Buttanan is in the wrong to omit the Conditions on which Elizabeth was willing to grant a Safe-Conduct. Rapin.

1560. The second, that they did it with a limb or border of jurisdiction. The third, that they never assumed the Title of King and Queen of England.

Elizabeth. All this made Elizabeth suspect, the Queen of Scotland was forming some dangerous design, and in quitting the Title and Arms of England, intended only to amuse her, since she refused to own the injustice of assuming them. In short, Mary, being determined to return into Scotland without Elizabeth's Safe-Conduct, sent for Throckmorton to Abbeville, and demanded of him what was to be done to satisfy Elizabeth. Throckmorton answered, she had only to ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh, as he had often told her before. She replied, she could not conceive why she was thus urged to ratify a Treaty already executed: That the Articles concerning the Scots had been really performed: That as she had quitted the Title and Arms of England, she could not be accused of seeking evasions not to ratify the Treaty, since a Treaty already executed did not want a ratification: That the Scots could not complain of being treated with too much rigour, but that she perceived, the person who would prevent her return into Scotland, would prevent their enjoying the effects of her Clemency. She added, she would write to the Queen of England with her own hand, and desired the Ambassador rather to compose than aggravate matters. But the Letter she wrote on this occasion, did not give Elizabeth the satisfaction she believed to have reason to expect. As the usurpation of the Arms and Title of Elizabeth, and the Refusal to ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh, were the basis and foundation of the differences between these two Queens, and had a constant influence upon this Reign, it will not be unnecessary to add some observations to what has been said, in order to set in a clearer light the reasons and interests of both.

Elizabeth, in France and all the Catholic Countries, was deemed illegitimate. It was upon this foundation, that Henry II. obliged the Dauphin his Son, and the Queen of Scotland the Dauphin's Wife, to assume the Title of King and Queen of England, and that, after his death, they continued to bear the same. Elizabeth was not so void of understanding as not to perceive that this pretence would be more than sufficient to deprive her of the Crown, should it ever come to be supported by force. On the other hand, she could not doubt that such a design was formed by Mary and her Friends. Of this, her having assumed the Title of Queen of England was a clear indication. It was therefore necessary to provide for her safety. The Civil War in Scotland naturally presenting itself, she assisted the Malecontents, and, whereas France was resolved to invade her from that quarter, gave Francis and Mary cause to apprehend she would deprive them of Scotland. This produced the Treaty of Edinburgh, which was never ratified by Francis, and after his death, Mary persisted in her refusal, contending herself with only quitting the Title of Queen of England. But this was not a sufficient security for Elizabeth. As Mary had quitted the Title without giving any reason, she could resume it the first opportunity; and this was what Elizabeth desired to prevent, and the more, as Mary's obstinate Refusal gave her cause to believe it was really intended.

Mary on her Side had strong reasons to elude this ratification. She was persuaded, Elizabeth was not the legitimate Daughter of Henry VIII. and that neither his Will nor an Act of Parliament could give her a right which nature denied. Upon this supposition, Mary believed the Crown of England was fallen to her, as next Heir to the deceased Queen, and though Elizabeth had possession, she did not despair of wresting it from her, with the assistance of France, Spain, the Pope, and the English Catholics. But if, by ratifying the Treaty of Edinburgh, she owned herself in the wrong to assume the Title of Queen of England, and promised with an Oath never to bear it more, she had cause to fear, her Friends would grow very cool. To what purpose then did Francis order his Plenipotentiaries to sign a Treaty, which he did not intend to ratify? To this the answer is easy. He could not otherwise draw his Forces out of Scotland, where they were besieged, nor oblige Elizabeth to recall her's. As to the breach of his word, it did not then much trouble the French Court. Now as Mary was at that time in subjection to a Husband, she threw upon him whatever was amiss in this Conduct.

The second reason Mary had to refuse the ratification was full of more force. The Plenipotentiaries of France, in signing the Treaty, made a wrong step, for want of sufficient knowledge of the English affairs. They suffered to be inserted in the Treaty, without any restriction, this general Clause; That for the future Francis and Mary should not assume the Title of King and Queen of England. Now Mary had reason to fear, that these words, for the future, might be a Snare to make her renounce for ever the Crown of England, on account of her Religion. This fear seemed the more just, as the English had sufficiently discovered their intention, to regulate the Succession by Henry the Eighth's Will, where the Posterity of Margaret Queen of Scotland was omitted, and the Duchesse of Suffolk placed next to Elizabeth. It seemed therefore to her, that a ratification of the Treaty of Edinburgh would give occasion to say, she complied with the Will of Henry VIII. which could not but be to her extremely prejudicial. It is scarce to be doubted, that Elizabeth thought the same thing, since afterwards, when Mary, pressed by the necessity of her affairs, offered to ratify the Treaty with this alteration of the Clause in dispute, That during the Life of Elizabeth she would not take the Title of Queen of England, Elizabeth was not satisfied. This is an evident Sign, that her Intention was to make use of the ratification to deprive Mary of her Birth-right, or at least, to hold her in subjection, by keeping her in a perpetual uneasiness concerning her Succession. There was then insincerity in both their proceedings. Mary, in evading the ratification of the Treaty, on pretence of the prejudice it might do her, refused in effect to acknowledge she had done amiss in assuming the Title of Queen of England, during the Life of Elizabeth, and thereby preserved all her Claim to be inserted on occasion; for it was not till some years after, that she offered the aforementioned restriction. On the other hand, Elizabeth, under colour of desiring Mary only to renounce a Right which she had assumed to her prejudice, meant to engage her to sign an equivocal Clause, which might have deprived her of all her Rights. These remarks will hereafter appear not to be entirely useless.

Mary, though she had no Safe-conduct from Elizabeth, Mary put to Sea, and happily arrived in Scotland. Some say, she escaped the English Fleet in a fog, which waited to intercept her (1). But this is only a bare Conjecture without any proof (2). It is however very likely, that as affairs stood between her and Elizabeth, if she had been taken she would have been detained in England, at least till she had ratified the Treaty of Edinburgh. She was received in her Kingdom with great demonstrations of Joy, both by the Nobles and People (3). But she had the mortification to see the Reformation established by Laws so severe, that only herself was allowed the Liberty to have Mass in her own Chapel, but without any Pomp or Ostentation. Nevertheless, some Lords still persisted in the old Religion, and hoping to restore it by her Authority, made their Court to her with great application. Of this number were George Gordon, Earl of Huntley, the Earls of Athol, Crawford, Sutherland, with some Bishops. It was not possible to determine, what was the Religion of the Duke of Chateaufort, his Conduct had been hitherto so ambiguous. The Lords I have named were very considerable by their Birth, their Riches, and their Vassals. And yet, they would never, perhaps, have thought of restoring the ancient Religion, had they not depended upon the Queen's favour, who could alone balance the power of the Protestants. Their first project was to try to alienate her from those of the Protestants, who had the most credit with her, and in the Kingdom. James Stewart her natural Brother was the principal object of their hatred, on account of his adherence to the Protestant Religion. Besides, the Queen having, at her arrival, committed to him the administration of affairs, it would be very difficult for them to undertake any thing, without opposition from him, while he continued in that Post. For this reason, they omitted nothing that could serve to ruin him with the Queen. But it is not necessary to be more circumstantial in these Intrigues; it suffices to shew the situation of the Court of Scotland, because this is absolutely necessary for the Sequel.

The haughtiness with which Mary talked to the English Ambassador before the late France, was not only unsuitable to her present Circumstances, but even contrary to her measures, and the projects she had formed with her Uncles. Whilst Francis II. was alive, these Princes believed that the Forces of France would be sufficient to subdue Scotland, under colour of extirpating Heresy, and after-

(1) That Queen Elizabeth intended to intercept the Queen of Scots, is not positively asserted by the Scottish Historians. Buchanan says, that Queen Elizabeth possessed a great Fleet, on pretence to hunt the Sea of Pirates; but some think, that it was to intercept the Queen of Scots, if she ventured to pass until her Will. So that it was only a supposition, l. 17. Buchanan asserts, that James Prior of St. Andrews, in his return from France through England, advised Queen Elizabeth to detain the Queen of Scots, thinking she would come through England, l. 29.

(2) It is true, there arose a great Fog in her Passage. (See Buchanan, Dam. illu. p. 150.) But that does not prove she was pursued by the English Fleet. R. A. n.

And at first, following the Counsel of her Friends, she behaved herself humanely to them all, committing her Affairs to her Brother the Prior of St. Andrews, and to the Secretary Lethington, as Lethington, as much both to hold the Country at her devotion, and also to begot a strict Friendship between her, and the Secretary.

wards in conjunction with the Scotch Troops, it would be easy to enter England, and, with the assistance of the English Catholics, dethrone Elizabeth. But the war they had excited in Scotland, taking a very different turn from what they expected, and the death of Francis following immediately upon it, they found that other measures were to be taken, and the execution of their project deferred for some time. They therefore advised the Queen their Niece, voluntarily to quit the Title of Queen of England, to return into Scotland, to enter, if possible, into a strict friendship with Elizabeth, to endeavour to be declared her presumptive Heir, and under colour of that Correspondence, to form a Party in England, where was no want of Malecontents, to be servicable on occasion. The whole course of this History shows this to have been Mary's Plan, and I shall hereafter give convincing proofs of it. Nothing therefore was more contrary to these measures, than her quarrel with Elizabeth, whose friendship she ought to have courted, in order to obtain the Declaration she desired, by means of which she was to strengthen her Party in England.

Solo sends an Ambassador to Elizabeth, and desires to be declared her Heir. Buchanan. Melvil. Camden. Elizabeth was so much upon her guard against whatever came from Mary, that it was not easy to surprize her. She answered the Ambassador, that the Queen of Scotland, while in France, promised to give her satisfaction concerning the Treaty of Edinburgh, as soon as she should arrive in her Kingdom; it could not therefore but surprize her to find no notice taken of that Article. The Ambassador excused the Queen his Mistress, that the short time since her arrival had not allowed her to think of any important affair. Elizabeth seemed satisfied with this excuse, but to the Letter from the Lords, answered plainly, that she would not run the hazard of seeing her Subjects adore the rising Sun. And raising her Voice, added, She would not suffer the Queen of Scotland to rob her of the Crown during her Life; neither did she intend to do any thing that might prejudice that Queen after her death, though she had usurped the Arms of England, for which she ought in justice to make reparation. This was the Substance of what passed in relation to this Embassy, from which Mary drew the advantage she desired, as it gave her an opportunity to renew a Correspondence with Elizabeth. I am persuaded, Melvil is mistaken, when he says in his Memoirs, that after Mary's return into Scotland, there was to close a friendship between the two Queens, that they write to one another every week, and testified an extreme desire to deliver by word of Mouth what they committed to writing. Nothing till then had passed between them that could serve to form or cement this pretended reciprocal friendship. On the contrary, many things contributed to alienate their Hearts from each other. But if Melvil, who was then in Germany, was rightly informed, one cannot help thinking they were both very great dissemblers. About the end of the year, Mary gave the Prior of St. Andrew's the Title of Earl of Murray, and created John Arscin Earl of Marr.

Though the answer given last year to the Abbot of Parpaglia, was by no means proper to inspire the Pope with any great hopes of the Restoration of the ancient Religion in England, he sent a Nuncio this year to Elizabeth, to notify, that the Council of Trent which had been interrupted, would be continued in the same place, and to desire her to send thither some English Bishops. The Abbot Martimengo, who was charged with this Commission, arriving in Flanders, and sending for leave to pursue his Journey into England (1), could never obtain it. Whereupon, the Nuncio at Paris prayed Throckmorton to write to the Queen; who coldly answered, she heartily desired an Ecumenical Council, but a Popish one she would never honour with an Ambassador; that she had no business with the Bishop of Rome, who had no more power than other Bishops.

After such an answer, Elizabeth might depend upon continual disturbance from the Court of Rome, and therefore, as, since the death of Francis II., the King of Spain was entirely estranged from her, because he no longer deided the union of Great-Britain, with the Monarchy of France. This fear was the only band that had till then attached him to England.

Mean time, Elizabeth seeing herself without any Ally, and in danger from all sides, took care in time of her defence. She employed this whole year in preparations, which convinced her Enemies, she would not be easily surprized. Her great care was to have always a good Fleet in readines, knowing that her Navy was the best bulwark of England. At the same time, she ordered all the Forts and Castles of the northern Borders to be well fortified, and particularly Berwick, as the place from whence she might be attacked with most ease. As the English had till this time been obliged to have all their Gunpowder from abroad, she was afraid of wanting it, and, to prevent that inconvenience, ordered it to be made in her own Kingdom (2). Moreover, she increased the pay of the Soldiers, to encourage them to serve her faithfully, and be ready upon occasion. This same year, was happily discovered in Cumberland a Mine of pure Copper (3), which had been neglected many Ages, and at the same time, was found, in great abundances, the Stone called Lapis Calaminaris, so necessary for Brass-works.

The cares of War did not divert Elizabeth from the affairs of Justice, and the civil Administration. She had her eye every where, and laboured effectually for the Reformation of abuses, and the bringing things into good order. Information being made, that the Officers of the Exchequer reserved the Penfions assigned to those Ecclesiasticks, who had been turned out of their Abbies, the ordered, that all who were living, and unprovided with Benefices, should be paid to a farthing (4).

Thus every Man relying on the Queen's Justice and Equity, England saw the revival of a happiness she had long wanted. The People had the more reason to be pleased with the Government, as the Queen, without demanding any Subsidies, discharged all the extraordinary expences out of the Crown Revenues (5), for she did not lavish her Money upon the Court-leeches, like her Predecessors. Her maxim was, to injure none, but to be extremely sparing of her Favours and Treasures, remembering in what want by excessive Profusion, many of her Predecessors had lived, with great Revenues. This was what forced them to have frequent recourse to their Parliaments, not to have the publick Occasions, but their own Extravagances, supplied (6).

It was not without reason that Elizabeth took so much pains to gain the love of her Subjects, by the good Order she introduced into the Kingdom, since at the same time, endeavours were used to corrupt and draw them into Rebellion. The Catholics began to meet, and plot to restore their Religion by arms. Elizabeth having formed intimation of these cabals, was desirous to know whence they sprung, and at last found it was the Queen of Scotland that was to serve for pretence to the Revolt, on account of her Title to the Crown of England. The Countess of Lenox, born from a second Marriage of Margaret Queen of Scotland with the Earl of Angus, held a secret Correspondence with Mary. Here the first discovery was made. As this Countess had the same interest with Mary, since they both descended from the eldest Daughter of Henry VII., the Queen imagined this Correspondence was not without mystery, and therefore sent the Earl and Countess of Lenox to the Tower (7).

Soon after, she discovered that Arthur Pale, and his Brother, descended from a Princess of the House of York (8), and Sir Anthony Fortescue, who had married their Sister, began to form a Party in the Kingdom. Upon this intelligence, they were sent to Prison, and afterwards tried. They confessed a design of withdrawing into France to the Duke of Guise, of returning from thence into Wales with a French Army, to proclaim Mary Queen of Scots, Queen of England, and Arthur Pale Duke of Clarence. They protested, however, that they meant not to execute their Project during the Queen's life, who, they believed, would die before the end of the year, having been told so by some Pretenders to Astrology. Their own Confession

The Pope desired to send a Nuncio to Elizabeth, to notify, that the Council of Trent which had been interrupted, would be continued in the same place, and to desire her to send thither some English Bishops. The Abbot Martimengo, who was charged with this Commission, arriving in Flanders, and sending for leave to pursue his Journey into England (1), could never obtain it. Whereupon, the Nuncio at Paris prayed Throckmorton to write to the Queen; who coldly answered, she heartily desired an Ecumenical Council, but a Popish one she would never honour with an Ambassador; that she had no business with the Bishop of Rome, who had no more power than other Bishops.

condemned them; but the Queen, in consideration of their illustrious descent, forgave their offence.

Catherine Grey, Daughter to the Duke and Duchess of Suffolk, and Sister of Jane Grey, beheaded in the last Reign, was not used with the same lenity as the Persons just mentioned, though she was less criminal, and the Queen's near Relation. She was called to account for a Crime, in the punishment of which Elizabeth less showed her zeal for Justice, than her jealousy and desire to find a pretence to secure this sort of Rival, who gave her some uneasiness. Catherine had been married to Henry, eldest Son of the Earl of Pembroke (1), who had procured a Divorce, because he could not live with her. Afterwards, the Earl of Hertford privately married her, and then went into France. In his absence the Queen being informed of this clandestine Marriage, sent Catherine to the Tower, though she was very big with Child. The Earl returning, and owning his Marriage, was committed to the same Place. After this, the Archbishop of Canterbury annulled their pretended Marriage, because it was not sufficiently proved, and they both remained Prisoners in the Tower. While they were there, the Earl found means to come to her, and the again proved with Child. Whereupon he was accused of three capital Crimes; namely, of breaking Prison; of debauching a Virgin of the blood-royal; and of abusing her a second time; and for each offence, was fined five thousand Pounds (2). At last, after a long imprisonment, and several fruitless attempts to have his sentence reversed, he was forced to forsake her by an authentick Act. But the Queen remaining implacable to the Lady, she died in Prison. Before the expired, she prayed the Lieutenant of the Tower to tell the Queen, that she begged her pardon for contracting marriage without her permission, thereby showing, she had ever considered the Earl of Hertford as her lawful Husband (3). This excessive rigour does Elizabeth no credit, since it is plain, Catherine Grey's Right to the Crown, whether well or ill-grounded, was her greatest offence.

But it was not from the House of Suffolk that Elizabeth had most to fear. The Queen of Scotland was a Rival much more dangerous, as being powerfully supported. Her Friends still thought of placing her on the Throne of England, and only waited a favorable opportunity to execute their design. Elizabeth had occasion to be convinced of this by her intelligence, that the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine, to engage the King of Navarre (4) in their Party, offered him the Marriage of their Niece, and promised him possession of the Throne of England, by the assistance of the Pope and King of Spain. Though this Prince had a Wife, they minded not the difficulty of annulling his Marriage, because his Queen Jane was a Heretic (5). This satisfied Elizabeth, that the Princes of Lorraine had not laid aside their first design, and that Philip II. was coming into the Plot. Whereupon, she dispatched Sidney (6) into France on some pretence, to inform himself exactly of the affairs of that Kingdom, and of what was contriving against her, that she might take her measures accordingly.

Catherine de Medici still continued to foment the dissension between the two Factions, and seemed to incline to the side of the Huguenots, who were the weakest. As the Guises had artfully persuaded the Catholics, that their differences with the Prince of Condé concerned only Religion, she feared to see herself once more at their discretion, as she had been in the last Reign, if the Huguenots were oppressed. For this reason she supported them, and procured them a very favorable Edict, called the Edict of January. The Duke of Guise, penetrating her design, believed it time to break her measures, by engaging, on a sudden, both Parties in a War. He accomplished his design by the massacre of Vassy, committed under his eyes, upon a very slight occasion. Then the Huguenots, unable to contain any longer, began the War by surprizing Orleans, with the more reason, as the Queen-Regent had applied to the Prince of Condé for his assistance, to free her and the King from the captivity in which they were held by the Guises.

I shall not descend to the particulars of this War, which may be seen in all the Histories of France. I shall only say, that the Huguenots, unsuccessful in the first Campaign, sent the Vidame de Chartres to Elizabeth, to desire her assistance. Shortly after his arrival at London, he concluded a Treaty with Elizabeth, by which she promised to furnish the Huguenot Leaders, with a hundred thousand Crowns, and an aid of six thousand Foot, half to be employed in the defence of Dieppe and Roan, and half to be put into Garrison at Havre de Grace. The Huguenots, on their side, engaged to put the Queen in possession of this last Place, to be kept till the restitution of Calais. The same day the Treaty was signed, Elizabeth published a Manifesto, declaring the reasons which obliged her to assist the Huguenots. She said, "her intention in sending Troops into Normandy, was not to recover that Province, the antient Patrimony of her Ancestors, and unjustly wrested from them, but to preserve it for the King of France during his Minority, and rescue it from the ambition and tyranny of the Princes of Lorraine. That she was the more concerned to endeavour to prevent that Province falling into their hands, as it was manifest their design was to seize the Ports of Normandy, and from thence invade her Dominions, after the extirpation of the Reformed in France. That for these reasons she thought herself obliged to assist the young King; hinder his Subjects from being oppressed by the Guises; protect the Professors of the Reformed Religion, and provide for her own Safety". This last Article concerning her security, was the chief, or rather the only one, which justified her assisting the Huguenots. In all appearance, she would not have liked that a foreign Prince should have used the other pretences, alledged in her Manifesto, to aid the English Catholics, had they taken arms against her. But she looked upon the Duke of Guise as her most mortal Enemy, and the principal Protector of the Queen of Scotland, for whom, it manifestly appeared, he would have procured the Crown of England. This Duke was at the head of the Catholic Party, which was infinitely more powerful than that of the Huguenots. It might therefore very easily happen, that these would be extirpated, or at least, entirely disabled; and the Duke of Guise become absolute master of the Court and Kingdom, and employ all the Forces of France to execute his project in favour of the Queen of Scotland his Niece. It is therefore easy to conceive the necessity, Elizabeth was under, to oppose the advancement of so formidable an Enemy, which was not to be done more successfully than by assisting the Huguenots. In maintaining the War in France, she held the Duke of Guise employed, and rendered him incapable to attempt any thing against England. Paul de Foix, the French Ambassador, having notice of this Treaty, required her, in virtue of the Treaty of Cateau, to deliver to him the Vidame and all his Attendants: But she excused herself, and told him, she would write to the King of France about it. She did so indeed, but not obtaining any thing for that Lord, she did not think herself obliged to deliver him to the King.

The six thousand English not embarking till September, found the King of Navarre, on their Arrival, before Roan. This was the reason of their dividing themselves into two Bodies only, of which one entered Dieppe (7), and the other took possession of Havre de Grace, according to the Treaty of London. The Earl of Warwick (8), General of these Forces, had been made Governor of this last place by the Queen. Mean time, the City of Roan was taken by Assault, and the King of Navarre, who was wounded at the Siege, died on his return to Paris. In the close of this year, the Battle of Dreux was fought between the Catholics and Huguenots, with almost equal loss. The Prince of Condé and the Constable of Montmorency, who commanded the two Armies, were both taken Prisoners, but the King's Forces kept the Field of Battle. The Prince of Condé not being able to head his Party, Admiral de Chatillon took upon him the command of the Army. I must now speak of the Transactions of Scotland this year.

James Stewart created Earl of Murray, held still the first rank in the management of affairs, not so much from any affection the Queen had for him, as from her being advised to keep him always attached to her interest. It was indeed almost impossible for Mary, who had been educated in a Court so averse to the Reformation, to have any great friendship for the Earl her Brother, whom she considered as the Head of the Reformed. Besides, his severe temper

1562. did not agree with the Luxury which was introducing into the Court by the young Queen. The Preachers exclaimed from the Pulpit against these worldly vanities, as very opposite to true Religion. On the other hand, the Earl of Murray, as well to support his interest amongst the Reformed, as to follow his own inclination, signified often to the Queen, that this way of life would at last forfeit her the esteem and affection of her Subjects. This furnished his enemies with a pretence to insinuate to the Queen, that Murray meant to keep her in servitude, and it would be impossible to restore the old Religion, while he had the direction of affairs. But if Buchanan is worthy of belief, they were not content with using secret artifices to ruin him in the Queen's favour. This Historian pretends, the Duke of Chateaufort, and the Earls of Huntley and Bothwell conspired to assassinate him, but their Plot was discovered by the Earl of Arran. He adds, that the Duke was punished with the loss of his Government of Dunbarton, and Bothwell imprisoned in the Castle of Edinburgh, from whence he found means to escape.

But these were not Murray's most dangerous Enemies. Buchanan says, the Cardinal of Lorraine writ to the Queen his Niece, to incite her to dispatch the Earl, and some other zealous Protestants, out of the way, for which he might depend upon a powerful aid from the Pope, to restore the Catholic Religion in Scotland. According to this Historian, the Queen resolved to comply with the desires of the Pope and the Cardinal, and communicated her intentions to the Earl of Huntley, who approved of them, and promised his assistance. It was for this purpose, that the Queen took a progress into the North, where lay the Earl of Huntley's Estate (1), and where the Catholics were numerous. But at the same time Huntley finding the Queen, in order to execute her project, was going to a Country which almost wholly depended on him, formed himself the design to carry her away, and force her to marry George Gordon his eldest Son. Murray accompanying the Queen in her progress, several obstacles occurred, which caused the execution of the Plot against him to be delayed, from day to day. Mean while, the Earl of Huntley and his Son improved the occasion to execute their project. One day, when the Court was in a small and ill-fortified Town, George Gordon appeared near it with some Forces, in order to surprise the Queen's Person. But the Earl of Murray, by unexpected good fortune, found means to save her. This important Service effected for some time the disadvantageous impressions she had received of him.

The discovery of this Plot was not capable to make the Earl of Huntley desist from his enterprize. He still kept in arms with intent to surprise the Court, where the Earl of Sutherland was his Spy, and informed him of what passed there. But an intercepted Letter discovering all, Sutherland fled into Flanders, and the Earl of Murray at the head of some Forces marched against the Earl of Huntley, who bravely expected him. In a Battle fought on this occasion, Huntley was defeated and taken Prisoner, but died within a few days (2). George his Son escaping, the Duke of Chateaufort his Father-in-law very earnestly sued for his pardon, and upon some good hope given him by the Queen, put him into her hands. He was however conducted to Dunbar, tried and sentenced to die: But the Sentence was not executed (3).

While these things were transacting in Scotland, James Melvil, Author of the Memoirs under his Name, was employed at Inspruck to found the inclinations of the Imperial Court concerning the Marriage of Queen Mary with the Archduke Charles, second Son of the Emperor Ferdinand. The first overture of this design had been made by the Cardinal of Lorraine, in his way through Inspruck to the Council of Trent, with the offer of the Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, for a portion. This occasioned Maximilian, eldest Brother of Charles, to ask Melvil, speaking of this Marriage, whether the Scots would be willing to assist their Queen in obtaining the Crown of England. Hence it is plain, that the Guises had still this design in view, and were incessantly labouring to execute it. We must not therefore wonder, that Elizabeth had always an eye upon the Queen of Scots as upon a very dangerous Rival (4).

In the beginning of the year 1563, the Duke of Guise laid Siege to Orleans, which was the Magazine of the Huguenots, and where D'Andelot Brother of the Admiral was shut up with a numerous Garrison. The Place was now reduced to the last extremity, when the Duke of Guise was killed with a Pistol-Ball by a Gentleman named Poltrot. The Duke perceiving his end approaching, testified an extreme concern for having kindled the Civil War, and sent his serious advice to the Queen-Regent to make a Peace on any Terms. The Admiral being accused of this Murder, endeavoured to clear himself, but the Relations of the deceased persisted in their belief of his Guilt. Mean while, the Peace between the King and the Huguenots closely followed the death of the Duke of Guise, without any care taken by the Prince of Condé (5), to have his generous Friend the Queen of England included. Nor was this all. For Charles IX. besieging Havre de Grace, the Huguenots distinguished themselves in driving the English out of a place which themselves had put into their hands. If their conduct on this occasion showed them good Frenchmen, it was also a demonstration of their being very ill Politicians. Indeed they could not have done any thing more prejudicial to their own interest, or more agreeable to their Enemies than thus to quarrel with England. The Earl of Warwick defended the Place some time with great bravery and intrepidity (6), but the Plague which raged in the Town, daily swept away fifty of his Men (7), and reduced him to the necessity of a capitulation, by which the Town was restored to the King of France. After Havre was taken, a Peace was concluded between the two Crowns. The English Forces which had served in France bringing the Plague with them into England (8), it made terrible ravages, above twenty thousand dying in London only (9).

The death of the Duke of Guise made some alteration in the affairs of the Queen of Scotland. Charles IX. declaring himself of age to govern, was under the influence of the Queen his Mother, who not loving her Daughter-in-law, gave her some mortifications. The payment of her Dowry was discontinued, the Scotch Guard dismissed, and the Duke of Chateaufort denied his Revenues. The Duke of Guise left a Son, who was too young to have any share in the Government, and the Cardinal of Lorraine had no longer the same credit as during the life of his Brother. Mary complaining of her ill treatment from the Court of France, the Cardinal her Uncle fearing she might be provoked to turn to Elizabeth, was more pressing than ever for her Marriage with the Archduke, and did his utmost to accomplish it. Melvil says, however, in his Memoirs, that he perceived at the Imperial Court, it was not relished by Maximilian, eldest Son of the Emperor. Be this as it will, Mary readily received the Proposition. But as the death of the Duke of Guise had removed at a great distance the near prospect she had of mounting the Throne of England, she believed it necessary to manage Elizabeth, and desire her advice concerning the proposed Marriage. Elizabeth was alarmed at the design of allying the Queen of Scotland with the House of Austria, not being ignorant, with what view the Cardinal of Lorraine offered such a Marriage to his Niece. She therefore told Mary, by Randolph her Ambassador, that having for her the tenderness of a Sister, and regarding her interests as her own, she desired her to consider, that such an alliance would remove her for ever from the Throne of England, since the English would never run the hazard of falling under the dominion of the House of Austria: That England was not without Persons who had their pretensions to the Crown as well as herself, and might greatly embarrass her: It was therefore her interest to gain the affection of the English, by a Marriage which would not be uneasy to them: That if any English Nobleman was so happy as to please her, such a Marriage would doubtless remove the difficulties which lay in the way of her desire to be declared her presumptive Heir. This was the substance of what Randolph was ordered to represent to the Queen of Scotland, without naming however the Lord, Elizabeth wished to give her for Husband. But he had a secret Commission to intimate to the Earl of Murray, and Secretary Lidington, that he believed she had cast her eyes on the Lord Dudley (10).

Camden.

Elizabeth's answer threw Mary into great perplexity. She believed herself at least the lawful Heir of Elizabeth by her Birth-right; but Henry VIII., having not placed her in the line of the Succession, an Act of Parliament was necessary to restore her to her Right. Without this, she was in danger that, if Elizabeth died without heirs, the Will of Henry would be punctually complied with. On the other hand, her uncertainty whether Elizabeth would cause such an Act to be passed in her favour, and get her declared her Heir, made her unwilling to relinquish the hope given her by her Uncle the Cardinal, of being placed on the Throne of England by the assistance of the Pope, France, Spain, and the English Catholics. In this perplexity, she chose to inform the Cardinal of the representation made to her by Elizabeth, and of that Queen's design to marry her to Dudley. The Cardinal answered, That Dudley was not a fit match for her, and that Elizabeth only amused her, in pretending to marry her to a Man whom the intended for her own Bed. That as to the hope she was flattered with, of being declared her presumptive Heir, it was not much to be relied on, since, though she kept her word, the might have Children, which would render the Act of no use, or might, on the least pretence, cause it to be repealed. That it was therefore more agreeable to her interest, to depend upon the assistance of her real friends, than on such uncertain hopes.

This did not prevent Mary, after a mature examination of what had been offered on both sides, from resolving to desist from the design of marrying the Archduke, for fear of doing herself a prejudice in England. But withal, she determined to evade the Proposal, Elizabeth intended to make her, concerning Dudley, without breaking however with her. It was absolutely necessary to show a regard for Elizabeth, in order to continue with more ease her intrigues in England, and increase there the number of her Friends, which was already considerable. Besides that the Catholics were all for her, many Protestants were persuaded, that the Crown, if Elizabeth died without Children, could not be refused her without injustice, and the least discontent was capable to create a belief, that Mary had even a better Title than Elizabeth herself. This gave great uneasiness to Elizabeth, who feared, that Mary, by a Marriage with a Catholic Prince, would be enabled to support her Pretensions. Therefore she did all that lay in her power to divert her from any such design. To this end, she told Melvil, in his return through England, how much it would offend her, if Mary married without her advice. She added, as it was their common interest to live in a good understanding, she designed to make her two offers, that, by embracing either, she might avoid the jealousy, which her Marriage with a foreign Prince would raise in the English. The Treaty of Edinburgh was all this while unmentioned, the conjuncture not being proper to press that affair.

Frances Brandon Duchess of Suffolk, so often mentioned, died this year (1). She had accepted for her third Husband Adrian Stoker, a private Gentleman, by whom she had no Children. Of her three Daughters by her former Marriage with Grey Marquis of Dorset, and afterwards Duke of Suffolk, Jane the eldest had been proclaimed Queen after the death of Edward, and lost her life on a Scaffold. Catherine was in the Tower, or perhaps dead. Mary the third had been given in marriage to a Man so little distinguished, that there was no likelihood of her being put in competition with the Queen of Scotland. Thus by the death of the Duchess of Suffolk, Mary saw herself delivered from one Rival, who was Grand-daughter of Henry VII. (2).

The Truce between France and England ended at last in a Peace, signed at Troye in Champagne the 11th of April, 1564. By this Treaty, the King of France and Queen of England preserved entire all their pretensions, without mentioning any in particular, not even the restitution of Calais. There were only some separate Articles, which were left unsigned till the next day, concerning the Hostages delivered to Elizabeth after the Treaty of Cateau, which she was willing to restore for a very small sum (3). Thyackmorton, who had been arrested in France on some pretence (4), was set at liberty. After this, Elizabeth sent to King Charles the Order of the Garter by the Lord Hunston (5), who was sent into France to see the Peace sworn to.

At this time, the Commerce between England and the Netherlands was entirely broke, by the artifices of Cardinal Granvelle. As he foresaw, a War was going to be kindled in the Low-Countries, he was willing to remove the English, and for that purpose, had prevailed with the Governor to forbid the importation of English Cloths. This Prohibition obliged the English to set up a Staple for their Cloths at Emden, a Town of Friesland. But a new Ambassador (6) sent into England by Philip, in the room of the Bishop of Aquila, who was dead, considering, that his Master's Subjects would, from this interruption of Commerce, receive no less damage than the English, brought this affair to a Negotiation. As there occurred great difficulties, it was mutually agreed, that the Treaty of Commerce, called the Great Intercourse, made in the time of Maximilian, should subsist till one of the Parties notified the contrary to the other, with the allowances of forty days to the Merchants to withdraw their effects. This affair was very important to both Nations. Camden says, that in his time the Commerce between England and the Netherlands, rose yearly to above twelve Millions of Gold, and that the Woollen Trade alone amounted to above five millions (7).

This affair being finished, Elizabeth visited the University of Cambridge, where she was received with great pomp and magnificence. She testified her satisfaction in an elegant Latin Oration, wherein she assured the University of her protection, and intention to encourage Learning to the utmost of her power.

The tranquillity which the Queen then enjoyed would have been compleat, if her suspicions of the Queen of Scotland had not given her perpetual uneasiness. It was on her she was always reflecting, as on her most dangerous Enemy. She considered, that the Marriage of this Queen might prove to her a fountain of Troubles and Cares, and draw upon her the greatest misfortunes. So, her whole Policy tended either to obstruct all Marriages offered to Mary, or at least, to effect that she should espouse a Man, from whom England should have nothing to fear.

With this view she writ her a Letter, wherein, after many demonstrations of Friendship, she gave her advice concerning her Marriage, telling her, the marrying without her consent would ruin her affairs. Notwithstanding Mary's resolution to live in friendship with Elizabeth, she was provoked at her thus taking upon her to advise her, and even with an air of superiority, which was but too manifest (8). Forgetting therefore her resolution, and thinking only of making herself satisfaction (9), she returned such an answer to the Letter, as greatly offended Elizabeth. But some time after, reflecting that she herself broke her own measures, in quarrelling with Elizabeth, she dispatched Sir James Melvil to pay her compliments, and to endeavour to mend what had been spoiled by her impatience. Elizabeth received her compliments with equal dissimulation. After telling Melvil, how much cause she had to be offended with the Letter, she tore it (10) in his presence, testifying her readiness to be reconciled, and expressing an affection for her good Sister, which assuredly she had not. It was not her interest to quarrel, for fear of inducing Mary to marry some Prince, who would not have patience to wait the time of enjoying her Succession.

She therefore embraced this occasion to renew her instances to Mary for her choice of a Husband, proper to preserve their Friendship, and a good intelligence between the two Kingdoms. All this tended only to a setting forth of several reasons to persuade Mary to accept the Lord

(2) This year, a Parliament met at Wolmester, January 12, and was prorogued on April 30. They granted the Queen a Subsidy, and two Fifteenth and Tenths; and the Clergy gave a Subsidy of six Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in three years. Dewar.—The most remarkable Acts during this session, were these: 1. An Act against holding or maintaining the Authority of the Bishop of Rome. 2. That no one shall procure a false Witness, upon the Penalty of forty Pounds; nor any one be a false Witness, upon the Penalty of twenty Pounds, and six Months Imprisonment. 3. An Act making the clipping and washing of Coins, Treason. 4. That any Person which shall be seen or found, for one Month, in a Company of Egypt or Arabians, shall be a Felon. 5. An Act for the due execution of the Writ of Excommunicato Capiendo. 6. An Act for translating the bible and Common Prayer into English. 7. A Bill for the better regulation of the University of Cambridge. The work of the Reformation, which had been carrying on above thirty years, was in great measure completed, and the Articles of the Church of England settled by the Convention (3), and reduced to the number of thirty nine, as they stand to this day.

(7) She desired Mary to take heed, that in throwing Pleasae to the Earl of Lennox, she did not displease the House of Hamilton, fearing thereby trouble and strife might arise in her country. Melvil, p. 42.

(8) At any other time this Advice would not have been ill taken, but now all advices given by Elizabeth were misconstrued, partly on account of her having dissolved the Marriage with the Archduke, and partly because Rizzio, the Queen's Secretary for the French Tongue, was not very skillful in understanding French Letters. Jord.

Dudley

1564. Dudley, tho' she did not directly name him. It is, however, very uncertain, whether this Marriage was sincerely intended by Elizabeth, or only designed to amuse Mary, and prevent her thinking on others. Nay, it is very likely, Dudley, who depended upon Elizabeth, was only propoed to prolong the affair. This seems to be confirmed, by the permission afterwards granted by Elizabeth to the Lord Darnley, Son of the Countess of Lenox, to go into Scotland, though she was not ignorant that Mary had some thought of marrying that Lord, as the intimated to Melvil. Indeed, Mary had now resolved it, not in compliance with the counsels of Elizabeth, to espouse a Lord, little capable to give her uneasiness, but in hopes of receiving a considerable advantage from this Marriage. It had been frequently hinted to her, that there was room to doubt, whether her Title to the Crown of England was as good as the Duches of Suffolk's, which was supported by the Will of Henry VIII., and that this was a Point to be decided by English Lawyers. This was to keep her in submission, and prevent her disoblighing Elizabeth. When this uneasiness was removed by the death of the Duches of Suffolk, and Catherine her Daughter, the Rights of the Countess of Lenox, Daughter of Margaret Queen of Scotland, by her second Husband Archibald Earl of Angus, began to be whispered. Henry VIII. her Uncle, had given her in marriage to Matthew Stewart Earl of Lenox, who had withdrawn into England, as was said in the Reign of that Prince. The Countess of Lenox could not indeed, with any seeming justice, enter into competition with Mary, since she was born only of Margaret's second Marriage, whereas Mary came from the first. But it could be alledged in her favour, that she was one degree nearer, and it was to be feared for Mary, that this reason would prevail, if supported by Elizabeth. So, to avoid this competition, Mary had resolved to unite the Titles of the two Families, by her Marriage with the Lord Darnley, Son to the Countess of Lenox, and thereby disable Elizabeth to give her any disturbance. Elizabeth had for the same reason resolved to obstruct this Marriage, not from any fear of the Lord Darnley, but with intent to keep Mary always in awe and submission.

The Reconciliation between the two Queens being made, as I before said, Mary seriously thought of executing her design. But as she was prepossessed with a belief, that Elizabeth only sought to amuse her and prevent her from marrying, the saw it necessary to use some art, to draw the Earl of Lenox and his Son into Scotland. She began with the Father, and pretended to recall him in order to restore him to his Estate, forfeited during the Regency of the Duke of Chabelleraut. Elizabeth did not think it right to oppose the Earl of Lenox's return into his own Country, upon a motive so just and reasonable. In this whole affair the two Queens behaved with equal dissimulation. At the very time, Mary was taking measures to marry the Lord Darnley, unknown to Elizabeth, she pretended a readiness to be directed by her Counsels. She even consented to a Congress of Commissioners of both the Kingdoms, concerning her Marriage, though she was not ignorant of Elizabeth's intentions to propose to her Dudley, lately created Earl of Leicester (1). On the other hand, Elizabeth, not acquainted with Mary's design to marry the Lord Darnley, seemed not to perceive it, being well pleased to have her fix her thoughts upon a Subject, whom she believed to be at her disposal, because the Earl his Father had great possessions in England. She hoped therefore to have it always in her power to break off or delay this Marriage, as she should judge proper, her sole aim being to gain time, and amuse the Queen of Scotland.

Some time after, the Earl of Bedford (2) for England, and the Earl of Murray with Lidington for Scotland, had a Conference at Berwick (3), where the Earl of Bedford, according to his instructions, proposed the Marriage of the Queen of Scotland to the Earl of Leicester. But the two Scotch Commissioners, who had likewise their orders, received the Proposal with such coldness, that the Earl of Bedford thought it not proper to insist much on it. Nay, it is pretended, that the Earl of Leicester, who had some hope to marry Elizabeth (4), had desired him not to press it.

Mean time, Melvil being returned, freely told Mary, in laying his Negotiation before her, that the Queen of England's friendship was far from being sincere. This caused Mary, who had already no very good opinion of Elizabeth, to regard her as a secret Enemy, who, though she always called her good Sister, did not mean her well. Sometimes she thought Elizabeth only proposed the Earl of Leicester to her, that she herself might marry him with the less dishonour, after his having been encouraged by a Queen; and sometimes, that this Proposal was only an artifice, to waste time in fruitless negotiations.

This was spent the year 1564, in which Ferdinand I. died, leaving the Imperial Dignity, and his Hereditary Dominions, to his Son Maximilian.

The Queen of Scotland had for some time entertained David Rizzo, an Italian, who governed her absolutely. As this Queen entirely changed both her conduct and character, after this Stranger was received into her confidence, and as he was the first cause of the troubles of Scotland, and the misfortunes of his Mistress, it is necessary to say something of him.

David Rizzo, Son of a Musician of Turin, being Servant to the Count de Mureto, Ambassador to Scotland, attended his Master into that Country. As he perfectly understood Music (5), and sung a good Bass, he got acquainted with the Court-Musicians, and was introduced to the Queen, who wanting a Bass to her Concert, desired the Ambassador to leave him with her. His fine Voice often procuring him the honour of seeing and talking with the Queen, he so artfully insinuated himself into her good graces, that he daily increased in favour and credit. At last the Secretary of the French Dispatches being gone into France, Rizzo was chosen for that office during his absence. From this time he put his Fortune so successfully, that he became in a manner first Minister, nothing of moment being transacted at Court but by him. Buchanan, the Queen's great Enemy, often insinuates, that David's influence over her was not confined to publick Affairs. He says, she admitted him to her Table, and frequently dined at his, and by such uncommon familiarities gave occasion to scandalous suspicions. In a word, he says enough to incline those who pay entire credit to him, to believe that the Queen's Conduct was not free from crime. But as Buchanan may justly be suspected of aggravation, it is better to adhere to Melvil's account. He can be accused of no design to asperse the Queen's Reputation, since he rather, on all occasions, shews a great zeal for her, without however concealing her Faults. At the time when Rizzo was most in favour with the Queen, she had so entire a confidence in Melvil, as even to allow, or rather command him to admonish her of her Faults. See what this Author in his Memoirs says of Rizzo. As he entered in greater credit, so he had not the prudence how to manage the same rightly. For frequently, in presence of the Nobility, he would be publicly speaking to the Queen, even when there was greatest Conventions of the States. Which made him to be much envied and hated, especially when he became so great, that he presented all Signatures to be subscribed by her Majesty. So that some of the Nobility would frown upon him, others would shoulder and shut him by, when they entered the Queen's Chamber, and found him always speaking with her. All who had any business at Court, addressing themselves to him, and depending upon him, in short time he became very rich. — As he was a known Minion, and suspected to be a Pensioner, of the Pope, it gave ground of suspicion, that some design would be by him contrived against the Reformed Religion. The same Author adds, that having himself represented to the Queen the injury which her favours upon this Stranger now did, and might afterwards do her, his Remonstrance was very ill received, the Queen telling him, she would not be so far restrained, but that she might dispense her favours to such as she pleased. He says farther, that having remonstrated to Rizzo how much he offended the Nobility by his affectation to appear so great with the Queen, he seemed to pay some regard to his advice, but within a few days, told him, he had the Queen's order to behave as he was wont, without minding any thing. This Testimony, added to Camden's silence, who, having undertaken in his Annals of Elizabeth to justify the Queen of Scots, says nothing of Rizzo, shews that this Minister or Favorite entirely governed the Queen. So, the Lord Darnley being a Catholic, and Rizzo the Pope's Pensioner, as Melvil affirms, it is not to be doubted, that the Queen was determined to this Marriage by her Favorite's advice. It was therefore to have an opportunity of drawing that young Lord into Scotland, that she restored his Father to the possession of his Estate. As this was to be done in the Assembly of the States, summoned to meet in January, Darnley demanded leave to be absent three Months, in order to be at the Scotch Parliament, and obtained it by the Intercession of Cecil, who never imagined he would venture to espouse Mary, without the Queen's permission. Probably he was permitted to go into Scotland, only with intent to amuse the Queen, and perhaps to give her an opportunity to entertain for that handsome young Lord a pas-

1565. son, which would hinder her from thinking of any other. However this be, he was well received by the Queen, who immediately gave him great Marks of her Esteem, and shortly after, it was perceived she designed him for her Husband. Rizzo instantly contracted to close a friendship with him, that they both lay in the same bed.

After Rizzo had ingroffed the Queen's favour, the Earl of Murray saw his credit daily decline. This, added to the intended Marriage, and the great Union between Darnly and Rizzo, convinced him, it was time to retire, and to hasten him, the Queen recalled all his Enemies to Court. The Earl of Bothwell returned from France, the Earl of Sutherland from Flanders, and George Gordon, who was imprisoned at Dunbar, and under Sentence of Death, was released, and after obtaining his Pardon, took the Title of Earl Huntly. Murray could not see Bothwell, who would have murdered him, without resentment. He impeached him in a legal manner, and prevailed to have a day assigned for his Trial. The Queen, according to Buchanan, used her utmost endeavours to oblige Murray to desist from his Prosecution, and not succeeding, tried to corrupt his Judges. Notwithstanding so powerful a Protection, Bothwell thought it not proper to appear, but withdrew. Afterwards the Queen obtained from the Earl of Murray a sort of reconciliation with Bothwell. The same Historian pretends, that the Queen had conceived so violent hatred against Murray, that, jointly with Darnly and Rizzo, she formed a design to have him murdered in a Journey she made on purpose to Perth, but that Murray having some notice of it, retired to his Mother's at Lach-lenn.

He says further, that the Queen being at Perth, a Report was industriously raised, that Murray intended to surprise her and the Lord Darnly, in their return to Edinburgh. To make this report the more credible, Scouts were sent out on the Road, and the Queen came to Edinburgh, with a precipitation apt to create a belief of the greatness of her danger. It must however be owned, that Melvil speaks of a conspiracy to seize the Lord Darnly, as something real, though Buchanan will have it to be all imaginary; but Melvil does not ascribe it to Murray alone, since the Duke of Chateaufort, the Earls of Argyle, Glencairn, and Rothes were likewise concerned.

The Earl of Murray had a double interest to obstruct the projected Marriage, the one private, the other publick. I have already taken notice of the first, which engaged him to alter the State of the Court, where he could no longer support himself. The publick showed, first from the danger into which the Queen's Marriage with a Catholic Lord might throw the Reformed Religion. In the next place, it was to be feared, that this Marriage, being made without the Queen of England's participation, or any care for the preservation and support of the Reformed Religion, would lay a foundation for troubles, in which it was almost impossible for England and France not to be concerned, to the great prejudice of the Kingdom. The Earl of Murray was not the only person who disliked this Marriage. The Duke of Chateaufort sworn Enemy to the House of Lenox, the Earls of Argyle, Rothes, Marr, Glencairn, and many others, some from private Views, others from more honest motives, believed it time to apply effectual Remedies to the impending mischiefs, by making a league to oppose the designs of the Court. It is not easy to decide whether these Lords took arms before, or after, the Queen's Marriage. Buchanan intimates this was not till after, upon the Court's intending to oppress them. Melvil speaks of an insurrection of these Lords after failing to seize the Lord Darnly, and then proceeds to the recital of the Queen's Marriage. Camden positively asserts that the Queen, to celebrate the Marriage with more safety, was obliged to march with some Forces against the Confederate Lords, and forced them to fly into England. If this be true, she doubtless surprized them before they were prepared. This is not the only disagreement between Camden and Melvil.

However this be, Mary, having resolved on her Marriage, had now applied to the Pope for a Dispensation (1). When the knew it was granted, she assembled the Great Men of her Court, who were all devoted to her, and asked their advice concerning her Marriage, which was unanimously approved. Only it was added, not to exasperate the People, that care was to be taken of the Protestant Religion. The first part of this approbation was gladly accepted, but as for the restriction, it was no more heard of. Buchanan says, the Earl of Murray undertook to procure Elizabeth's consent, provided the Protestant Religion was secured. But this was not the intention of the Court, who perceived this security would be the Guaranty of Elizabeth, which agreed neither with the interests of the Queen, nor those of Rizzo, and the Lords newly taken into favour.

Mean time, the People began to murmur by the secret intigations of the Confederate Lords. It was debated in private Conversations, whether the Queen could marry without the consent of the States. Some said, she could not be denied a natural Right enjoyed by all her Subjects. Others maintained, that the condition of the Queen and her Subjects was not the same, because the Queen, by her Marriage, gave a Sovereign to her Subjects, which she could not do without their consent. These freedoms convinced the Queen, that she must hasten her Marriage, not to be any longer exposed to the difficulties which might be started, whilst there was hope to obstruct it. She believed, however, that she could not avoid asking, not the advice, but the approbation, of Elizabeth, whom it was, as I said, her interest to manage. She writ to her therefore (2), to communicate her design as a thing already resolved. Elizabeth, on sight of the Letter, assembled her Council, who examined this affair with great attention. The result was, that the Marriage of the Queen of Scotland with Darnly was dangerous to Religion and the Kingdom. To Religion, because that Queen, in chusing a Catholic Lord, intended, it was to be feared, to reitire her Religion in Scotland, which would be very prejudicial to that of the Protestants. To the Kingdom, as Mary uniting by this Marriage the interests of the two Houses, who could pretend to the Crown of England, seemed to have a design of forming a powerful Party in the Kingdom, and preventing the interruption of her Cabals, by opposing against her the House of Lenox. For these reasons, some of the Counsellors were for sending immediately an Army into Scotland, to support the Male-contents. But Elizabeth thought it not proper to be so hasty, and the more, as the alleging that her Marriage might be dangerous to England, was but a weak pretence to make war upon the Queen of Scots (3). She contented herself therefore, with sending Sir Nicolas Throckmorton, to make her sensible of the hazard the ran of losing her expectation of mounting the Throne of England, by a Marriage so disagreeable to the English. Mary's answer was, that the affair was too far advanced to be recalled, nor had Elizabeth any reason to disapprove this Marriage, since by her advice she had now chose an Englishman, descended from the Royal Blood of both Kingdoms, and the first Nobleman of all Britain. Throckmorton, unable to prevail with Mary, signified to the Earl of Lenox and the Lord Darnly, that their licence being expired, they were to return to England, or their Estates would be forfeited (4). This menace was incapable to command their obedience in such a conjuncture. However, they both writ very submissively to the Queen, and Darnly in particular protested, that he only accepted the honour done him by the Queen of Scotland, with intent to preserve a perfect harmony between the two Kingdoms.

But this was not the only Commission the Ambassador of England was charged with. He had also Instructions to encourage the discontented Lords, and give them hopes of the Queen's protection. It was probably from this encouragement that they took arms to oppose the Marriage. But the Queen prevented them, by having it solemnized the 29th of July, in her own Chapel, after the manner of the Church of Rome. Buchanan says, she had two other reasons to hasten her Marriage. The first was, her fear of the Cardinal of Lorraine's opposition, who wished her to make a more considerable alliance. The other was, that Rizzo was willing to recommend himself to the Pope, by giving the Queen a Catholic Husband, without any security for the Protestant Religion.

Mean time, the Confederate Lords being cited, and not appearing, the Queen, whether before or after her Marriage, put herself at the head of four thousand Men, and pursuing them from place to place, forced them at last to retire into England. There they found a safe retreat (5), notwithstanding the Treaty of the year 1560, by which the two Queens mutually promised to deliver the fugitive Rebels. But such Articles are usually very ill observed. Melvil relates a particular which deserves notice. The Scotch fugitive Lords having deputed to Elizabeth the Earl of Murray, to desire her protection, she politically induced him to own, before the Ambassadors of France and Spain,

(1) As who told me, she created the Lord Darnly, Baron of Ardenmanach, Earl of Riff, and Duke of Rutsey, which are the usual Titles of the eldest sons of Kings in Scotland. Hist. of the High. Ref. p. 343.

(2) By Elizabeth, Camden, p. 356.

(3) The two Queens had an interview this year, in May or June; but what the effect of it was, does not appear. Streyke's Ann. Tom. I. p. 510.

(4) Queen Elizabeth on June 22, ordered the Council of Lenox, and her Son Charles, to be put in Custody. Camden, p. 397. Melvil, p. 58.

(5) Melvil says, that Queen Elizabeth, by her Ambassadors, promised to hazard her Crown in their Defense, in case they were driven to any flight.

Hist. of the High. Ref. p. 377.

1565. that she was not concerned in their Rebellion. But the words were no sooner out of Murray's mouth, than she called them Rebels and Traitors, and forbid them her presence. This was to clear herself to the Ambassadors: but it was all a farce, since she still granted the Fugitives a safe retreat in her Kingdom: Nay, privately supplied them with Money by the Duke of Bedford (1).

Mary's Marriage with a Catholic, the great credit of Rizzio, and the concern of many for the fate of the fugitive Lords, produced a discontent among the Scots, which daily increased, by the secret intrigues of the Relations and Friends of the Fugitives. The Preachers still greatly inflamed it, by insinuating to the People, that Religion was in extreme danger. Notwithstanding all this, the Court, now prosperous and elate, relolved, contrary to the Rules of Policy, and at a time when the Kingdom was disaffected, to degrade and banish the fugitive Lords by a decree of the States. To this end, the States were summoned to meet in February the next year. Melvil says, in his Memoirs, that having represented to the Queen the mischiefs this rigour might produce, she at first seemed to mind him, but however, persisted in her resolution for two reasons. The first was, the avarice of Rizzio, who had an eye to the confiscation of the Exiles Estates. The second was, the powerful sollicitation of the Cardinal of Lorraine against them. He still thought of placing the Queen his Niece on the Throne of England, and therefore judged, if the Fugitives of Scotland, as they were the Heads of the Protestants, were once ruined, it would be easy to restore the Romish Religion in Scotland, and afterwards, invade Elizabeth from thence. Rizzio, the Pope's Creature, acted doubtless from the same motive, and in all appearance, the new King was no enemy to the design. If Elizabeth is to be credited, in what she writ to her Ambassador in France some years after, Mary and the Lord Darnley, from the moment of their Marriage, never ceased to cabal against England. On this supposition, it will not appear strange, that Elizabeth fomented the troubles in Scotland, to put it out of the power of her Enemies to invade her.

In the mean time, Elizabeth sent into Scotland, Tamworth, a Gentleman [of her Privy-Chamber,] with a Letter written with her own hand, wherein she demanded of Mary, that the Lord Darnley, to whom she vouchsafed to give the Title of King, should be delivered up to her, according to the tenor of their Treaty. Mary refused to give the Ambassador audience; but was willing to receive the Letter. Whilst she was reading it in the presence of some Lords, Rizzio came in, and snatching it out of her hands, hindered her from proceeding (2). He judged that Elizabeth demanded the King, only to oblige the Queen to pardon the Exiles, to which he could not agree, being determined to ruin them, though the Earl of Murray had sent him a very submissive Letter, with a fine Diamond inclosed. Mary answered Elizabeth, That she would not attempt any thing against England so long as she lived, provided she was declared her presumptive Heir by Act of Parliament. As to the fugitive Lords, she desired her to leave her at liberty, to dispose of them as she pleased, since she did not meddle with what passed in England.

Whilst Rizzio was employed in taking measures to execute his Projects, the Queen conceived an extreme aversion to her new Spouse, which soon became publick, because she took no care to conceal it. She was not contented with grievously mortifying him in private, but was pleased all the World should know how little she valued him. When they were first married, she had caused the King's name to be set with her own in all publick Acts, and on the Coin (3), but presently after she ordered her own to be placed before the King's, and even caused his to be left out in the stamp for Money. Mean while, she continued, without any relieve, her scandalous familiarities with Rizzio, if we may believe Buchanan. Melvil says: not so much on this subject, but, besides his plain intimations, he manifestly supposes it, otherwise there would be no coherence in what he relates. As for Camden, who makes it his business to vindicate Queen Mary upon all occasions, he scarce mentions Rizzio, and for the Queen's aversion to the King, he accuses the Earl of Murray, then a fugitive in England, of having caused it by his Letters and Friends. He pretends, Murray took occasion, from the alteration enjoined by the Queen, with respect to the Acts and the Coin, to sow discord between them; so assigning for cause, what was only the effect, of the Queen's aversion.

Buchanan must be copied, to represent fully all the mortifications the Queen made the King undergo, the affronts she put upon him, and the little discretion she observed in her familiarities with Rizzio (4). Perhaps this Historian is guilty of great aggravation. But however, it cannot be denied, that the King was jealous. The question is to know, whether the Queen gave occasion for this jealousy, as Buchanan pretends; or whether, as Camden affirms, the Earl of Murray, tho' absent, intilled it into the King, without any foundation, by his Letters and Friends (5). Melvil, who may be considered as an unsuspected evidence, plainly supposes the King's jealousy, without any mention of the cause, and it may be almost affirm'd, that if he had thought the Queen entirely innocent, he would not have failed to clear her. He adds, that the Friends of the fugitive Lords improving the visible discord between the King and Queen, and the disposition of the King with regard to Rizzio, induced him to relolve to take away the life of that Favorite, in order, by his death, to put a stop to the prosecution of the Fugitives, who properly had no other adversary but him. This seems to confirm what Buchanan says, since Melvil supposes the King's jealousy, and since the friends of the Fugitives only made use of the King's disposition. On the other hand, Camden seems to have said justly, that the Earl of Murray's Friends inspired the King with the design to dispatch Rizzio out of the way. But we shall see presently, that by the Friends of the fugitive Lords, Melvil did not mean the Earl of Murray's particular Friends, but rather those of the other Lords, who, like him, had taken refuge in England.

The King having taken this resolution, and consulted some of his Domesticks how to execute it, the Queen, who was informed of it, was so enraged with him, as made him still more sensible how much she was concerned for that unworthy Favorite. As the design was discovered, the King was afraid of his own life, and not knowing what course to take, asked advice of his Father the Earl of Lenox, who was of opinion, privately to recall the fugitive Lords, and strengthen himself, by their aid, against Rizzio's attempts. Probably, it was then, the King sent to these Lords, that they might return to Scotland, whether he only gave them some general hopes of a revolution to their advantage, or informed them of his most secret designs.

In July, this year, was the famous Interview of Bayonne, where the two Courts of France and Spain relolved to use their utmost endeavours to extirpate the Heretics, as it afterwards appeared. Very likely, Queen Elizabeth was not forgot on this occasion.

The Members of the Parliament of Scotland daily repaired to Edinburgh in the beginning of the year 1566. As they arrived, Rizzio openly solicited them to obtain the condemnation of the fugitive Lords, notwithstanding the warm instances of the English Ambassador, who conjured the Queen to pardon them, or at least, delay their Trial. These instances were so far from moving her, that they rather helped to confirm her resolution, because she considered Elizabeth as an Enemy, against whom she was to guard. These Lords being the Heads of the Protestants, it was probable the Queen of England demanded their pardon, only to have so many powerful Friends when they should return to their Country. But this was what the Queen and Rizzio were relolved to prevent at any rate, knowing their Projects would be very difficult to be accomplished, when these Lords were in Scotland. And therefore, they were to be deprived of all hopes to return.

1566. In short, his death was determined, the King having first signed a Writing, declaring himself to be the Author (1). His Instruments were, the Lord Ruthven, and George Douglas, natural Son to the Earl of Angus (2), Morton only advising the thing, without lending his assistance, and it was executed in this manner. The Queen being at Table, and Rizzo in her Chamber, the King came up by a private pair of Stairs, and stood some time leaning upon her Chair. Presently after, the Lord Ruthven and George Douglas entered all armed, and attended with some of their Complices, the rest having posted themselves in several parts of the Palace to prevent assistance. These Men entered so abruptly, that the Table was overturned. The Queen asking Ruthven what his design was, he made her no answer, but speaking to Rizzo, boldly commanded him to go out of the room, saying, the place he sat in was not fit for him. It seems by that, Rizzo was at Table with the Queen. But as that will, Rizzo perceiving he was the mark they aimed at, trembled for fear, and took hold of the Queen's Robe, to put himself, as it were, under her protection, who did all she could to interpose herself between him and the Conspirators. But the King taking her in his arms, and telling her she had nothing to fear, hindered her from exposing herself to the danger, and withal, from freeing Rizzo. Mean time, George Douglas taking the King's Dagger from his side, drew it, and stabbed Rizzo, who was immediately dragged into another room (3), and there slain (4). The Queen was then above five months gone with child, and it may be easily judged, that the committing such a deed in her presence must have made her like to miscarry (5).

Rizzo being dead, a Guard was set upon the Queen, who found means however to tell Melvil to go instantly to the Provost of Edinburgh, and bid him draw the People together and come to her relief. Melvil having discharged his Commission, the Provost answered, he would do his endeavour to serve the Queen, but there was not much to be expected from the People, who were extremely displeased with the Government. Some however appearing in Arms before the Palace, the King shewed himself out of a Window, and assuring them that Rizzo was slain by his command, ordered them to retire, which they did immediately (6).

Mean while, the Queen not doubting, Rizzo's Murder was committed in favour of the fugitive Lords, and that they would soon return into Scotland, sent to Melvil by one of her Ladies, that he would endeavour to prepossess the Earl of Murray, and intreat him from her not to join with her Enemies, for which he might depend upon her love and favour for ever. Murray and the other fugitive Lords arrived indeed two days after Rizzo's death, having had notice of the change which was to happen at Court.

Camden draws this conjecture from the sudden arrival of the fugitives, that Rizzo's murder must have been committed for the sake of the Earl of Murray, who was to be condemned two days after by the Parliament. But it appears, on the contrary, in Melvil's Memoirs, that the Earl of Murray's particular Friends had no hand in the deed, since he did not think himself at all obliged to the Actors. What Melvil says upon this occasion, shews that the consequence drawn by Camden against the Earl of Murray from the sudden Arrival of the Fugitives, is not just. His words are these: Which Commission [to persuade Murray not to join with her Enemies,] I did not fail to execute at Melvil's coming upon Monday, but he was more moved at his meeting with her Majesty, who embraced and kissed him, acknowledging that if he had been at home, he would not have suffered her to have been so uncharitably handled. Which so much moved him, that the Tears ran from his Eyes. He knew sufficiently well that it was not for his Cause, but their own particular ends, that the greatest part who had made that Enterprize had therein engaged, which made him the less concerned in them. Can any thing be more opposite to Camden's inference? This Historian will have Rizzo to be slain on the Earl of Murray's account, and in order to prevent his Condemnation, without mentioning the other fugitive Lords, as if their Friends had not been concerned in the deed. And yet Melvil, who was then present in the Court, and writ long before him, says positively, that the Friends of the other fugitive Lords were the sole Authors of the murder, and that the Earl of Murray's were not engaged in it. By such strokes as this, and by perpetual invectives against Murray, Camden has disfigured the Scotch History of those days, and withal, that of England, in what it has in common with this neighbouring Kingdom.

While the Queen was kept in confinement, Scotland was in a real Anarchy, which however did not last. The King quickly began to repent of following such violent Counsels, and the Queen, who perceived it, managed him so artfully, that she persuaded him to abandon Rizzo's Murderer's (7). This unexpected turn astonished them, especially as they saw, contrary to their expectation, that the Earl of Murray would not join with them. The Queen embracing to take an opportunity, proposed an Agreement, to which they readily consented, unable as they were to support themselves. But she had the Address to cause the Writing to be so penned, that there was occasion to make several alterations before it could be settled. This was done to gain time, and give the Queen leisure to take necessary measures to free herself from Captivity. When the Writing was drawn to the satisfaction of the Parties, she represented to the King, that if the signal it whistled a Prisoner, it would be of no force, and by that means the King got her guard to be diminished. But instead of signing the Writing, the found means to escape (8) and retire to Dunbar, where she brought the King along with her (9). When she was going away, she ordered Melvil [by one of her Ladies,] to use his utmost endeavours to keep the Earl of Murray in his good resolution, and Melvil says, Murray and his Friends assured him of their constant fidelity to the Queen.

Mary being come to Dunbar and resuming her Authority, granted a pardon to the Earl of Murray, and afterwards the Earls of Argyle, Robbs and Glencairn obtained the same favour. As for the Duke of Chateaufort, he had withdrawn from them before they were constrained to fly into England. The Queen's Anger was wholly turned against Rizzo's Murderers: But Morton, Ruthven and Douglas being fled into England, she could punish only some of their Complices, who were executed. Buchanan affirms, she caused Rizzo's body to be removed from the obscure place where it was buried, and laid in the Sepulchre of the Kings, close by Magdalen of France, Daughter of Francis I. It is easy to guess that the deed lately

(4) The account of this matter is thus given by the Lord Ruthven, the principal Actor in this business. "Upon Saturday the ninth day of March, the Earl of Morton, Lord Ruthven, and Lord Lindsay, with their Complices, passed up to the Queen's utter Chamber, and the old Lord Ruthven pulled in through the King's Chamber, and up through the privy way to the Queen's Chamber, as the King had desired him, and sought the Chamber to the Queen, where he found the Queen's Majesty sitting at her Supper, at the tables of a little Table, the Lady Rizzo being at one end, and Dowie [Rizzo] at the other end of the Table, with her Cap on his head, the King speaking with the Queen's Majesty, and his hand about her Waist. As the Queen's Majesty coming in, said to the Queen's Majesty, It would please your Majesty to let your Majesty know that your Majesty's Honour, the King her Husband, the Nobility and Commonwealth of the Realm. And how? said she. It will please your Majesty, that he hath been over-long here. Majesty's Honour, which I dare not be bold to speak of: As to the King your Husband's Honour, he hath been here of the Queen's Matrimonial, which your Grace promised him, besides many other things which are not necessary to be expressed. And as to the Nobility, he hath caused your Majesty to be banished a great part, and most chief thereof, in so far as he suffered not your Majesty to print or give none other but that which pulled down his Honour. By taking of the Queen's Grace for the same. Besides many other Inconveniences that he admitted your Majesty to do. Then the said Lady said to the King, Sir, take the Queen's Majesty your Sovereign and Wife to you, who stood all amazed, and wist not what to do. Then her Majesty rose on her Feet, and stood before Dowie, he holding her Majesty by the plates of her Gown, leaning back over in the Window, the Whimsy being in his hand. Arthur Erskin, and the Abbot of Holyrood-house, and others, began to lay hands on the old Lord Ruthven, none of the King's party being present. Then the said Lord pulled out his Whimsy, and freed himself while we came in, and said to them, Lay a hand on me, for I will not be bound; and at the coming of others into the Cabinet, the said Lord Ruthven put up his Whimsy. And with the Rising up of Men, the Lord told to the Wallwards, with most and candles being thereon; and the Lady of Argyle took up one of the Candles in her hand and in the same instant, the said Lord Ruthven took the Queen in his Arms, and put her into the King's Arms, beseeching her Majesty not to be afraid for them. He would do her Majesty's Body more harm, than their own. Hence; and offered her Majesty, all that was done with the King's own Word and Action. Then the remnant Gentlemen being in the Cabinet, took Dowie out of the Window; and after that they had him out in the Queen's Chamber, the said Lord Ruthven followed, and bad take him down the privy way to the King's Chamber; and the said Lord returned to the Cabinet again, he saving that the said Dowie had been had down to the King's Chamber, as said is: But the press of the People had a hand in him to the utter Chamber, where there was a great number of bandings, who were so vehemently moved against the said Dowie, that they could not abide any longer, but drew him at the Queen's fair Door in the utter Chamber's. She put a constraint upon herself whilst a Prisoner; but as soon as the saw herself at liberty, she mortified him beyond all patience. Buchanan is very circumstantial, and what he relates is in a manner confirmed by Melvil. This last says, the Queen could not bear the King in her sight; she fled from his Company; and he went up and down all alone, seeing few durst bear him Company. He was mistified by the Queen, and by all such as secretly favoured the late banished Lords: So that it was a great pity to see that good young Prince cast off, who failed rather for want of good Counsel and Experience, than from any bad inclinations. In a word, the Queen, who had resolved to lie-in at Sterling, seeing the King arrive there, retired without him to the Castle of Edinburgh, to expect the time of her Delivery.

Now began the Earl of Bothwell to hold in the Queen's affection the place, Rizzio had possessed. As the new Favorite found the Queen had a great regard for the Earl of Murray, who had lately given her convincing proofs of his fidelity, he joined with the Earl of Huntley and John Lesley, Bishop of Ross to destroy him. To this end, they intimated to the Queen, that he intended to get the Earl of Morton, and the rest of Rizzio's Murderers re-called, in order to form a Party against her whilst she was in child-bed (1): But she would not believe it, and Melvil entirely undeceived her. Thus Murray was always exposed to his Enemies, to whom the Queen, by her own misfortune, gave but too much access to her Person.

Elizabeth disposes
Mary's Designs by help of a Spy.
Melvil
p. 68.

Elizabeth being fully informed of what passed at the Court of Scotland, was not sorry to see her good Sister, (for so she called Mary) pursue a course contrary to her true interest, in trusting to Men who could not but ruin her. She knew Mary could not relinquish her Project of dethroning her, and that the Pope, the Cardinal of Lorraine, and the Courts of France and Spain, took great care to keep her in this resolution. So, the better to discover her secrets, she had sent one Rusby (2) into Scotland, who feigning to fly out of England, and to hate Elizabeth mortally, had insinuated himself into Mary's favour, and by degrees, got out of her some important secrets, which he communicated to Secretary Cecil. These discoveries having confirmed Elizabeth's suspicions, were the reason, that though she had by Proclamation commanded all the fugitive Lords of Scotland to depart out of her Dominions, she gave them private assurances of her protection, designing, when occasion, to make them her instruments to raise Mary's disturbances, which should prevent her from thinking of England.

The Spy is discovered.
p. 69.

Mean while, Sir Robert Melvil, the Scotch Ambassador in England, having found that Rusby was Cecil's Spy, gave notice of it to the Court of Scotland, who ordered him to be arrested with all his Papers, among which were found some of Cecil's Letters in Cypher (3). He was kept with such care, that it could not be known why he was apprehended. Shortly after, Elizabeth sending Killingrew into Scotland about some affairs, ordered him to demand Rusby as an English Fugitive. Mary, feigning to be ignorant of Rusby's business in Scotland, replied, she was ready to deliver him to any Person, whom the Queen her Sister should commission to receive him. But Elizabeth understanding, he had been arrested, and suspecting the reason, said no more of the matter. Thus these two Queens, amidst their mutual demonstrations of Friendship, looked upon one another, however, as real Enemies, and not without cause. Mary was privately labouring, by her emissaries, to corrupt Elizabeth's Subjects, and inspire them with a Spirit of Rebellion. Elizabeth, on her part, countenanced the Male-contents of Scotland, with secret intimations, that they should always find in her powerful protection.

The two Queens converse one another as Enemies.

Whilst these things were transacting, the Queen of Scotland was delivered of a Prince, on the 19th of June, and immediately James Melvil was sent to Elizabeth, to carry her the news, and desire her to stand Godmother to the new-born Infant. Melvil says, in his Memoirs, that Secretary Cecil having brought the news to the Queen, who was then at a Ball, the dancing immediately ended, and the Queen sat down in her Chair, leaning her head upon her hand, without speaking a word; that one of her Ladies asking the reason of her sudden melancholy, she replied, The Queen of Scots was Mother of a Son, while she was but a barren Stock. However, next morning, when she gave audience to the Envoy, she appeared better dressed, and more gay than usually, expressing very great joy that the Queen her good Sister was safely delivered. At this Audience, Melvil insinuating to her, that in this juncture she could not better shew her concern for what related to the Queen of Scotland, than by declaring her presumptive Heir to the Crown of England; she coldly answered, the affair was in the hands of the Lawyers, and the heartily wished her Title might be found well grounded.

Whilst Melvil was at London, Mary's principal Friends thought it absolutely necessary to remove the Court of England's suspicions occasioned by Rusby's Intelligence; and that, for this purpose, it would be proper for Queen Mary to write two Letters, one to her Ambassador in ordinary, to be shewn to Elizabeth, another to Secretary Cecil (4), and draughts were sent to her. These Letters were writ accordingly. In that to her Ambassador, Mary protested, she expected nothing, but by the favour and friendship of her good Sister. She enjoined her Ambassador, not to hearken to any Proposal of the Male-contents, but to threaten to discover their Plots if they came to his knowledge. The other Letter, directed to the Secretary of State, contained much the same Protections. By these Letters, adds Melvil, Rusby's Intelligence was suppressed, and my Brother suffered to stay in England, whereby the Queen's Friends so increased, that many whole Shires were ready to rebel, and their Captains already named by the Election of the Nobility.

This confession of a Man, who, probably, was well informed, since he was Brother of the Ambassador in ordinary, shews what were Mary's designs. Can it be thought, that the Ambassador undertook to incite the Nobles and Counties of England to rebel, contrary to the will of the Queen his Mistress, or without her knowledge? There are in Melvil's Memoirs several passages to the like effect, which shew, that Mary and her Friends were perpetually striving to increase her adherents in England, and to keep them disposed to take Arms against Elizabeth, when it should be deemed proper. It is therefore no wonder if Mary refused to ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh. That ratification would have discouraged her Friends in England and other Countries. Elizabeth was not ignorant of Mary's aim, which, in short, was to dethrone her, if she could possibly find means. This was the reason of her pressing her so earnestly to take the false step of ratifying the Treaty of Edinburgh, in order to break her measures. On the other hand, at the very time Mary was making Protections of Friendship to her good Sister, and intreating her to stand Godmother to her Son, she was endeavouring to inflame her, by persuading her to get her declared Heir to the Crown. She knew, could the once obtain that advantage, her Party, which was already very great in England, would become more numerous and powerful. But they both knew their interests too well, to fall into the Snares, they laid for each other. So, Mary never ratified the Treaty of Edinburgh, neither did Elizabeth ever declare her next Heir. It may, however, be justly presumed, that if Mary had not lost herself another way, as we shall see presently, she would have thrown Elizabeth into difficulties, which, with all her policy, she would have hardly got clear of.

In the interval between Mary's Childbed, and the Prince's Baptism, she was seen to treat the King with so great contempt, and to put such grievous affronts upon him, that it was the talk of the whole Kingdom. Buchanan is not content with enlarging upon this subject; but speaks moreover of the Queen's amours with Bothwell, in a manner that shews she had lost all shame, and no longer regarded what the World said of her. It might be thought, Buchanan, who hated the Queen, has used aggravation, if what happened afterwards, did not too evidently confirm what he has said. Camden says nothing of the Queen's amours with Bothwell, and speaks but slightly of her aversion for the King, calling it only a difference between them, because these were things directly contrary to his design of an entire vindication. Melvil found himself embarrassed. He durst not say all; but the sequel and connexion of his Memoirs, necessarily requiring he should say something of the Queen's amours, he contents himself with intimating, in several places, that Bothwell was at that time absolute at Court, and entirely governed the Queen (5). He was not so reserved with respect to the Queen's aversion for the King, since he does not scruple to shew it was extreme.

The Prince's Baptism being to be celebrated at Sterling, the Ambassadors of France, England, and Savoy, who were to stand Godfathers, repaired thither, and the Court was very numerous. It was the Earl of Bedford, whom Elizabeth sent to stand in her place (1). The Prince was named James, and the Queen prevailed, though with much difficulty, that he should be baptized after the manner of the Romish Church, intending to educate him in the Catholic Religion. Whilst the Court was at Sterling, the King was exposed to unheard of indignities, not daring to shew himself, by reason of the extreme want he was reduced to, whilst Bathwell appeared with a royal magnificence, to the great scandal of the World. But without inflicting upon what Buchanan says, since he is not thought impartial, I shall content myself with the Testimony of Melvil. The Queen, says that Author, being at Sterling, seemed very melancholy, and complained to me of Rinzo's murder, as of an outrage which could not be blotted out of her mind. I endeavoured to comfort her, and to persuade her to recall the banished Lords, that the might enjoy a peaceable Government. I had now somewhat prevailed with her; but, alas, she had had Company about her, for the Earl of Bothwell, who had a mark of his own that he shot at, as soon as he understood of her wife and merciful deliberation, took occasion to bring in the Earl of Mortoun, and his Associates, thereby to make them friends, and by them to fortify his Faction. For apparently, he had already in his head the resolution of performing the foul murder of the King, which he afterwards put in execution, that he might marry the Queen. He adds further, that the Earl of Bedford being upon the point of returning to England, desired him to tell the Queen from him, That for her own honour, she should entertain the King as she had done at the beginning. Melvil discharged his Commission, but without any effect. What Buchanan relates, is much better confirmed by these Testimonies, than confuted by Camden's silence.

After the Ceremony of the Baptism, the Earl of Bedford, pursuant to Elizabeth's Orders, pressed the Queen of Scotland to ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh. Hitherto she had only used Pretences and Excuses to evade this demand; but now she spoke more freely. She answered, there was an Article in the Treaty expressed in ambiguous terms, which she could not ratify, without great prejudice to herself: That however, she offered to send Commissioners to the Borders, to agree with those of the Queen of England upon a new Treaty, wherein she would promise to assume neither the Title nor Arms of England, so long as Elizabeth and her Heirs should live. Thus the difficulty was at length unravelled, and indeed, Elizabeth could not with justice require more of her. Nevertheless, she took this answer for a refusal, which, in my opinion, is a clear evidence of what I have said elsewhere, that Elizabeth intended to make use of this absolute ratification, if Mary had been so unwise as to give it, against Mary herself, and thereby prove she had no Title to the Crown of England. It is extremely probable, that most of the English Protestants, after having been so cruelly persecuted in the foregoing Reign, wanted only a pretence to exclude a Catholic Prince from the Succession.

The Court of Scotland being returned to Edinburgh after the Prince's Baptism, the King was treated there in so injurious a manner, that he resolved at last to retire to Glasgow to the Earl his Father, who had left the Court, not to be a witness of the base indignities offered to the King his Son. Just as he was going, some of the Queen's Officers took away all his Plate, and gave him a fust of Pewter. He was hardly a mile from Edinburgh, when he felt himself seized with a very violent illness, caused by Poison, given him before his departure (2). He went on, however, to Glasgow, where Physick, and the strength of his Constitution, overcame the violence of his Distemper, though with great difficulty. Not to interrupt the thread of the affairs of Scotland, I have run over at once what of moment happened in that Kingdom, in the year 1566. We must now proceed to other matters.

In the beginning of this year, Charles IX. sent Mr. de Rambouillet into England, with two Collars of the Order of St. Michael, which he desired Elizabeth to confer on what two Noblemen she pleased. She made choice of the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Leicester, and honoured the Bearer with the Order of the Garter (3). But we must not be deceived by these external marks of mutual esteem and friendship between the two Courts, for they were far from being sincere. Elizabeth had broke the measures of the Court of France, by driving the French out of Scotland. Moreover, she was looked upon as the Head and Protectress of the Protestants, whose destruction had been determined in the Conference of Bayonne. So, in all appearance, it was only to amuse her, that the Court of France gave her this equivocal mark of their esteem. Elizabeth was not ignorant, that the French Court, which was extremely bigotted, and where the Queen of Scotland had such powerful Friends, had no affection for her: Nay, supposing she had received no intelligence of the resolution taken at Bayonne, which was, however, known or guessed by the Huguenots of France, she could never trust that Court.

This year, the Earl of Arundel departed the Kingdom with the Queen's leave, under colour of changing the air for the recovery of his health. It was thought, the real motive of his retreat, was his despair of marrying with the Queen, with which he had vainly flattered himself (4).

Shortly after Elizabeth's receiving the news of the Queen of Scotland's delivery, she visited the University of Oxford, where she was received in the same manner as at Cambridge. She also shewed here, by her discourse and courteous behaviour, an extraordinary regard for that University (5). Never was Prince greater master than herself of the art of gaining the love of her Subjects, by kind and affectionate expressions, which seemed to flow from her Heart (6).

Notwithstanding all this, a terrible storm was gathering against her. The Queen of Scotland having been delivered of a Prince, her Friends began to stir, and scrupled not to act openly, in order to have her declared the Queen's Heir. The Parliament met in November (7) with that resolution. Those who managed the affair were Mary's chief Friends, and had only her in view: but the publick good was pretended by all. Among the Lords there were, who seeing Elizabeth unmarried, and the Queen of Scots inclined to a divorce, flattered themselves with marrying one or other. To this end they kept behind the curtain, and let their Friends to work, in order to strike in the most critical minute. At length, the Party being made, it was moved in the Upper-House, to address the Queen, and pray her to marry, or appoint a Successor. Among the reasons alledged for this request, some were contradictory; but all Arguments were good to those who had formed the Project, provided they could engage the Majority on their side. To gain those who had only the publick good in view, they were told, if the Queen died without issue, the Kingdom would be exposed to great Troubles, because nothing yet was settled about the Succession. The zealous Protestants were made to fear, that the Queen of Scotland having a claim to the Crown, there was danger of seeing the late Reign acted over again, if the Queen did not take a Husband, and with the blessing of God, get a Successor. Many fell into the snare, imagining the Queen, who had so great an affection for her Subjects, would comply with their desires, and resolve at length to marry, and they hoped, by that means, to see the Kingdom in perfect tranquillity. The Queen of Scotland was not mentioned, and yet it was the alone, the heads of the Plot had in view. They knew the Queen had resolved never to marry: Nay, it was believed, she could not do it without hazarding her life, and that her Physicians had told her the same (8). But feigning ignorance, they resolved she should be pressed to marry, that they might

(2) Camden says not a word of this poisoning. Rapin—Melvil's account is this, "The King followed the Queen about whithersoever she rode, but I got no good Countenance. So that finding himself slighted, he went to Glasgow, where he fell sick, it being alleged, that he had got poison from one of his Servants," p. 77.

(3) It was not the Bearer, but King Charles his Master that was honoured with the Order of the Garter. Rambouillet, in the King his Master's room, took his place amongst the Knights of St. George at Windsor, says Camden, p. 399.

(8) That the Queen's Physician assuaded her, it seems, from marrying, on pretence of some natural defect. Camden, p. 399. —Here it may not perhaps be disagreeable to the Reader, to peruse a Story related by Melvil. He was told at Newcastle, by an Englishman, one of the Gentlemen of Queen Elizabeth's Privy-Chamber, that King Henry VIII. had been so curious as to enquire of Diviners or Necromancers, what should become of his Son Edward, and of his two Daughters Mary and Elizabeth. He was answered, that Edward should die, having few days and no succession; and that his two Daughters should succeed one another. That Mary, his eldest Daughter, should marry a Spaniard, and that way bring many Strangers into England, which would occasion great strife and contention. That Elizabeth should reign after her, who should marry either a Scotchman, or a Frenchman. Whereupon the King could not give poison to both his Daughters, but because this had not the effect he desired, (for they finding themselves altered by vomiting vomits and purgings, and suspecting poison, had taken remedies,) he caused to proclaim them both Bastards. But the Women that attended on Queen Mary, alleged, that her Maids were consumed. For she was several times supposed to be with Child by King Philip of Spain, yet brought forth nothing but dead lumps of Flesh, which were to be revenged of her Father, the King caused, secretly in the night to take up her Father's bones, and burn them. Melvil, p. 28.

from her refusal, have a pretence to oblige her to name a Successor. This could be only the Queen of Scotland, there being no other Person that could dispute her Title. The Duchesse of Suffolk, and her two eldest Daughters were dead. The third was very deformed, and had married a Man of a very mean Condition: Nay, I do not know whether she was yet alive. As for the Children of Catherine Grey, the second of the three Sisters by the Earl of Hertford, Elizabeth had caused them to be declared Bastards by a legal Sentence. Consequently they could not pretend to the Throne. As for the Countess of Lenox's Title, Mary had taken care to unite it with her own, by her Marriage with the Lord Darnley. It was necessary therefore, either to call to the Succession some descendant from the Females of the House of York, to which the Queen and Parliament would not have willingly agreed, or to nominate Mary Stuart to fill the Throne after the Queen. The Combination was so strong in the Upper-House, that some of the Lords were of opinion, it was not sufficient to intreat the Queen, but that she ought to be obliged to marry, or in case of a refusal, a Successor be declared by Act of Parliament, even against the Queen's Will (1). At last, it was resolved to send the Lord-Keeper Bacon, to beseech her, in the name of the House, to chuse a Husband, and to lay the reasons before her (2).

Things were managed with still less temper in the Lower House. It was openly maintained, that since the Queen would not marry, she ought to be constrained to appoint a Successor: That by neglecting so necessary a Precaution, she shewed that her pretended affection for her People was all dissimulation, since she preferred her own interest to the Welfare of the Nation: That she could deny what was desired of her, only out of fear of her Successor, which fear could be entertained by none but timorous Princes or faint-hearted Women (3).

The Queen took some time to return an answer to the Lords, and seemed to be ignorant of, or overlooked, what passed in the House of Commons. She was however extremely mortified, that her enemies had credit enough to turn both Houses of Parliament against her, and to see those whom she had most favoured, prevailed with to act so directly contrary to her interest. As she knew, very many of her Subjects were not fully convinced of the justice of her Title to the Crown, she plainly perceived, to appoint the Queen of Scotland for her presumptive Heir, was really increasing and strengthening the Right of that dangerous Rival. Among the Sovereign Princes, she had no Ally, or true Friend. On the contrary, she could not doubt that the Pope, France, and Spain, would readily assist to deprive her of the Crown. Her whole dependence was upon the affection of her People, whose Representatives she beheld combined, as I may say, against her, to oblige her to take a step so opposite to her true interest. It is not easy to guess what she would have resolved, if the Lords had persisted in their demand, and been seconded by the Commons. Till she could more fully discover the intrigues which influenced the Parliament, she made use of an expedient which succeeded, delaying to take other measures, according as her Enemies should proceed. The expedient was, to divert thirty of each House to come to her. [These she diverted, by the most obliging expressions, mixed with a gentle reproof from their resolution, and promised them to manage things, not only with the care of a Prince, but the tenderness of a Parent. And whereas the House had offered greater Subsidies than usual (4), on condition she would declare a Successor, she refused those extraordinary Grants (5), and accepted a smaller Sum, saying, That Money in her Subjects Purse, was as good as in her own Exchequer (6).

The last day of the Session, she made the following Speech to both Houses, to let them know, or rather to disguise, her intentions, and evade their Request.

“MY Lords, and others the Commons of this Assembly, although the Lord-Keeper hath, according to order, very well answered in my name, yet as a periphrasis, I have a few words farther to speak unto you. Notwithstanding I have not been used, nor love to do it, in such open Assemblies; yet now (not to the end to amend his Talk) but remembering that commonly a Prince's own Words be better printed in the Hearers memory, than those spoken by her Command, I mean to say thus much unto you. I have in this Assembly found so much dissimulation, where I always professed plainness, that I marvel thereat, yea two faces under one hood, and the body rotten, being covered with two vizors, Succession and Liberty, which they determined must be either presently granted, denied or deferred; in granting whereof they had their desires, and denying and deferring thereof (those things being so laudable, as indeed to all men they are) they thought to work me that mischief which never foreign Enemy could bring to pass, which is the hatred of my Commons. But alas! they began to pierce the Vessel before the Wine was fined, and began a thing not foretelling the end; now by this means I have seen my Well-wishers from my Enemies, and can, as me seemeth, very well divide the House into four. First the Broachers and Workers thereof, who are in the greatest fault: Secondly, the Speakers, who by eloquent Tales persuaded others, are in the next degree: Thirdly, the Agreeers, who being so light of credit that the eloquence of the Tales so overcame them, that they gave more credit thereunto than to their own Wits: And lastly, those that sat still, mute, and meddled not therewith, but rather wondered, disallowing the matter; who, in my opinion, are most to be excused. But do you think, that either I am unmindful of your Surety by Succession wherein is all my care, considering I know myself to be mortal? No, I warrant you; Or that I went about to break your liberty? No, it was never my meaning, but to stay you before you fell into the ditch. For all things have their time; and although perhaps you may have after me one better learned, or wiser; yet I assure you, none more careful over you; and therefore henceforth, whether I live to see the like Assembly or no, or whoever it be, yet beware however you prove your Prince's Patience, as you have now done mine. And now to conclude, all this notwithstanding (not meaning to make a Lent of Christmases) the most part of you may assure themselves, that you depart in your Prince's Grace.

It is not easy to comprehend what the Queen would have intimated to the Parliament when she said, whether I live to see the like Assembly or no: For these are ambiguous Words, which may be taken in various Senses. Besides, they are put in where they have not much connexion with the preceding or following words. However this be, after this confused Speech, the Parliament was immediately dissolved. But this was only a palliative remedy, which was not capable of allaying the fermentation already raised among the People (7). If it gave the Queen time to take other measures, it afforded also her Enemies leisure more strongly to erect their Batteries. Very probably, this Affair would have been debated again in the next Parliament, if in the mean while the Queen of Scotland had not lost herself, by her ill-conduct, and visibly lessened her Party in England (8). This is what I am going to shew, after closing the year 1566 with a brief account of the Affairs of the Netherlands.

After Philip II. had quitted these Provinces in 1559, in order to reside in Spain, the discontent of the Nobles and People was grown to that height, that it was not possible the Affairs of that Country should remain any longer

Camden, p. 399.—Mist of the Lords and other great Men in England, were then well affected to the Queen of Scots, and kept a Correspondence with her, as may be seen in Mist, p. 46, &c.

(2) This Petition was presented to the Queen November 5. Dewes, p. 104, 105.

(3) These and other Points were first moved in the House by Mr. Molinex; and were insisted upon by Bill and Musfon, great Lawyers, with Dutton, Kingsmill, Wentworth, and others. Camden, p. 400. Dewes, p. 124, &c.

(4) There is mention in the Journals only of a Subsidy, and one Tenth, and Fifteenth. The Bill for it was first read in the House of Commons, October 28.

(5) The reason of this refusal seems to be, that the Declaration of a Successor, and the Subsidy Bill, were ordered by the House of Commons to proceed together: So that the one could not be rejected without the other. See Dewes, p. 124. She remitted only the third payment of the Subsidy, as before raised, granted by Parliament, to induce her to declare a Successor. See Dewes, p. 131.

(6) Rapin mistaking the thirty Members sent for by the Queen from each House for many Deputies from the Parliament, makes the Queen speak the following Speech to them, and not to both Houses, as she did at the end of the Session. Had he happened to see the original Speech, which is here inserted, instead of the Abridgement in Camden, he would have perceived his Error. What is inserted between the two Crochets, is supplied from Camden in order to rectify Rapin's mistake.

(7) The Queen about this time cast one Thornton, a Reader of Law in Lincoln's-Inn into the Tower, upon the Queen of Scots Complaint, that he had called her Title in question. Camden, p. 401.

(8) This last mentioned Parliament, which was dissolved on January 2, granted the Queen a Subsidy, and one Tenth, and a Fifteenth. The Clergy granted at the same time a Subsidy of four Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in three years.—The Acts made in this Session were these: 1. An Act declaring the making and consecrating of Bishops within this Realm, to be good, orderly, and lawful. 2. That no Man shall send any Rams, Sheep, or Lambs alive, out of the Realm, upon pain, for the first offence, of forfeiture of all his Goods, and one year's Imprisonment; and for the second, of being declared a Felon. 3. That Cut-purses and Pick-pockets shall not have benefit of Clergy. 4. Whereas there was but one Sheriff for Surrey and Sussex, one for Essex and Hertfordshire, one for Somerset and Dorset, one for Warwick and Leicester, one for Nottingham and Derby, and one for Oxford and Berkshire, it was ordered, that for the future (the year 1567 being the first) each of these Counties should have a Sheriff a-piece. See Statute.

1566. in their present situation. This universal dissatisfaction flowed from several causes; namely, I. The People's belief, that the King had formed a design to abolish their liberties and privileges, and establish an arbitrary power. II. The Erection of the Bishopricks, which greatly lessened the Jurisdiction and Revenues of the Abbays, in which many Families were concerned. III. The Inquisition which was intended to be set up in these Provinces, and which was little less abhorred by the Catholics than by the Protestants themselves. IV. The Prohibition to assemble the States. V. The King's project to extirpate the Heretics, who were now very numerous in the Country. VI. and lastly, The interest of the great Men, who plainly saw, how fatal to them the execution of the King's designs would be. They had in vain for several years besought their Governours to assemble the States, and prevent the Calamities with which they foresaw their Country was soon going to be afflicted. Their Request was constantly rejected. This Rigour had at length obliged the Prince of Orange, Count d'Esmond, Count Horn, and several other Lords to withdraw from the Council of State, and write to the King, that Cardinal de Granvelle had rendered himself so odious, that the worst was to be feared, if he continued any longer in the Low-Countries. Philip not thinking proper to recall the Cardinal directly, advised him however to withdraw. As soon as Granvelle was gone, the great Men went and resumed their places in the Council.

Mean while, the Inquisition being universally abhorred, the People began to stir, and shew their resolution to free themselves from that yoke. The great Men supported this resolution with two Motives. First, because they perceived the Inquisition must prove destructive of liberty. In the second place, because they were informed the King had taken terrible resolutions against them, on account of what had passed about Cardinal de Granvelle. Whereupon they form'd a Confederacy against the Inquisition, and Lewis Count of Nassau, Brother to the Prince of Orange, with four hundred Attendants presented a Petition to the Governours. On this occasion it was that the Protestants received the name of Gueux or Beggars. The Governours not having power to grant their request, the Protestants, of their own accord, took the liberty to preach publicly, and the Governours were forced to suffer it, and at length to allow it expressly. From that time, Philip considered the People of the Low-Countries as Rebels, and they for the most part looked upon him but as an unjust and cruel Sovereign, who aspired to be absolute Master of their Estates, their Bodies and their Souls. I shall enter no farther into these Affairs. It suffices to have briefly shewn the Spring of the troubles of the Netherlands, which I shall have occasion to speak of sometimes in the Sequel. I return to the Affairs of Scotland, which more nearly relate to England (1).

1567. I am now going to give an account of an Event which has been rendered obscure, as well by religious prejudices, as for the sake of the Prince of Scotland, whose birth I lately mentioned. This Prince, coming to the Crown of England after Queen Elizabeth's death, thought it his duty to try to vindicate the Queen his Mother from the horrible crime she was accused of during her life, I mean of murdering the King her Husband. In all likelihood, he made use of Camden's Pen for that purpose.

It is agreed, that Henry Stewart King of Scotland, Husband of Queen Mary, was assassinated the beginning of the year 1567. It cannot be denied, that this murder was committed by the Earl of Bothwell, or his order; that the Earl was then in great credit with the Queen, and that she married him a few months after the tragical death of the King her Spouse. This, added to her aversion for the King, forms a strong prejudice against her. On the other hand, almost all the Roman Catholic Writers who mention this Murder, make it their business to justify the Queen, and throw it on the Earl of Murray. They seem to have taken this course with the more reason, as Camden a Protestant Author in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth, has openly undertaken Mary's defence, and represented the Earl of Murray as the Author, not only of the crime, but even of all the troubles which happened in Scotland, after the Marriage of Queen Mary with Francis II.

It will be asked perhaps, where is the necessity of clearing this Fact in a History of England? I answer, There is an absolute necessity, because otherwise Queen Elizabeth's conduct will be either inconceivable or misunderstood. The History therefore, as well as truth, requires a distinct Knowledge of the foundation of Queen Elizabeth's Politics, and of the real cause of the events which will be related hereafter. This fact is as the hinge on which all the affairs of England and Scotland turn for several years. They who, under colour of clearing it, have laboured to darken it as much as they could, were very sensible, how contrary the truth was to the Idea they desired to give of the affairs of this reign. So, to set it in a true light, it will be absolutely necessary to follow a quite different course.

To succeed in what I propose, I must largely treat of the affairs of Scotland. Some grave Authors of an established reputation have endeavour'd to disguise the facts they have related, by curtailing, and altering them, by suppressing material truths, and supposing things which have not even the least probability. To oppose to them a bare narration, containing only the naked truth, would not be the way to satisfy the Reader, who would be still at a loss to know whom he ought most to credit. It is necessary therefore to prove what I advance, and in matter of fact, there are no better proofs than the mutual connexion of these same facts, and the testimonies of unspotted persons. But it is almost impossible to shew where the truth has been altered, without running into some reasonings which indeed do not always lute with History, but which, on this occasion, seem to me unavoidable.

Three Historians who may be considered as originals, have related what passed in Scotland during the reign of Elizabeth, namely, George Buchanan, William Camden, and James Melvil. Some remarks on these three Authors will help to give the reader a true notion.

Buchanan, a Scotchman and Protestant, was a man of great learning, and much esteemed by all the learned in Europe. If he had not penned the History of Scotland, he would perhaps have been neither envied nor hated. But as, in the recital of the frequent quarrels between England and Scotland, he does not always agree with the English Historians, a prejudice is formed against him in England, as if he endeavour'd to falsify whatever might be to the advantage of the English. This difference would have been little regarded by other nations; if what Buchanan says of Queen Mary Stewart had not stirred up all the Roman Catholics in Europe against him. His aim was to shew, that Queen Mary was the sole cause of the troubles of Scotland, and particularly, the Author of the King her Husband's death; and his History is full of circumstantial facts, which have a visible connexion, and tend all to the end he proposed. He does not cite testimonies to confirm what he says, because he writ at the very time the things were transacted, or shortly after. On the other hand, he was Murray's creature, and deem'd revengeful. It is chiefly upon these prejudices that his History has been discredit'd, without however any express endeavours to confute him in any material assertion.

Camden, an English Author and Protestant, wrote the Annals of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, in the time of James I, Son of Queen Mary. He was eminent for his knowledge in the Antiquities of England, and, if I mistake not, he was (Clarenceux) King at Arms. The History of England is indebted to him for several good works, which have greatly served to illustrate it. But it manifestly appears, that in writing the Annals of Elizabeth, his only aim was to vindicate the Queen of Scots, under colour that the History of Elizabeth cannot be compiled, without a particular account of the affairs of Scotland. He speaks extremely well of Elizabeth when Mary is not concerned. But in the places where the two Queens must be necessarily put in opposition, he does it so artfully, that Elizabeth is shewn to be in the wrong. It is not the same, where he can praise or excuse Mary, without wounding Elizabeth; for then he makes no scruple to represent the former as a pattern of Virtue. He entirely passes over in silence whatever may injure her reputation, or contents himself with consulting what she is accused of, by a bare and directly opposite Narration, without alleging the least Proof. So, when a Man reads the Histories of Camden and Buchanan, he would think these two Writers are speaking of two different Queens, who reigned at the same time in Scotland. Buchanan's design was to blacken Mary's reputation; and Camden's, to vindicate or praise her. Wherefore, Camden, who wrote last, has taken care to warn his Readers, that no credit is to be given to Buchanan, because he was the Earl of Murray's creature, a mercenary Writer, and his Works were condemned by the States of Scotland: Nay, he pretends, that before his death he repented of his malice (2); but, according to custom supports what he advances with no proof, neither does he take up Buchanan in any remarkable circumstance, only, as I said, by giving a contrary account. Having thus removed the Testimony of the Scotch Historian, he adds,

The Necessity
this Fact.

(1) This year, on the 24th day of June, the Foundation of the Royal Exchange in London was laid by Sir Thomas Greaves, Kt. H. Russell p. 1000.
Camden's Words upon that point are very inconsistent. He says, "that Buchanan often blam'd Mary, and that he himself employed his Pen in two violent strains against Queen Mary; and with'd on her Death-bed, that he might live free from the charge of having blacken'd her." But he does not say, if he had often blam'd himself for this Fact, he had time enough to recall the Truth of it, which he cannot be supposed to have done. See Camden's ad Vol. III. p. 382.

1567. For his part, he professes, to the end both Sides may be heard, to relate the affair (the King's murder) without any mixture of Love or Hate, as far as he can come to the knowledge of it, from Writings, published at the very time, but soon suppressed in favour to the Earl of Murray, and in hatred to the Queen, or from Letters of Ambassadors, and of other Persons worthy of credit. It must be observed, that he cites in his Annals no passage from these suppressed Books, gives neither the Titles nor Authors, neither does he name the Ambassadors, and Persons of credit, on whose Testimony he builds his account. He alleges but one single Paper, which I shall speak of in its place, and which carries all possible marks of Forgery. Thus, after a caution not to believe Buchanan, who writ of what passed in his own time, and before his own eyes, he will have us believe him who did not write till above forty years after the event, upon his bare word, and upon the Testimony of Persons and Books unknown to him.

After this Preamble, he enters upon the thing, and, in order to relate the King's death, begins with a Character of the Earl of Murray, and represents him as a Man of a boundless ambition, and aspiring to the Crown. It has been seen, that this was the accusation brought against him before Henry II, by the Queen-Dowager and the Cardinal of Lorraine, and of which Melvil has fully cleared him. Camden adds, that, with this view, Murray did all he could to hinder the Queen's Marriage, and not succeeding, took arms against her, and was at length forced to fly into England: That, during her absence, by his Letters and Friends, he sowed discord between the King and Queen, and, to hinder his Condemnation, the Earl of Morton, his Friend, persuaded the King to cause Rizzio, Secretary for the French Dispatches, to be assassinated: That the King coming to a sense of the heinousness of this Crime, conceived such an aversion to Murray, that he resolved to make him away; but that Murray having notice of it, was immediately reconciled to Bothwell, and determined with him to kill the King, with design to cast the deed on the Queen, ruin her in the affection of her Subjects, and withal, destroy the Earl of Bothwell, in order to seize the Government.

This is the substance of the Story forged by Camden to justify the Queen, and cast the murder of the King upon the Earl of Murray. I call it a forged Story, because, indeed, it is impossible to reconcile it with the History of Scotland, the principal circumstances whereof this Author has been pleased to omit. For instance, he says nothing of the favour Rizzio was in with the Queen, or of his great credit at Court, neither does he mention that Princess's animosity with Bothwell, and yet in his very Narrative, these two Facts must be necessarily supposed. For how can it be conceived, that, to save the Honour and Estates of the Earl of Murray, there was a necessity of making away a Secretary for the French Dispatches, if this Secretary had not been in great credit with the Queen? Again, why must Murray destroy Bothwell, in order to usurp the Government, if Bothwell had not been in possession of it? It is very visible, that otherwise Camden's account has neither coherence nor foundation. In short, this Author was not ignorant, that the Queen of Scots had been publicly accused of the King her Husband's death; that all Scotland and all England were full of it, and that it passed for a certain Fact in both Kingdoms. Can therefore Facts publicly known, if I may so say, be overthrown forty years after, by a bare contrary account, without the least proof of what is advanced? But to confirm what I have been saying with regard to Camden, I need only observe, that Melvil's Memoirs, penned before Camden's Annals, but which appeared not till long after, are entirely opposite to what that Author has said, and perfectly agree with Buchanan's History, a few circumstances excepted.

Melvil is the third Author I am to speak of. He was a person of distinction, who was employed in several embassies, and concerned in what passed at the Court of Scotland. Nay, it appears in his Memoirs, that he was very much in the Queen's favour, since he chose him to advise her about her behavior, and tell her of her faults. A Sovereign can hardly give a Subject greater marks of esteem. If Buchanan has not mentioned him in his History, it was probably, because he loved him not. Melvil on his part has drawn in his Memoirs a character of Buchanan, which tho' it does justice to his sense and great knowledge, gives no very advantageous idea of the qualities of his mind. This suffices to show he has not copied that Historian, and that they did not correspond. He has writ what passed before his eyes, from the year 1563, when he returned to his own Country, to the year 1594. Consequently he cannot be said, to be ill-informed. He may be still less suspected by the Queen's Friends, since it is plain in his Memoirs, that he was always attached to the interest of that Princess. Accordingly he speaks of her every where with great caution, contenting himself with briefly intimating some things, which Buchanan has not scrupled to insist upon more largely. He has not thought fit however to conceal the principal fact, because these same facts serve for foundation to his Memoirs, which otherwise would have no connexion. He has not writ either to justify, or accuse the Queen, but purely for the instruction of his Son in what passed in his own time. If we compare his Memoirs with Buchanan's History, and Camden's Annals, we shall soon be convinced, it is impossible to reconcile them with what Camden says, but that on the contrary they agree in the principal facts related by Buchanan. All the difference is, Melvil has cleared many things which Buchanan did not well know. And on the other hand, Buchanan, has enlarged much more upon every thing that can reflect on the Queen, whereas Melvil very slightly touches upon such passages. By that he shows he speaks of them with regret, and so far only as to carry on the thread of his Memoirs.

After these remarks upon three Historians, of whom two were contemporaries, eye-witnesses of what they relate, and agree together to the main, without having writ by concert, and without one at least being liable to be suspected of disguising the truth, and of whom the third writ forty years after, and is directly contrary to the two others, without supporting his story with any testimony, or known Author, I think I cannot be blamed if I take the two first for Guides, preferably to the last (2).

Whilst the King was taking remedies to expel the poison, the Queen remov'd the young Prince her Son from Sterling, and ordered him to be carried to Edinburgh, tho' it was in the midst of Winter (3). Shortly after he heard the King had resolv'd to withdraw into France or Spain, and that there was an English Ship ready to receive him, as soon as he could bear the fatigue of the voyage. This precaution making her apprehensive he would get away, and to break all her measures with Bothwell, she express'd an intention to be reconciled to him. To that purpose, she sent several tender and affectionate letters to convince him of her sincerity. At last, she went to see him at Glasgow (4), and to artfully manage him, that he prevailed with him to return to Edinburgh in a Litter. Melvil does not mention the Queen's Journey to Glasgow, but necessarily supposes a reconciliation, since he speaks of the King's voluntary return to Edinburgh (5). As soon as he came there, he was lodged in a lonesome house (6) near the Walls of the City, on pretence he would be disturbed by the noise in the Palace. For some days the Queen made him frequent visits, and even caused her own bed to be brought into a room underneath the King's. In a word, she omitted nothing to perfwade him, she did not bear him the least ill Will. At that time, the Earl of Murray, upon news that his Wife was like to die of a miscarriage, desired leave to go and see her, and went away accordingly, notwithstanding the Queen's instances to the contrary. This circumstance makes equally for Buchanan and Camden. Buchanan infers from it, that the Earl of Murray had no hand in the King's murder, who was killed the night following, since he absented himself the day before the deed (7). Camden draws a quite contrary inference, saying the motive of his going away was to hinder his being suspected. Buchanan and Melvil affirm, many knew there was a design to kill the King, but no man durst warn him of it, because he told all again to the Queen, or some of his Servants, who betrayed him. However, the Earl of Orkney half-brother to the Earl of Murray, gave him notice of it, which he telling again to the Queen, she sent for the Earl of Orkney to examine him; but he denied in her presence, he had ever said any such thing (1).

(1) Many believe Camden to it nothing in his Annals about Scotland, but what was dictated to him, or enjoined by James I. We must therefore understand by Camden, the real Author of the Annals, whoever he be. Rapin.—Others say, that Camden's lines were dictated by King James, and called rather to vindicate the Honour and Integrity of his Mother, than to do right for a Mistress, that had from a School-mistress, raised him to a Kingdom, being the first King at Arms. Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, §. 16.—It is something remarkable, that the Records of the Criminal Court, or Justiciary Court in Scotland, commonly called, The Acts of Admiralty, are missing during the Government of Queen Mary, and also of her Son King James, all after the Year six hundred and six, the Earl of Morton in 1581. In which records was the Earl of Bothwell's Trial, and the Trials of some others of the Regie's of King Henry Darnley. (2) In short, it may be said of these three Historians, in regard to Queen Mary, that Camden has scarce done more than tell the Truth, that Buchanan has said all the Truth, and more than the Truth, and that Melvil has said the Truth, but not the whole Truth.

At length, the time appointed for the deed being come, the Queen left the King to go and put to bed one of her women (2) who had been married that day. I omit numberless circumstances whereby Buchanan insinuates the Queen was in the plot. Indeed, those circumstances would be so many proofs, if they were confirmed by an unsuspected Author. But as Melvil says nothing of them, I chuse to pass them over in silence. Be it as it will, the King was strangled that night (3), with one of his Servants who lay in his room. As soon as he was dead, his body was carried into a garden belonging to a neighbouring house, where his slippers were also brought.

Buchanan.

Then fire was set to some barrels of powder placed in the room where the Queen's bed was, and the house was blown up. The People who came running in at the noise, were told at first, that the violence of the Gun-powder had thrown the King into the garden. But as his slippers were found by him, as his shirt was not find'd by the fire, and as some black and blue marks were seen round his neck, the People were not so credulous. The same night it was rumoured about the City, that the Earls of Morton and Murray had caused the King to be assassinated, and this report spread immediately as far as the borders of England. Camden infers from hence, that the Earl of Murray must have been concerned in the murder, since he was presently accused by the voice of the Publick.

But this voice of the Publick confuted doubts of some People who were suborned to spread the report. Melvil affirms on the contrary, it was whispered at Court that Bothwell had caused the King to be murdered, and that he was strangled with a napkin. He adds, *I came to the door of the Queen's Chamber the next morning after the murder, and the Earl of Bothwell said, that her Majesty was peaceful and quiet, which occasioned him to come forth. He said, the strange accident had fallen out which ever was lead of, for thunder had come out of the sky, and had burnt the King's house, and himself was found dead lying a little distance from the house under a tree. He desired me to go up and see him, how that there was not a hair nor a mark on all his body. But when I went up to see him, he had been taken into a chamber, and kept by one Alexander Dutham, but I could not get a sight of him. Buchanan adds, the Queen ordered the body to be brought to her on the wrong side of a bench, and after viewing it some time without any signs of joy or grief, commanded it to be interred near Rizzio, in the Sepulchre of the Kings (4). It is strange that Camden, who attempts to strip Buchanan of all credit, should not undertake withal to confute any of the circumstances related by that Historian, though they are many in number, and very dishonorable to the Queen.*

The Earl of Murray, though sick, and notwithstanding the rumour about him, came to Court two days after, and appeared without fear. This shows he was in no dread of the accusations of his Enemies; and indeed he was never questioned for the Fact (5). The Queen keeping her Chamber but a few days, resumed her usual way of life, having always the Earl of Bothwell with her.

Mean while, the People murmured exceedingly that there was no Inquiry concerning the King's death, of which they openly accused the Earl of Bothwell. These Murmurs were so publick, that Bothwell could not help taking some step to show he was willing to clear himself. He went therefore in company with some friends, to the Earl of Argyle, chief Justice of the Kingdom, and requested him to make Inquisition concerning the Murder of the King. Upon his request, a Proceeding was begun, and the depositions of several Persons were taken; but all was suppressed on a sudden. The Court was contented with offering a reward to any Person that should discover the Authors of the King's death. But as all believed the Queen and Bothwell guilty, no one was so bold as to accuse them. It would have been very dangerous to take such a step (6). However, Libells and Ballads were published, wherein Bothwell was libel accused. Whereupon he cauk it to be fixed up in several Places, that he would fight any Person that should dare to maintain this. He was answered by another Paper, posted up without a name, that his challenge was accepted, provided he would appoint a neutral place for the Duel; but this came to nothing.

The Queen perceiving at length, that the Murmurs and Complaints of the People might be attended with ill consequences, was desirous of having the Castle of Edinburgh in her hands, the custody whereof was committed to the Earl of Murray by the States. The Earl was unwilling to comply with the Queen's desire. But at length, imagining a Civil War was at hand, he offered to deliver the Castle, provided he was suffered to carry the young Prince to Sterling, of which he was Governor also. He thought it more advantageous to be master of the Prince's Person, than of the Castle of Edinburgh, and the Queen agreed to the exchange.

Hitherto People were contented with liberally publishing their suspicions of Bothwell, without any adversary appearing against him. But at last, the Earl of Lenox finding the Queen very flow to punish the crime lately committed, solicited her by Letters for Justice upon Bothwell, charging him with being the Author of the King his Son's murder. This Letter threw the Queen into great perplexity. She could not deny a Father the satisfaction he demanded, especially in a case concerning the death of a King who had been her Husband. I shall not relate here all her artifices to evade this prosecution, and to get Bothwell acquitted, because Buchanan, who has given the particulars, may be suspected. I shall content my self with transcribing what Melvil says upon this subject.

Every body suspected the Earl of Bothwell, and those who durst speak freely to others, said plainly that it was He. Whereupon he drew together a number of Lords of his Dependents to be an Assize, which cleared and acquitted him; Some for fear, some for favour, and the greatest part in expectation of a reward. Thus a long and wicked reign ended in a great and glorious Fall at Court.

This Testimony of a Man who cannot be suspected of flandering her is very strong against the Queen. She not only could not part with a Man patently accused of the Murder of the King her Husband, but even made him her prime Minister and Favorite. Though she had believed him innocent, it was renouncing the Laws of decency, which a Woman seldom does, unless carried away by the violence of passion. But these are trifles in comparison of what she did afterwards (7).

The report of the Queen's intending to marry the Earl of Bothwell, flying from the Court over all the Kingdom, the Lord Harris came to Edinburgh. He took to seasonable time, that he accosted the Queen in Bothwell's absence, and casting himself at her feet, freely told her, it would be an everlasting dishonour to her, if she married her Husband's Murderer. The Queen feigning a surprise, answered, she did not know from whence he had this intelligence, and very coldly added, that hitherto her heart had dictated nothing to her in favour of Bothwell. A few days after, Melvil received a Letter from England about the same time, but expressed in much stronger Terms than the Lord Harris's remonstrance, which he showed to the Queen, who said it was a device of his own. Melvil assured her the Letter came from the Person whose name was subscribed, and contained nothing but what he himself had designed to represent to her as he was in duty bound. Thus the Queen, in relolving to marry Bothwell, sinned not out of ignorance, since she was fully informed of the People's opinion concerning the Author of the King's death.

A few days after, she went to Sterling to see the Prince her Son. If Buchanan is to be credited, her intent was, on some pretence to get him out of the hands of the Earl of Murray, who plainly refused to deliver him. In her return to Edinburgh, she was met by the Earl of Bothwell, with a Company of armed Men (8), who carried her away, and conducted her to Dunbar. Melvil, who was present, and was himself arrested, says Bothwell only took her Majesty's Horse by the bridle, and adds not a word which may insinuate that the Queen feared surprized at this violence, or that she offered to make the least resistance (9).

1567. He says on the contrary, that Captain Blachater who seized him, assured him all was done with the Queen's own Consent.

When Bathwell came to Dunbar, he procured a Divorce from his Wife, Daughter of the Earl of Huntley, whom he had married but six months before. This divorce was decreed by two Sentences, one in the Ecclesiastical, and the other in the Civil Court, and both at the suit of the Countess of Bathwell. In the first trial, before the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, Bathwell was accused of a criminal commerce with a Kinswoman of his Wife, and upon his Confession, the Archbishop pronounced the sentence of divorce (1). In the second, his Wife accused him of adultery, and as he did not deny it, the marriage was annulled. He was forced to make use of these two means, by reason of the different rules the two Courts observe, with regard to the causes for annulling a marriage. The process was commenced and ended in less than ten days. In all appearance, the Earl of Huntley, Bathwell's great friend, perjured his Daughter himself to sue for a divorce. This is Buchanan's account, but Melvil says, he cannot tell how nor by what Law he parted with his Wife, because having been released, he had left Dunbar. Hence it is plain at least, he had not read Buchanan's History, when he writ his Memoirs, nor did copy that Historian, though they agree in the principal facts.

Bathwell being thus parted from his Wife, carried the Queen to Edinburgh, and the next day appeared in the Courts of justice, and declared she was entirely free. This was done to prevent an objection, which might be taken from her captivity, to null the marriage he intended to contract with Bathwell. This Marriage was so odious in all its circumstances, that it was very difficult to find any pretence to lessen the horror of it. The only method, the Queen and Bathwell could find, was to make the Lords of the Court Complices of the same crime. To that end, Bathwell having invited them to dinner, presented to them, and caused them to subscribe, a Paper, the purport whereof was, That they judged it was much the Queen's interest to marry Bathwell, he having many Friends in Lothian and upon the Borders, which would cause good order to be kept. And then the Queen could not but marry him, seeing he had run away and lain with her against her Will. One of Camden's artifices, among many others, is to speak of this paper or approbation of the great Men, in a very loose manner, and alter it entirely, under colour of relating the substance. Moreover he speaks of it before he relates the Queen's Rape, that this Rape might be considered as a consequence of the approbation of the great Men, whereas it was just the contrary, as may be seen by the very Writing in Melvil (2). However the Marriage was solemnized (3) after the manner of the Protestants, by the Bishop of Orkney, who was very ready to do so odious an office.

Whatever suspicion the Queen had given of herself, by her neglect to punish the Authors of the King's Murder, there were some, however, who fill doubted whether she was guilty. But when they saw her publicly espouse the Earl of Bathwell, hardly was there a Man who durst undertake her defence (4). It was easy for her to perceive the change in the hearts of her Subjects, so visible was their discontent. For this reason, she resolved to strengthen herself with the assistance of the great Men, by forming a League with them, for the defence of herself and new Spouse. All those that depended on Bathwell readily signed the League; but herein lay not all the difficulty. There was another very considerable Party which was to be gained, otherwise the League of the Court would be of little Power. To that end, the Queen and Bathwell thought it necessary to begin with the Earl of Murray, that he might influence all the rest. The Confederacy therefore was brought him to sign. But he answered, that to oblige him to serve the Queen, it was needless to make him sign the Paper; and for the Earl of Bathwell, since the Queen had desired he would be reconciled to him, he should punctually observe whatever he had promised. However, fearing, after this refusal, to be exposed to the resentment of the Court, he desired leave to withdraw to St. Andrew's, but perceiving the Queen made some scruple, prayed her to permit him to pass some time in France; to which she readily consented, and he departed within a few days (5). Camden has taken care not to mention the reason of Murray's retiring into France: That very ill agrees with his Scheme. For, had that Lord associated with Bathwell to kill the King, why should he quit the Court, at a time when, instead of having any thing to fear, he might have expected every thing, from the great credit of his pretended Friend?

Mean while, all Scotland loudly complained that no vengeance was taken for the King's death, and that seeing the Queen married to the Man, who was universally considered as the murderer. The King of France even writ to Du Crocq his Ambassador, to signify his astonishment at it, and his Letter was shown to several Lords. In short, the Earls of Argyle, Morton, Marr, Arbuthnot, Glencarn, and the Baron of Boyd, meeting at Sterling, signed a Confederacy, the intent whereof, was to bring the murderers of the King to condign Punishment, and to cause the Queen's late Marriage to be dissolved (6). They hoped to effect this the more easily, as they had room to believe, the Queen herself would not be sorry to be compelled, considering the unworthy treatment she had now received from her new Spouse. Melvil says, he heard her one day call for a Knife to stab herself, not being able to bear his brutish usage.

As the Confederates did not question, that the People of Edinburgh would countenance their undertaking, they had projected to invest the City, that the Queen and Bathwell, who were there without Troops, might not escape. But Bathwell, having notice of their design, retired with the Queen to Borthwick. They were pursued by the Confederates; but it was in vain, the Queen and Bathwell being now gone to Dunbar. Having missed their aim, the Confederates marched to Edinburgh, where the Gates were opened to them, notwithstanding the endeavours of the Earl of Huntley, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, and the Bishop of Refs to the contrary, who were even forced to withdraw into the Castle, from whence Sir James Balfour, whom the Queen had made Governor, afforded them means to escape elsewhere. He gave also the Confederates to understand, he would not give up the Castle, but intended to stand neuter.

Mean time, the Queen and Bathwell drew together some forces at Dunbar, with all possible diligence. But the Confederates were extremely embarrassed. They had no Money: Balfour refused to give them any Artillery or Ammunition; and by reason of the ill success of the enterprise of Borthwick, part of their Troops had deserted them. So, after several consultations, they had almost resolved to give over their Projects, and return to their homes. The Queen and Bathwell being informed of their condition, marched immediately towards Edinburgh, in hopes of surprising them before they came to any resolution. This news being brought to the Confederates in the night, instead of flying, they resolved to meet the Queen, and decide the affair by a Battle. This resolution stopped their Enemies, who finding things take a quite different turn from what they expected, suffered them to pass the Est without opposition, after which the two Armies stood very near each other. Then it was, the Queen perceived her Troops did not serve her heartily, and that but few of her Officers and Soldiers were willing to fight in her quarrel. The knowledge of this inspiring her with great fear, she desired to speak with William Kircaldie Laird of Grange, one of the Heads of the Confederates, who commanded a small Body, more advanced than the rest of the Army. Kircaldie waiting on her, told her plainly, there was no hopes of agreement, unless she would put away Bathwell, who was reckoned the late King's murderer, and moreover, was married to another Woman; but on that condition, the Confederates would honour and obey her as they ought. The Queen asking him, whether she could rely upon his word, he returned to the Confederates, and brought a full power to treat with the Queen upon that same condition. Whereupon Bathwell seeing no remedy, chose to retire to Dunbar, and the Queen put herself into the hands of Kircaldie, who conducted her to the Confederate Army. The Heads received her with more respect than he expected; but it was with great difficulty the Soldiers were restrained, who cried out against her very irreverently. She was conducted [that night] to Edinburgh, and lodged in the Provost's House, where a Guard was set on her, so that she was really a Prisoner. It is likely, the Heads were not yet fully determined what to do with her; but she afforded them herself an occasion to be resolved. The very night she came to Edinburgh, she bribed one of her Guard, and gave him a Letter for Bathwell, full of tender and affectionate expressions, calling

Hunt, and promising never to forsake her, falling into the hands of the confederates, they relative to be more watchful over a pretence to shut her up in the Castle of the custody of the Earl of Murray's

The Queen complained bitterly of this usage, and wrote to Kircaldie, reproaching him, that what had been promised her was not performed. Kircaldie answered, he had already upbraided the Lords for the same; but they had showed him a Letter under her own hand, which had stopped his mouth. He ended his Letter with saying, he could do nothing for her, but advise her to think no more of a Man who married to another, and accused of killing her Husband. The Queen, as she read the Letter, shed a flood of tears.

But a thing which happened a few days after, was still more prejudicial to her. Bathwell coming to Dunbar, sent a Man to Balfour, Governor of Edinburgh Castle, for a Casket which he had trusted with him. It was a Silver Casket presented to the Queen by Francis II., which she had given to Bathwell. Balfour delivered it to the Messengers, who gave it to Buchanan, gave notice of it to the confederate Lords, who took it from the Bearer. However this be, it fell into their hands. They opened it, and found a great many Love Verses and Letters, and among the rest, some that contained the whole Plot against the late King, and the manner it was to be executed (1). Buchanan says, there were also three Contracts of Marriage between the Queen and Bathwell, one of which was written in the Queen's hand before the King's death. Another was written in the Earl of Huntly's hand, in the interval between the King's death, and the Queen's third Marriage (2); and the last was a Contract in form, made at the time of the Nuptials. Probably, the two first were only draughts, supposing Buchanan speaks the truth; for Melvil says nothing of the Casket or Contracts. Camden says, however, on another occasion, that certain Verses and Love-Letters were produced against the Queen; but mentions not the Casket spoken of by Buchanan.

The Queen's Captivity, and the seizing of her Papers, having made Bathwell sensible it would not be proper for him to be in Scotland, he retired to the Isles of Orkney (3), where he turned Pirate for some time, either for his subsistence, or to be revenged of the Scots.

Mean while, the Chiefs of the Confederates conferring together upon their affairs, considered, that if they should put the Queen again in possession of the Government, they could not rely on her Promises, or be secure against her (4). They concluded, therefore, that it was absolutely necessary to deprive her of the Administration, and to that end, sent the Earl of Lindsay (5), to persuade her to resign the Crown to the Prince her Son. Camden says, to oblige her to this, she was threatened to be brought to a public Trial for the murder of the King her Husband, for Incontinency, and for breach of Promise on the account of Religion. And Melvil affirms, the Earl of Lindsay had orders to threaten her if he thought it necessary. The Queen was strangely surprized at this Proposition: but rightly judging, it was not in her power to deny what was demanded, and that an obstinate refusal might draw upon her worse troubles, she gave her consent. She did it the more readily, as she was privately told by some of the Confederates, and Throckmorton the English Ambassador, that whatever she signed in Prison would not be of any force, but might be revoked when she should be at liberty. The confederate Lords willingly agreed, she herself should nominate one or more Regents, to govern the Kingdom during the Prince's minority. She appointed the Earl of Murray, either of her own choice (6), or because it was hinted to her, that he was desired for Regent; and, in case he refused the Office, she substituted the Duke of Chateaufort, the Earl of Argyll, and some other Lords (7). Then, she was made to sign all the Acts necessary for the resignation of the Crown; and notice being sent to the Earl of Murray, who was in France, the preparations were made for the Inauguration of the new King, who was but a year old. The Queen's resignation was signed the 24th of June, and the young King was inaugurated the 29th of the same month, by the Bishop of Orkney.

Shortly after, some Lords (8), who were not of the Confederacy, met at Hamilton Castle, to consult what was to be done at this juncture. The Confederates having notice thereof, sent James Melvil, Author of the Memoirs, to know the reason of their being assembled. They replied, they could not but think it strange, that the King should be crowned, without their being called to the Ceremony, since they had no less zeal than the rest of the Lords, for the good of their Country, and they believed to have cause to fear there were ill designs against them, since such important resolutions had been taken without consulting them; that therefore they were met, not with intent to offend any Person, but only to provide for their own safety. Melvil says, the wisest of the Confederates were for admitting these Lords to their consultations, but the others resolved to exclude them, and that this advice prevailed, to the great detriment of the Kingdom. Indeed, from this small number of Lords assembled at Hamilton, rose a Party, which declared at length for the Queen, and served long to foment the troubles of the Kingdom.

The Chiefs of the Confederates had not all the same views. Some acted only out of private interest, and made use of the present juncture to ruin their enemies. Others, in signing the Confederacy, intended, to remove the scandal which the Queen's Marriage had given, to get rid of Bathwell, to put the Queen again in possession of the Government, and, perhaps, to limit her Authority by means of the States. These last knowing the Earl of Murray was returning to Scotland (9), sent James Melvil to inform him of the situation of affairs, and to exhort him to behave with great moderation, and above all things, to avoid an entire rupture with the Queen. They represented to him, that his interest required it, because he would be much more master of his own Party, so long as he left the Queen some hopes, than if he reduced her affairs to such a state, that her enemies would have nothing more to fear from her. Murray perceived, that indeed such a conduct would be advantageous to him, and promised to follow their advice. But he was no sooner arrived, than he suffered himself to be swayd by the violent Men of his Party, who persuaded him to put affairs beyond the power of being ever restored. This is the representation Melvil gives of the Earl of Murray's Conduct. A few days after his arrival, he waited on the Queen, and instead of comforting her, as he had done formerly, when she was under Confinement at Edinburgh, he loaded her with reproaches. This had like to break her heart; for till then, she was in hopes the Earl of Murray would labour to restore her.

Mean while, the Confederates praying him to accept of the Regency, he seemed inclined to refuse it, and desired a few days to consider of it: but this was all grimace, and at length, he accepted it (10). Before the States, which had been convened in his absence, met, he wrote to the Hamiltonians, (for so were called the Lords assembled at Hamilton) to desire them to come and join with the rest of the States, in what should be deemed necessary for the good of the Kingdom: but they refused to come. An Agreement was talked of some time, but there occurred insuperable difficulties. Buchanan casts the whole blame upon the Hamiltonians; and Melvil, on the contrary, upon the violent Party of the Confederates, with whom the Regent was joined. All that can be conjectured, is, that those who had procured the Assembly at Hamilton, intended to serve the Queen, and wanted only a pretence to declare, which the Earl of Murray furnished them with, perhaps, very imprudently. However this be, Murray not thinking fit to deier the Convention of the States, in expectation of an agreement with the Hamiltonians, which to him still seemed more remote, the Regency was confirmed by a Decree, subscribed by above two hundred Lords and Gentlemen of the greatest distinction, as well Catholics as Protestants.

The new Regent's first care was to remove Balfour, who had rendered himself suspected, from the Government of Edinburgh Castle, and to confer it on the Laird of Grange. Mean while, the Hamiltonians, at the head of 1567. whom was the Earl of Argyle, loudly complained of their being neglected, and refused to acknowledge the Earl of Murray for Regent. It was easy to perceive, their aim, on that pretence, was to form a Party for the Queen. And indeed, some time after they met at Dunbarton, and signed an association, the intent whereof was to release the Queen, and replace her on the throne. Twelve Lords (1), of whom the Earl of Argyle and the Bishop of St. Andrew's were the first, subscribed the bond of association. But the Earl of Argyle deserted this Party presently after, and came to the Parliament. This Lord, who frequently chang'd sides, did not remain long with the Party he had espoused. As for the Duke of Chateaufort he was then in France, about his own private concerns. This association was not at first very formidable to the Regent; but it became so afterwards, because all the Male Contents of the King's party join'd it by degrees, it not being easy for the Regent to please all.

During the rest of the year, the Regent took into his hands all the strong places of the Kingdom, and bestowed the offices and governments as he judged necessary for the preservation of the publick peace. He took care, above all things to cause justice to be administred punctually and impartially. Melvil blames him only for one thing; namely his not being so diligent as he might have been, in gaining the Hamiltonians. But it must be considered, Melvil himself manifestly leaned to that Party. The Queen valued and loved him, and consequently it was natural to wish her restoration. He plainly shows in his Memoirs, that he heartily desired the might be replaced on the Throne, which made him blame those who opposed it.

The knowledge of the affairs of Scotland, is so absolutely necessary for understanding the motives of Queen Elizabeth's Conduct and Politicks, that is is not to be thought strange, that I have given so particular an account of what passed in that Kingdom. The sequel will justify, as I hope, this long digression. I return now to the affairs of England.

Elizabeth demands Calais. April 23. Camden. Speed. p. 838, &c. France refuses it.

The term for the restitution of Calais being expired, Elizabeth sent into France Sir Thomas Smith Secretary of State, and Sir William Winter Master of the Naval-Stores, to demand that Place of the King, according to the Treaty of Cateau. But nothing was farther from the King of France's thoughts. He appointed Commissioners to treat with the English Ambassadors, as if it was to be considered again to whom that Place was to belong, and as if the Treaty of Cateau was to be reckoned as nothing. Michael Hospital Chancellor, who was first Commissioner, made, on this occasion, a long Speech, of which it will be sufficient to relate the substance, to show how groundless were the reasons with which he supported the Denial of Calais. He said,

"By the same right the English demand Calais, they may as well claim Paris; for the one, as well as the other, was won and lost by arms (2).

"The English plead a new Title to Calais, whereas the King of France's Title is of the same date with the Monarchy itself.

"Though the English had it in possession above two hundred years, yet the Right was as much in the Kings of France, as were the Dukedoms of Guienne and Normandy, which the English detained a long time by force. And therefore it could not be said, the French had conquered Calais and those Dukedoms, but only recovered what belonged to them.

"Prescription of Time is of no consideration among Princes, but Right always takes place, and by the Law of the Twelve Tables, the Authority remains perpetual against an Enemy.

"Though the English undertook the late War for the sake of Calais, yet that place was not mentioned in the Treaty of Troye, and thereby they owned they had no farther pretensions to it.

"The Clause inserted in the Treaty of Troye, relating to the restitution of Rights, concerns only small and insignificant matters, and not the restitution of Calais, which is an Article of the greatest importance.

"The pretended attempts of Francis II. in Scotland, could by no means affect the Right of Charles IX. his Successor. Indeed, the very intentions of private Persons are in some respects liable to the Laws; but the case of Princes is quite different.

"The late King, in aiding the Queen of Scotland his Wife, did no more than the English themselves had done in seizing Havre de Grace, under colour of keeping it for the King. Moreover, they furnished the Prince "of Condé with Money, and therefore have forfeited

"their claim to Calais.

"When it pleased God that the French should recover

"Calais, he set the natural bounds between the Kingdoms of France and England, according to the Poet:

"Et penitus toto divisis orbe Britannos.

"In a word, if any one had the assurance to propose to the King the restitution of Calais, he would deserve not only death, but a worse punishment, damnation."

Smith replied, "He would not stay to show the weakness of the Arguments alledged by the Chancellor, because he could not believe, the refusing to restore Calais would in good earnest be founded upon reasons so little plausible. There was a Treaty made expressly on this account, which the Chancellor never mentioned, as if he had forgot, that upon this Treaty, signed, ratified, and sworn to by the King of France, the Queen of England's demand was grounded. Neither did he intend to lose time in combating maxims, which, if admitted, would render all Treaties between Sovereigns of no effect: but would content himself with answering two objections, which were the most specious. As for the Treaty of Troye, he appealed to some of the Commissioners, who were present at the conclusion of that Treaty, whether it was not agreed, that the restitution of Calais should be comprised in the general reservation of Rights, and that the reason which they alledged to hinder the Town of Calais from being restored by name, was, because the eight years were not yet expired. As for Havre de Grace, the English made a peaceable entry, being invited by the Inhabitants and the People of Normandy. In short, as for the Money lent to the Prince of Condé, the King of France himself owned it was for his service, since it was to pay the German Soldiers, who threatened to ravage the Kingdom." But all these reasons were to no purpose, France being resolved not to part with Calais. I shall observe here by the way, that the Chancellor of France did not use, in order to evade the restitution of Calais, the Arguments taken from the Treaty itself of Cateau, as he might have justly done, if that Treaty were exprest in the Terms, or after the manner mentioned by the French Historians.

It was not the Chancellor's arguments that hindered Elizabeth from asserting her right to Calais but the situation of her affairs, which permitted her not to enter into a war with France. Her intention was not to invade, but to defend and maintain herself on the throne, in spite of the endeavors of her enemies. This was her only care, during the whole course of her Reign. Hence it was that she sometimes seem'd willing to marry, though, in all appearance, she had no such desire. The first she decoyed with this hope, was the Archduke Charles of Austria, the same that was proposed to the Queen of Scotland by the Cardinal of Lorraine. She carried her dissimulation so far, as to send Thomas Ratcliffe Earl of Suffex in embassy to the Emperor Maximilian, to settle the marriage-articles, the Emperor on his part having dispatched Count Stolberg to keep her in this good resolution. The Earl of Suffex stayed five months at Vienna about this negotiation, going thither under colour of carrying the Emperor the Order of the Garter. But he was accompanied with the Lord North, the Earl of Leicester's Creature, who was ordered by his Patron to defeat the negotiation as much as possible, by tacitly hinting to the imperial Court, that the Queen had no design to marry, whatever she pretended. The Emperor found afterward, that North was better informed than the Ambassador, who, fearing the Queen would espouse the Earl of Leicester, did his utmost to adjust all differences and remove the objections. The main difficulty was to find expedients upon the article of Religion, which should satisfy both Courts. The Emperor relaxed as much as he could, and the Earl, on his part, did all that lay in his power to remove the obstacle. They were now agreed, that the Archduke should have the Title of King of England, and Guardianship of the Children, in case the Queen died first. As to Religion, after the Emperor had often, but in vain, demanded the Privilege of a publick Church for the Archduke, he consented at length, that he should be satisfied with a private Chapel in some part of the Royal Palace, where no foreigner should be admitted; and if his way of Worship should be any offence, he should forbear it for a time, and be present with the Queen at the Service of the Church of England. But this affair being debated in the Council of England, the Queen sent the Earl of Suffex word, that she could not admit even of this. So the Negotiation was broke off, though without noise, with marks of esteem and friendship mutually given by the Emperor and the Queen. By the way, this obstacle concerning Religion, was the means the Queen always used to break off all the Negotiations about her Marriage. And therefore she ever treated with Catholick Princes, because she was sure of breaking off the Negotiation whenever she pleased. As for the Protestant Princes, who offered themselves whilst she was of age to marry, she took care to let them soon know, they had nothing to hope for. This behaviour confirms the suspicion which had been always entertained, that she had made a settled resolution never to submit to the matrimonial yoke, though her affairs obliged her sometimes to pretend the contrary.

This year arrived at London Ambassadors from John Basilwitz, Grand Duke of Muscovy. Their publick Commission was, to confirm and renew the Favours which the Czar their Master had granted to the English Merchants, ascribed by the name of the Muscovy Company. But with these Ambassadors returned Anthony Jenkinson an Englishman, who had made a long stay in that Country, and was charged with some private instructions (1). The Czar's design was to make with Elizabeth a league offensive and defensive, with a mutual obligation to afford each other a safe retreat, in case either should be driven out of his Dominions. This Prince, who was a great Tyrant, was willing to provide for his safety, being apprehensive his Subjects would not always suffer his Tyranny. The Queen returned him a doubtful answer, which he had no reason to be pleased with, and yet he granted, two years after, to the English Merchants, Privileges which very much conduced to render their trade with Muscovy flourishing.

About this time there were Commotions in Ireland, occasioned by the Rebellion of Shan Oual, a Lord of great interest in the North; but which ended with the death of the Rebel, who was slain by his own People.

The Duke of Norfolk, who was one of those that were most in the Queen's favour, lost his Duchies this year (2), and by that means unfortunately saw himself in a condition to form projects which proved his destruction (3).

The Affairs of the Low-Countries were very much altered during this year. The great Men were divided, and several had betrayed the common cause. The Prince of Orange was withdrawn to his Governments, Count Horn to his own House, and Count Egmont continued with the Governors, who improving this dissention, revoked whatever he had been forced to grant to the Reformed. Then she sent for Forces out of Germany, and raised some Italian Regiments. Shortly after Philip II. resolved to send the Duke of Alva into the Low-Countries, with an Army of native Spaniards, to chastise both the Nobles and People. Whereupon, the Prince of Orange retiring into Germany, the Duke of Alva entered the Country at the head of his Army, without any opposition. At his Arrival at Brussels, the Dukes of Parma put the Government into his hands, and then the Duke exercised cruelties which it is needless to relate, since they are universally known. The Counts of Egmont (4) and Horn lost their lives by the hand of the Hangman, whilst Montigny suffered the same punishment in Spain, and all the Prince of Orange's Lands were confiscated.

On the other hand, the Court of France, under colour of fearing the Duke of Alva, who was to pass near the Borders, levied six thousand Switzers, with design to extirpate the Huguenots, whilst the Duke of Alva should do the same in the Netherlands, pursuant to the agreement at Bayonne. It is easy to see, that in such a juncture, Elizabeth could not attempt the recovery of Calais. It was sufficient if she could avert the Flames which threatened England. Mean while, the Prince of Condé, having with difficulty escaped the Snare of the Court, re-assembled the Huguenots by the Admiral's help, and was very like to have succeeded in his design of carrying away the King at Meaux. After this disappointment, he went and blocked up Paris. In short, on the 10th of November was fought at the Gates of Paris a Battle, wherein the Constable Montmorency was slain. This Action not being decisive, the Prince marched to meet Casimir, Count Palatine, who was bringing him an aid of three thousand Foot, and six thousand five hundred Horse. In September, La Noüe, one of the chief of the Huguenots, took Orleans. Thus all the neighbouring Countries of England, namely, Scotland, France, and the Low-Countries, were in trouble and confusion, whilst the English, by the wise management of the Queen, enjoyed a profound Peace.

It was however at the expence of her own, that Elizabeth secured the repose of her People. She had to fear both at home and abroad, and consequently was obliged to attend perpetually as well to foreign as domestick affairs, in order to prevent the designs of her Enemies. The state of the Huguenots in France made her very uneasy. Their Enemies were likewise her's, and as there was little appearance of their withstanding the Catholics, who were a hundred to one, and supported by the Authority Royal, she was apprehensive, that after their extirpation, the storm would fall upon England. It was scarce to be doubted, that the War, which was waging at once with the Protestants of France and the Low-Countries, was the effect of the mutual Councils of the French and Spanish Courts, and that the destruction of the Protestant Religion was the principal object these two Courts had in view. Elizabeth therefore thought it absolutely necessary, to let the King of France know she was concerned for the preservation of the Huguenots, whatever reason she might have to complain of their behaviour to her. To that purpose she ordered Norris, her Ambassador to Charles IX, to intercede earnestly for them, and give to understand, she knew her own interest too well to suffer them to be entirely ruined. These threats from England, the resolution of the Huguenots, and their assistance from Germany, produced a good effect, and procured them a Peace. But it was only a treacherous Peace, wherein the Court intended only to deceive them, and which for that reason was called afterwards the Lame Peace. Catherine de Medici knowing it would not be before long the War would re-kindle, resolved to be beforehand, to prevent Elizabeth from assisting the Huguenots. To that end she began now to hint to the English Ambassador a marriage betwixt Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou, who was but seventeen years of age. I shall speak elsewhere of the Sequel of this project.

At the same time Philip II. showed his spite against Elizabeth, by confining her Ambassador (5) to a Country Village. On the other hand, Sir John Hawkins, an English Merchant, who was gone to trade in the Bay of Mexico with five Ships, by virtue of the Treaty between Charles V. and Henry VIII. was insulted by the Spanish Fleet, which took and filled three of his Ships. These outrages were very grievous to Elizabeth, especially as the Merchants loudly murmured, and were importunate for a War with Spain. But she did not think proper then to show her resentment, for fear of being engaged farther than the situation of her affairs did permit. She had the more reason not to enter into a War of this nature, as at the same time the affairs of Scotland, which touched her more nearly, took a new turn, and might be to her of very great consequence.

Queen Mary was Prisoner at Lock-levin: but that did not hinder her from having still a strong Party consisting of all the Catholics, with those that envied and hated the Earl of Murray, or such as were in credit about him. Indeed, most of those Men little regarded the Queen, but thought she could afford them a plausible pretence to act against the Regent, and it was this that caused them to declare for her. On the other side, in the Regent's Party itself, which was called the King's, there were some who were engaged in it purely to ruin Bothwell, whom they hated and feared. These imagined, if they could get him out of the way, things would return to their proper channel, and the Queen might marry some Prince, who would cause Scotland to flourish again. Kircaldie, who was of this number, being informed, that Bothwell was playing the Pirate near the Isles of Schetland, equipped two Vessels, and resolved to go in chase of him, believing all troubles would cease with his death. He was so fortunate as to meet with him. He pursued and obliged him at length to run his Ship ashore, and escape to Land in his Boat. But his Ship was taken with his Servants, who, it is said, gave information of many things concerning the late King's murder, which reflected on the Queen. But there is no relying upon such sort of publick reports. Bothwell having the good fortune to escape, but not knowing which way to fly, resolved at last to retire into Denmark, where he was taken up and thrown into Prison. He lived there ten 1568. years in extreme misery, which turned his Brains. Camden affirms, that before his death, he solemnly protested the Queen was in no degree privy to the Murder of the King her Husband (1). But, according to custom, this Author does not say from whence he had this particular (2).

Barthwell being no longer to be feared, all those that had declared against the Queen from their hatred to him, forsook the King's Party, some privately, others openly. Islington and the Lord Boyd were amongst these who refused to be still attached to the Regent, in order to have a better opportunity to do the Queen Service. The Earl of Argyle wavered for a time, but at last quitted the Earl of Murray, and joined the other Party.

Mean while, the Regent being gone to Glasgow, heard a few days after, that the Queen had made her escape from Locheven (3), and was at Hamilton Castle, but twelve Miles from Glasgow. This News quickly spreading, the Lord Boyd, who was of the Regent's Council, took him immediately and went to the Queen.

The Regent was extremely perplexed, especially as he learned at the same time, that the Queen's Friends were drawing People together from all sides, and flocked to her in great numbers. This made him sensible, he must either forsake the Party, or try the fortune of a Battle. He chose the last, and assembling some forces, though in number very inferior to the Queen's, he departed from Glasgow, at the very time the Queen was marching to give him battle. Melvil says, the Queen's design at first was not to fight, having left Hamilton Castle only to retire to Dunbarton, but that the Archbishop of St. Andrews and the rest of the heads of the Party (4) were for hazarding a battle, trusting to their numbers, and hoping to govern in the Queen's name, when the Regent was vanquished. Be it as it will, this Army, six thousand strong (5), advancing towards Glasgow, met the Regent who had but four thousand Men, and the Battle began. It is needless to give a description of it here (6). It suffices to say in a word, the Queen lost the day, and for fear of falling into the hands of her Enemies, fled towards the Borders of England. She chose for her first retreat the House of Maxwell Baron of Harris (7): But, a few days after, not thinking herself safe there, or in any other place in the Kingdom, she resolved to retire into England. Upon the least attention to what had passed hitherto between Elizabeth and Mary, and to the just reasons they had to distrust, and consider each other as real Enemies, notwithstanding their external demonstrations of a mutual friendship, which was all dissimulation, it will not be thought, that Mary would have voluntarily taken refuge in England, had it been in her choice to retire elsewhere. But there was a necessity either of falling once more into the hands of the Scots her Enemies, or of throwing herself into the arms of Elizabeth. Of the two dangers, one was near and infallible: the other was yet distant, and not so certain, as to destroy all hopes of finding assistance in that Queen's generosity. However this be, she sent one of her Servants, John Beton, to Elizabeth, to desire her protection and leave to retire into England. Camden says, she sent by the same Messenger a Diamond, which she had received from her as a pledge of her friendship, and promise to assist her to the utmost of her power, when there should be occasion. And yet, this same Author has inserted, under the year 1582 of his Annals, a Letter of Mary to Elizabeth, wherein it appears this Diamond was sent back before the Battle of Glasgow. Besides, though Elizabeth may possibly have added to her Present of the Diamond some tender and affectionate expressions, with some general promises, it is not likely she intended to oblige herself so far as Camden would intimate. I his is what I believe for several reasons. First, it is certain Elizabeth was never so well-affected to Mary. Secondly, such an engagement was directly contrary to her interest, which required not she should be so careful of her Rival's prosperity. Lastly, no time can be assigned, when Elizabeth was under any necessity to carry her dissimulation to that height. Camden adds, Elizabeth sent word to Mary by the same Beton, that she would give her all the proofs of friendship which could be expected from a Sister. But as I have often hinted, it is not always safe to rely wholly on the testimony of this Author (8). However, before this answer arrived, Mary fearing to be discovered in her retreat, took boat (9), and came to Wickhamton in Cumberland, attended only by the Lords Harris and Fleming, and a few Servants. The same day she wrote to Elizabeth, begging her to receive her arrival in England. She told her in the Letter, that having escaped out of Prison, and intending to go to Dundrum, her Enemies came against her to dispute her passage (10), and defeated her Army: That was most true, obliged her to quit her Kingdom, where she could not be with safety, to come and implore her Protection, and she intreated her to cause her to be conducted to her preference. She said also in the same Letter, That her Friends, after murdering her Servant Thomas, had committed a new Crime, which they pretended to charge her with, though themselves had plotted it, as appears by a Writing under their own Hands and Seals. It is this doubtless which gave Camden occasion to say under the year 1567, that the Earls of Murray and Morton bound themselves by a Writing to support Barthwell when he should have killed the King (11). If this Writing, which never appeared, were really true, it would evidently follow that Mary was not ignorant of Barthwell's being Author of the King her Husband's murder, since she knew Murray and Morton had promised to screen him. But it is not likely, she would have made such a confession to Elizabeth. Besides, on supposition that Mary's Letter was such as Camden represents it, she does not name the Earl of Murray. She only imputes to her Enemies the crime she accused of. We shall see a reader how she maintained what she had advanced, and after what manner she bore her defence.

Elizabeth being informed the Queen of Scots was in Elizabeth England after the loss of a Battle, sent Sir Francis Knollys to comfort her, and ordered her to be lodged at a Gentleman's House, where she was treated as a Queen, right and just. After that, she was conducted to Carlisle (12). Here Mary writes a second Letter according to Camden, intreating her either to admit her to retire into England, or give her leave to depart elsewhere. Camden says, Elizabeth was touched with Compassion (13), because the Queen of Scots offered to debate her Cause before her, and engaged to prove her Adversaries guilty of the Crime they unjustly loaded her with. But this Historian stretches a little too far what Mary said in her Letter, since she did not offer to prove her Adversaries guilty, as indeed she never attempted it. There is not a word in Camden's Annals concerning the Queen of Scots, but what must be guarded against. We are going to see Elizabeth's Compassion for this Queen. She sent her word, that as the flood charged by the Voice of the publick, with being privy to the murder of the King her Husband, or at least with not inquiring after the Murderers, and with keeping still in her service, and in her very House such as were accused of being Accomplices, she could not see her till she had cleared herself of so heinous an accusation, and desired to know in what manner she intended to justify herself. Whereupon, it was agreed, that Elizabeth should hear her defence, and protect her if innocent. It is very probable, or rather certain, that herein Elizabeth intended only to gain time, and have a pretence to detain her till she had determined what was to be done, which her Council was at no final loss to know.

There were on this occasion several ways to be taken, Sunday Open and each had its difficulties. But, as it is very useful in the Councils of Princes, the Star by which the Ministers and Counsellors were guided, was not Justice or Equity, but the Queen's safety. In much the same case Henry IV. stayed the King of Scotland's eldest Son, who was afterwards King himself, under colour that he was come into his Dominions without his leave, and that Prince was de-

1668. tained till the reign of Henry VI. It cannot be denied, that a Sovereign has power to seize a foreign Prince, who enters his Territories without a safe conduct. But there are cases wherein strict Right becomes the greatest Injustice. Such was that of Henry IV. with regard to the Prince of Scotland. But in Mary's case, the Circumstances appeared still more favorable. It was a Woman, vanquished by her own Subjects, whose violence she feared, and who, far from being capable of any ill design against England, was conscious of her error, and to impute the possession of a Queen her near Kinsman, who had always affected to give her marks of her friendship. So, to consider the Queen's fault, only as a sort of breach of the Law of Nations, she did not deserve to be detained in Captivity. But as I said, it is not always by these maxims that Sovereigns are guided. The point in debate in the English Council, was, not to search for what was most convenient to Justice or Goodwill, but what was most advantageous. The various considerations which might be taken with respect to the Queen of Scots were examined, in order to chuse the most beneficial to Elizabeth. The first was to restore her to the Throne, for an example, that Subjects might not expect their Sovereigns with Impunity. But though this was what Elizabeth should have done as a Sovereign, yet other more particular Considerations hindered her from endeavouring to restore and render more powerful, a Queen whom she justly looked upon as a dangerous Rival. For the same reason it was to be feared, if she sent her back to Scotland, though without Succours, her Enemies would revolt, and one Victory, which was not to be sold, might render her absolute. In that case she might send the French into Scotland, and pursue the execution of the projects formed in France, in the reign of Henry II. her Husband. On the other hand, if she were sent over to France, there was no certainty that she would not return to Scotland. Besides, if the King of France, and the Princes of Lorrain, were masters of her person, it was very likely they would make use of her name to invade England, and the Pope and King of Spain join with them. There was no way therefore but to keep her in England, either free or in prison. But to leave her at liberty was running a manifest hazard. Her Title to the Crown of England would draw to her Court all the Catholics, and disaffected persons in the Kingdom, as well as the French and Spanish Ambassadors, to assist her with their Counsels. That if, being absent, she had been able to form a strong Party in England, how much more might her presence render the same party more numerous and powerful. It is certain, though Elizabeth and her Ministers pretended to think it very strange, Mary should claim the Crown of England, they knew however the grounds of her Title, and that many people were convinced, it was even more lawful than the Queen's. Finally, in detaining her in prison, there was no question, Elizabeth would incur the Indignation of all Europe, by this excessive Severity, the motives whereof would not be generally known. This was however the course which Elizabeth took, by the advice of her Council, and without doubt, by her own Inclination. It is certain, besides the reasons of State which induced her thereto, she was also moved by a personal jealousy of the Queen of Scots, who was handsome and younger than herself, though she was very far behind her in other respects. However, to colour in some measure the Severity which was to be used to the Queen, Elizabeth resolved to appear extremely concerned for her misfortune, and very desirous to be convinced of her Innocence, that she might afterwards give her a powerful assistance, without fear of reproach. But withal, she took a resolution to delay the methods to be used for this purpose, till time and opportunity should afford room for other measures. From thenceforward she constantly refused to hear those who spoke against the Queen of Scots, but then she was not sorry that divers Accusations were publicly spread against her, that it might not be thought strange, this affair could not be cleared in a short time. So, Camden had reason to say, Elizabeth seemed touched with a sense of the Queen of Scotland's misfortune, and openly detested the behaviour of the Scots. But it does not follow, these were her real Sentiments. Her aim being only to prolong the affair, under colour of labouring the Justification of her Prisoners, it was not proper, she should, by her discourses, declare herself a party against her. She ought rather to show, she inclined to her side. Mary herself was long deceived by this policy. She imagined Elizabeth really intended to convince her. But discovering the artifice at last, she resolved to take such measures as furnished her Enemy with a plausible pretence to detain her in prison. I will venture to affirm, this is the true key of the affair, which will never be well understood, if we stand to what is said by the Historians of either side.

Whilst these things passed in England, the Earl of Murray called a Parliament at Edinburgh, to get those condemned who had taken Arms against the King in favour of the Queen. The opposite Faction seeing they were like to be oppressed by the decree of the States, used all their endeavours to prevent their assembling. They even demanded Aid of the French, who resolved to send an Army into Scotland, under the Conduct of Montgomerie. In the mean time, the Queen's friends met at Glasgow to consult how to hinder the Session of the Parliament, as they could not agree, the Earl of Argyle withdrew to his House. The Earl of Huntly more fiery than the rest, assembled some Troops, and posted himself at Perth, to alarm the Regent, till the arrival of the French Succours. But the Civil War which rekindled in France, obliging the King to keep the Forces designed for Scotland, the Earl of Huntly was constrained to retire. This resolution failing, the Queen's friends applied to Elizabeth, representing to her, that the Regent, by an unreasonable Session of a Parliament, was going to drive the principal Lords of Scotland to despair, and offered to take her for Umpire of their differences with the Regent. This offer was very grateful to Elizabeth, because she could thereby render herself mistress of the affair, and prolong it as she pleased. She therefore let Murray know, he would oblige her in deferring the Parliament, till she was better informed of the reasons, which had induced the Scots to deprive their Queen of the Government of the Kingdom. But he deferred to be executed, and held the Parliament on the day appointed. Buchanan pretends, Lethington, who seemed to be attached to the Regent, managed it to be by his Interest, that the States resolved to punish only some of the most guilty, and that this Indulgence was a great means to strengthen the Queen's Party. The Parliament breaking up, the Regent raised an Army to pursue those who were condemned. He reduced several places to the obedience of the King, and very probably, would have overrun the whole Kingdom, if the Court of England had not interrupted the execution of his designs.

Elizabeth found so great an advantage in becoming Umpire of the affairs of Scotland, that she took care not to let slip the present opportunity, without improving it. To compass her ends the more easily, she plainly intimated, that she believed the Queen of Scots innocent; that she herself was concerned in this quarrel, which all Sovereigns ought to espouse, and that it was their Interest to chastise rebellious Subjects, who might give a dangerous example to others. In a word, she artfully disguised her sentiments, that the Scotch Queen's Friends, blinded by these appearances, perswaded the unfortunate Queen, to offer to appoint Commissioners to defend her cause before Elizabeth, and so fell into the snare Elizabeth had laid for her. She had no sooner made this imprudent Offer, but Elizabeth writ to the Earl of Murray, that the proceedings of the Scots in deposing their Queen, were so extraordinary, that she could not approve them, unless they showed by very good reasons, that they could not have done otherwise. That if their Queen were innocent, she thought herself bound by all sorts of considerations to protect her, and restore her to the Throne, but was willing, before she came to any resolution, to hear what they had to say in vindication of their conduct. That therefore, she desired the Regent would send some well-informed Persons to York, where the would order Commissioners to hear what the Scots had to alledge against their Queen. That it was necessary he should in person clear himself of the crimes he was accused of. In short, she gave him to understand, she should take his refusal as an authentic proof of Mary's innocence. Elizabeth must have talked something high, to oblige the Regent to take so extraordinary a step. Besides, it was no less necessary to keep by that means the Queen of Scots in the belief, that Elizabeth sought only to cause her to come off honorably, for fear she should revoke the consent she had given. Elizabeth's real aim was to have a pretence to detain the Queen of Scots, till the affair should be cleared, well knowing she should not want means to prolong it as she pleased. Besides, how much soever she pretended not to be fully informed, she knew enough to consider, that the Scots would bring good evidence against Mary, and thereby furnish her with a very natural excuse, to require a farther examination. All this was extremely agreeable to the scheme she had laid, and a means to silence the French and English Ambassadors, who pressed her continually on behalf of the captive Queen. She told them, she intended to assist Mary with all the Forces, and restore her to her former government.

decency required the Queen should first be cleared, in the eyes of the Publick, of the crime she was charged with, and that all possible expedition was using to make her innocence appear.

The Earl of Murray was very much at a loss what answer he should return to Elizabeth's Summons. It was dangerous for a Regent of Scotland to put to arbitration an affair already decided by the Parliament, and dishonourable to answer before a foreign Power. But on the other hand, he could support himself only by the assistance of England; how much less, if Elizabeth should resolve to restore Mary to the Throne? Besides, he was afraid his refusal would be construed as a sign, he mistrusted the justice of his Cause. So, after consulting his Friends upon so nice a point, he resolved to go himself to York with eleven Deputies, who were appointed to assist him (1). These were, James Douglas Earl of Morton, Adam Bishop of Orkney, Robert Commendator of Dumfermling, and Patrick Lord Lindsay. Mary nominated the Lords Herries, Livingston, Boyd, Gavin Commendator of Killybeg, John Gordon of Lechinewarr, James Cockburne of Skirling, Knight, and the Bishop of Ross. Elizabeth commissioned Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff Earl of Sussex, and Sir Ralph Sadler (2), to hear what both Parties had to say, whether for or against. All these Lords came to York on the same day, namely, the 4th of October.

In order to understand fully what passed at the Conference of York, and at another afterwards at Hampton Court, it will be necessary to know what is said upon this occasion in Melvil's Memoirs. Without this Key, there is no comprehending any thing by Buchanan's account, and still less by Camden's, who endeavoured rather to darken, than clear the affair. What Melvil relates is a secret, equally unknown to Buchanan and Camden.

a private Affair which passed at the Conference of York.
Buchanan.

Very likely, the Duke of Norfolk, who had lost his Duchy last year, had now formed the Project of marrying the Queen of Scots, before he repaired to York. At least, it may be affirmed, this Lord was Mary's principal Friend in England. For which reason, he accepted the Commission of presiding at the York Conference, only to hinder the success Elizabeth expected, and to break her measures. However secret the Queen's Project was, the Duke of Norfolk, it seems, had entire knowledge of it, Courtiers having usually a wonderful sagacity, to discover what the Prince would keep most private. Nay, it is said, he had ordered the Earl of Westmoreland, his Lieutenant in the Presidentship of the North, to kill the Earl of Murray when he came upon the borders, and seize all his Papers, in order to destroy the Proofs he was bringing against the Queen of Scots, but altering his mind, had revoked the Order. In the beginning of the Conference, he started several incidents to retard the conclusion of the affair in debate. But at last, perceiving all his endeavours would avail only for a delay of a few days, he opened his mind to Lidington, who, though suspected by all the King's Party, had attended the Regent as Deputy and Secretary of State. The Duke told this Lord, that he could not imagine what had induced the Scots to come and accuse their Queen before English Commissioners; that they greatly dishonoured their Nation, and would one day be responsible for it. Lidington replied, he was very glad to find him of this opinion, that for his part, he had done his utmost to hinder the Regent from taking this step; that Kivaldie had done the same, but to no purpose: and if he had accompanied the Regent, it was only in hopes to succeed better in England, and desired him to talk with the Regent, and try to dissuade him from accusing the Queen. The Duke of Norfolk knowing by this, the Earl of Murray's Proceedings were not approved by all his Party, and that even Remonstrances had been made to him upon this occasion, hoped, by speaking to him himself, to prevail with him in some measure. He talked with him therefore in private, and representing to him what he had before said to Lidington, added, he was much mistaken, if he imagined Elizabeth intended to give sentence upon the difference he and his Party had with the Queen of Scots: but that her sole aim was to make them subservient to her own ends: That if he desired to be convinced of this, he had only to require a Promise under her own hand, to give sentence as soon as the Proofs should be produced, and to support the King of Scotland's Party, in case the Queen his Mother was found guilty. He added, the Queen would never give any such Promise in writing, and thereby demonstrate, she sought only to amuse them. In short, he so managed the Regent, that, before they parted, they agreed, that when he was called upon to produce his Evidences, he should demand a previous engagement from the Queen, such as the Duke had suggested to him. The Earl of Murray imparted this Agreement to none but Lidington and Sir James Melvil, who liked it extremely (3).

At the next meeting, the Regent being pressed to give in his proofs against the Queen of Scots, replied, as he had agreed with the Duke of Norfolk, to the great surprize of the Hearers, except those who were in the secret. It was resolved therefore to write to the Queen, to inform her of this new and unexpected difficulty, and to know whether she would give the Regent of Scotland the engagement he demanded. Her answer was, she thought it very strange her word could not be taken, but that a writing under her own hand should be required, and prayed the Earl of Murray to send two Deputies to acquaint her with his reasons. The Regent chose for this purpose Lidington (4), and Macgil, to the great amazement of the rest of the Deputies, who could not conceive that he should trust with such a Commission Secretary Lidington, of whom the whole Party were so jealous.

Shortly after, the Queen desired the Regent to come himself to London with the other Deputies (5), to which he consented. When they were arrived, the appointed other Commissioners to confer with them, namely, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Cecil, the Earl of Leicester, the Lord High-Admiral (6), and Sir William Sadler (7). Probably, she suspected the Duke of Norfolk of some prevarication, and this suspicion was not groundless. She earnestly wished, upon several accounts, to have in her hands the proofs intended to be used, in support of the accusation against the Queen of Scots. First, to silence such as murmured at her not endeavouring to restore that Princess. And indeed, it was manifest, if Mary were guilty of the crime laid to her charge, she was unworthy of her protection. Secondly, having these proofs in her power, she would not only have the management of this affair, but might also cause all delays to be considered as so many favours to Mary, who, in all appearance, would not dare to press her to give sentence. Spite and Jealousy might possibly be a third reason, Elizabeth being secretly pleased with her Rival's shame. In the first Conferences at Hampton Court, the English Commissioners were very urgent with the Earl of Murray, to give in his proofs against the Queen of Scots. He answered, it was with extreme reluctance that he could resolve to accuse the Queen his Sister, and should never proceed to this extremity, unless it were for the real good and welfare of all Scotland: That therefore he required the Queen of England's written promise, to protect the King, in case the Queen his Mother were found guilty.

The affair standing thus, and the Earl of Murray still persisting in his demand, the Earl of Morton happened to be informed of his agreement with the Duke of Norfolk, by some one whom Mary had trusted with the secret (8). Then it was, Morton came to know the true motive of the Regent's Conduct, which hitherto seemed to him incomprehensible, since he refused to accuse the Queen, though he was come into England for that very purpose. He imparted the secret to some of his Colleagues, and they resolved to acquaint Secretary Cecil with it. What passed afterwards between Cecil and the Earl of Murray is not known; but it may be conjectured by what followed, that Murray suffered himself to be prevailed with, to do quite contrary to his engagement with the Duke of Norfolk.

At the first meeting after this discovery, the English Commissioners demanding that the proofs against the Queen should be given in, and the Regent refusing it, all the Scots, except Lidington, were for producing them. Then Wood, Secretary to the Regent, pretending a zeal for his Master, said, it was not from a spirit of cavil, as some 1568. Confessions of those who were executed for being concerned in the King's murder. Then he read the decree of the States, confirming the Queen's resignation of the Crown to the King her Son. After which, he produced the fatal Casket, which Bothwell would have taken from the Castle of Edinburgh, and showed the Letters, Verses, and Contracts before mentioned. This is what Buchanan, who was present, attests (1). But Camden, without descending to any particulars, contents himself with saying, The Earl of Murray endeavoured to prove her guilty of her Husband's Murder, by conjectural proofs and circumstances, by some few Affidavits, by certain Love-Letters and Verses writ, as he affirmed, with the Queen's own hand. But these Letters and Verses were little regarded, there being no name or date to them.

Buchanan's History was published when Camden writ his Annals. The first attests, that in the Casket were found Letters containing the whole Conspiracy against the King, and the Queen's Rape, besides the Contracts. Camden insists upon some Letters and Verses, and even insinuates they were forged. Had he writ first, he might have supposed his Assertions would not be questioned. But as he wrote forty years after Buchanan, he ought, in my opinion, either to have positively denied or explained the facts related by that Historian. And therefore, as he does not confute them, it is plain he had nothing material to object to them. He farther adds, Murray gave the Commissioners a Book of Buchanan's, intitled, The Detection, wherein was a particular account of the King's death, with the Vouchers: But that it found little credit with the Commissioners, because the Author was a mercenary Writer. As to the confessions of those that were put to death, he says in another place, that all declared the Queen innocent with their last breath. Here he owns, the depositions of these same People were produced against her, but answers them not. He adds however, that Elizabeth was very well pleased that these accusations had something impaired the Queen of Scots's reputation (2). But if the Commissioners gave no credit to the proofs of the Accusers, as he would insinuate, Mary's reputation could not be impaired, but on the contrary, the would have been fully cleared (3).

The examination being ended, Elizabeth forbore to decide either for or against, as she had resolved. Mean while, as Mary's friends were endeavouring to raise troubles in Scotland, and the Regent's preference was necessary, Elizabeth took occasion to put off the conclusion of the affair till a more convenient time. Thus she obtained her desires, that is, a pretence to detain Mary till the affair was more fully cleared, and withal, proofs which would very probably hinder the Queen and her Friends from soliciting a decision. Buchanan affirms, she caused the Scotch Deputies to be told, that thus far she did not see any thing blameable in the conduct of the Scots. Camden says, on the contrary, she abhorred their insolence. Melvil adds, she acquainted Mary, that she believed her wrongfully accused, and could not enough detest the insolence of her Accusers; nor should the accusation be ever made publick. The difference between Camden and Melvil is, that Melvil relates this only to show to what height Elizabeth carried her dissimulation; but Camden pretends to infer from thence, she believed her innocent. After all, the accounts of these three Authors may be equally true, because Elizabeth's scheme was to leave the Affair undetermined, and to put both parties in hopes of her favour. Buchanan says, before the Conference ended, Murray offered to clear himself of the King's murder before Mary's Deputies: But that they thought proper to drop their accusation (4). They could hardly do otherwise, for though they might have hoped to convict him, their Commission was revoked.

Though, according to Melvil, Elizabeth said she would not see the Earl of Murray any more, she had however several private Conferences with him. In these Conferences it was, that he informed her of all that had passed between him and the Duke of Norfolk (5), and showed her Letters from Mary, which had been intercepted in Scotland, wherein he complained in very harsh terms, of the treatment she received since her coming to England. Moreover, she hinted to her Friends, that they should not be discouraged at what had passed at York and Hampton Court, and that she expected a powerful aid from a certain place which she would not name. These Letters, added to what was discovered at the same time, that the Pope was labouring to raise a Rebellion in England, by means of Ridolfi a Florentine Merchant, and to Lidington's frequent Conferences with the Duke of Norfolk (6), who was become very suspected, obliged Elizabeth to order the Queen of Scots to be removed to Tutbury Castle (7).

The Duke of Norfolk was so exasperated against the Earl of Murray, that he had resolved to have him murdered in his return to Scotland. But Throckmorton having reconciled them, the Duke desisted from his design. Melvil affirms, Murray promised Elizabeth to send her the Letters the Duke should write to him, and that he performed his promise (8).

Whilst these things passed in England, the French Court was thinking of executing their design of carrying away by force the Prince of Condé from his House at Noyers. The Peace granted to the Huguenots was only to amuse them. Happily for the Prince, he had notice of it time enough to escape to Rebelle. This stratagem failing, the persecution against the Huguenots was renewed with greater fury than ever. The King forbid them the exercise of their Religion, and banished all their Ministers. Whereupon, they sued for aid to Elizabeth, who sent them a hundred thousand Crowns of Gold, with a good train of Artillery. She saw plainly this was a consequence of the Councils held at Bayonne, and that if she suffered the Huguenots to be oppressed, the flames would soon reach England. What confirmed her in this opinion was, that the Duke of Alva proceeded in the same manner in the Low-Countries, and plainly showed, he intended utterly to destroy the Protestant Religion in these Provinces, and make the King absolute. The Prince of Orange had brought an army from Germany to try to stop the execution of this design, but for want of money to pay it, was forced to retire among the Huguenots of France. This Accident compelling many Flemish Families to fly to England for refuge, the Queen gave them leave to settle in several good Towns, where they contributed very much to cause trade to flourish (9).

About the close of the year an accident happened, which occasioned a Quarrel between the Queen, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Alva. The Genoa Merchants, and some others of Italy, having a great sum of money in Spain, and resolving to send it into the Low-Countries (10), obtained a Pass-port of the King of Spain, and put the money on board some Vessels of Biscay. These Ships being attacked in their passage by French Pyrates, did with great difficulty escape into Plymouth, Falmouth, and Scutthamption. As soon as the Queen had notice of it, she ordered the Magistrates of those places to treat the Spaniards civilly, and assist them in case the Pyrates attempted any thing against them. The Spanish Ambassador telling her the money belonged to the King his master, obtained leave to have it landed. His design was to carry it by land to some Port nearer the Low-Countries. But, at the same time, Cardinal de Chatillon, who was then in England (11), informed the Queen that the money belonged to some Merchants, and that the Duke of Alva was to seize it to help him to carry on the War. This was also confirmed by other people. So, to deprive the Duke of Alva of this assistance, she took the money by way of loan, and gave security for the payment. Some time after, the Duke of Alva demanding the money, the Queen replied, she would punctually return it, as soon as it appeared by good proofs that it was the King of Spain's. Upon this refusal, the Duke seized the effects of the English, and sent the Owners to prison; and the Queen did the like by the Flemings. A few days after, she issued a Proclamation upon this occasion, which the Spanish Ambassador answered in print,

That she should consent to a League offensive and defensive between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland.

That she should confirm the Establishment of the Protestant Religion in Scotland.

That she should pardon such of her Subjects as had acted or appeared in arms against her.

That she should revoke the Assignment of her Right to the Kingdom of England, which she had made to the Duke of Anjou, the King of France's Brother.

That she should marry the Duke of Norfolk.

Camden. Mary very readily accepted the offer with the Conditions annexed, all but the League, which she scrupled at a little, because she was willing, before she enter'd into it, to consult the French King. She denied she had made any Assignment to the Duke of Anjou, and yet offered to procure his renunciation, if required, for the greater security.

It is easy to perceive, the Proposers of these Terms had taken great care to screen themselves from the Law, since they seemed very just in themselves, and advantageous to both Kingdoms. But they supposed the Restoration of Mary to the Throne of Scotland, and her nomination to succeed to the Crown of England. This was to be done first, and then the execution of what she promised on her part, was left to her honour. It was in this the artifice consisted.

The Project is carried on. Camden. As soon as Mary's consent was gained, several Lords and Gentlemen were founded, who not perceiving the venom of the Project, approved it, but with this proviso, that nothing should be done without the Queen's consent. It was also communicated to the Kings of France and Spain, who were very well pleased with it, though it be evident, they would have had no reason to be so, if they had believed, the conditions would be punctually performed. The proceedings of those who had framed such a Project, without consulting the Queen, plainly shew, their design was to put the affair in such a state, that it should not be in her power to hinder the Execution, when proposed to her. The Duke of Norfolk thought himself so secure of success, that the Earl of Northumberland having acquainted him, that Leonard Dacres intended to carry away the Queen of Scots (1), he desired the Earl to hinder it, being apprehensive she would be conducted into Spain.

Elizabeth is informed of it. Camden. This affair passing through so many hands, and being hardly any longer a secret, the Duke of Norfolk justly feared, the Queen would be offended that she was not informed of it, and therefore, not to incense her more, he desired the Earl of Leicester to speak of it to her. Leicester promised to do it the first opportunity, and yet delayed it from day to day, so that all knew it, except the Queen, who, it is likely, feigned ignorance. However, she was willing to give the Duke occasion to disclose his secret, by telling him one day (2), to beware upon what Pillow he laid his head; but he pretended not to understand what she meant, chusing rather that the Earl of Leicester should speak to her first, because he thought him his Friend (3). But it is said, the Earl had acted in this affair only to ruin him, because he considered him as a dangerous Rival in the Queen's favour. However this be, the Court being at Titchfield, the Earl of Leicester feigns himself very ill, and the Queen going to see him, he shewed signs of fear and trouble, which she easily perceiving, asked him the reason. Then begging her pardon, for having so long concealed from her a secret which he ought to have told her, he discovered all that had passed concerning the Duke of Norfolk's Marriage with the Queen of Scots. After which, the Queen called the Duke into a Gallery, and taxing him with imprudence and rashness for attempting this Marriage, without vouchsafing to impart his design to her, commanded him to desist from this Project. The Duke owned, such a proposal had been made to him, and he had consented to it; but shewed himself so regardless of it, that he told the Queen, his Revenues were not much less than those of the whole Kingdom of Scotland, drained by civil Wars; and that when he was at his Tennis Court in Norwich, he thought himself as good as some Kings. In short, he promised the Queen to think no more of the Marriage. Mean while, as afterwards he perceived she did not look upon him with the same eye as before, that the Earl of Leicester was against him, and the Courtiers shunned him, he withdrew from Court, without taking his leave of the Queen, and came to London. The same day the Bishop of Ross (4) suing for the enlargement of the Queen of Scots, Elizabeth, in great disgust, told him, that his mistress had nothing to do but to rest satisfied, unless she had a mind to see those, on whom she most relied, shorter by the head.

This affair being entirely divulged, the Queen endeavoured by all ways to get information of such particulars, as might have escaped the Earl of Leicester's knowledge. As she knew the Duke had frequent Conferences with the Earl of Murray, she sent Sir George Carey (5) into Scotland, to desire him to acquaint her with what he knew of the matter. Mean while, the Duke being privately warned by a Message from the Earl of Leicester, that a resolution was taken to send him to the Tower, retired into Norfolk. But repenting of this hasty step, which might render him suspected, he returns to Court, after writing to the Queen to beg her pardon, and to his Friends, to intreat them to speak to the Queen in his behalf. Some days after, the Queen received Letters from Scotland (6), informing her of some things which had not come to her knowledge, and which made her sign a Warrant to send the Duke of Norfolk to the Tower. Then the Bishop of Ross, who acted as the Queen of Scots Ambassador, was examined, and Ridolfi the Florentine was delivered to the Custody of Sir Francis Walsingham. The Lord Lumley was arrested, the Earl of Pembroke was confined to his own House, and all the rest who were concerned in the Project of the Duke of Norfolk's Marriage, were banished the Court, except the Earl of Leicester. The Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland made their submission to the Earl of Suffolk, Lord President of the North. All these Lords endeavoured to excuse themselves, by declaring, they had approved the Project of the Duke's Marriage, on the express condition, it should not be consummated without the Queen's consent.

Elizabeth did not think fit to publish all she knew of this affair, wherein the prime Lords of the Kingdom were concerned. Besides, she had received, some time since, advice of a Conspiracy ready to break out, and consequently, it might be very dangerous to use too great a severity at such a juncture. The Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, both very powerful in the North, had held together several Conferences, of which the Queen had notice, and which caused her to order them to repair to Court. They made some dilatory excuses, but the Queen sent them a more express Order, to put them under a necessity of relinquishing their enterprize, or engaging in an open Rebellion, before they had taken proper measures. This second Order produced the effect she expected. The two Earls knowing themselves guilty, and not daring to trust to the Queen's Mercy, took arms, and drew some forces together (7).

The Rebels design was to free the Queen of Scots, though they mentioned her not in their Manifesto. They said only, their intent was, To restore the Religion of their Forefathers, remove evil Counsellors from the Queen, and cause Justice to be done to the Duke of Norfolk, and the other Lords now in Prison, or under disgrace. At the same time, they writ circular Letters to the Catholics, inviting them to come and join with them. But most sent the Letters, they received, to the Queen (8), whether they were not willing to disturb the Peace of the Realm, or were discouraged by the Duke of Norfolk's imprisonment. Mean while, the Rebels coming to Durham, burn all the English Bibles and Common-Prayer-Books, and openly say Mass. Then they march'd to Clifford-Moor, where they took a muster, and found their Army amounted to four thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse. Their chief design was to free the Queen of Scots, in order to set her at their head; but upon the first news of this Rebellion, she was conveyed to Coventry (9), a strong City in the middle of the Kingdom, not to be taken without a formal Siege, for which the Rebels were by no means prepared. Besides, in marching thither, they would have gone into a Country, where the Inhabitants were not their Friends.

Mean time, Forces were levying for the Queen in several parts. The Earl of Suffolk had now seven thousand Men (10).

1569. the Lord Clinton was at the head of twelve thousand, and the Earl of Cumberland, with the Lord Scrop, were near Carlisle with a good body of Troops, besides the Garrison which they had thrown into that City. So, the Rebels finding their number not increase, thought proper to retire to the borders of the North (1), where they took Bernard Castle, but, presently after, fearing to be surrounded, dispersed themselves. The Earl of Northumberland concealed himself [at Harclate] in Scotland (2). The Earl of Westmoreland eloped into the Netherlands, where he spent the residue of his days, living upon a slender Pension allowed him by the King of Spain. The Rebels being thus dispersed, some were hanged for an example (3). Forty others, who were fled out of the Kingdom, were convicted of High-Treason and out-lawed, and their sentence was confirmed by the next Parliament. Of this number were, Charles Nevil Earl of Westmoreland, Thomas Percy Earl of Northumberland, with his Countess, and Egremont Ratcliff, Brother to the Earl of Sussex (4). The Queen pardoned the rest, who did not fly out of the Land. Some time before this Rebellion, the Duke of Alva sent to the Queen Claudio Tellez, a famous Captain, to demand the Money which had been stopped. But his Commission was so limited, that he was forced to write to the Duke of Alva for a more ample power. The real design of this Embassy was to have in England an experienced Leader to command the Rebels, and the forces the Duke of Alva was to send over. Lamoth Governor of Dunkirk, disguised like a Sailor, had already founded the Ports, as he himself confessed afterwards. But the Queen broke all these measures, by compelling the two Heads of the Rebels to take arms sooner than they had resolved.

This Rebellion was quickly followed by another, of which Lemard Dacres, a Gentleman of the North (5), was the Head. He had some business at Court, which he was soliciting when the first rebellion broke out. Upon the news, he went and offered his service to the Queen, who accepted it, because she knew he had a great interest in the northern parts. Having received a Commission from the Queen to raise forces, he sent to the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, that the Troops he should raise by virtue of his Commission, should be at their service. He even put them in hopes of foreign succours, as certain Ambassadors at London had assured him. His chief design was to carry away the Queen of Scots; but he was disappointed, by her being sent to Coventry. So, finding himself at the head of three thousand Men, after taking some Castles (6), he resolved to expect the Lord Hunsdon, who was marching towards him with the Garrison of Berwick (7). The battle was fought near the little River Gelt. Dacres behaved very gallantly, but being vanquished, fled into Flanders, where he died. The Queen pardoned all his Followers.

At the same time, there were Commotions in Ireland, in which, it appeared, the King of Spain was concerned, since he had dispatched thither Juan Mendoza, an Officer, to foment them. But they were easily allayed (8).

It is uncertain, whether the Duke of Norfolk was concerned in the late Rebellion in England. Several circumstances made against him. First, as most Insurrections necessarily require some preparations, it might be thought the Rebels were getting ready, at the very time the Duke of Norfolk and his Friends were preparing every thing, to obtain the Queen's consent to the projected Marriage. In this expectation, he had hindered Dacres from attempting to free the Queen of Scots, as he had intended. Secondly, all the motions of the Rebels tended to Mary's deliverance, and most of her Friends were discouraged, when they heard the Duke of Norfolk was in the Tower. Lastly, the Rebels themselves laid in their Manifesto, they had taken arms to release him. But on the other hand, it is certain this Lord was never called to an account, and the Queen was contented with keeping him in prison till September the next year. Hence, it seems, it may be inferred, there was no proof against him. But perhaps the Queen did not think it advisable to let the people know, the first Lords of the Realm were concerned in the conspiracy.

I left, about the end of the last year, the Earl of Murray in England, where he had played several and very opposite parts. Upon his arrival in Scotland, he assembled all the Lords of the King's Party at Sterling (9), to communicate what he had done in England, and his Conduct was approved.

The Duke of Chateaufort was come from France to London, a little before the Earl of Murray's departure. He forthwith demanded Queen Elizabeth's aid and protection, to obtain the Regency of Scotland, being the young King's nearest Relation. But the Queen knew her interest too well to fall into such a snare, and to favour a Lord, whose conduct had ever been very equivocal, and who, in all appearance, had not imbibed at the Court of France favorable notions of the King's Party. The Duke not being able to obtain his desire, let the Earl of Murray depart, and came not to Scotland till some time after him. He brought a Patent from Queen Mary, wherein it appeared, that by a new and unheard-of Right, she had adopted him for her Father, and as such, committed to him the Regency of the Kingdom. The Earl of Murray hearing the Duke assumed the Title of Regent in virtue of this Patent, immediately assembled an Army, to compel him to submit to the Government, resolving no other Authority but the King's should be acknowledged in Scotland. Since the Queen's defeat and flight, her Party was grown so weak, that the Duke of Chateaufort was unable to resist. All his dependance was upon the good success of the Project, which was then forming in favour of the Duke of Norfolk, after which he did not question to gain the advantage of the Earl of Murray. But as it was not in his power to hasten the execution of the Project in England, he was forced to confine himself to the endeavouring to gain time, by proposing an Agreement. He plainly perceived, the way of arms could not be successful in his present circumstances. He set therefore his Friends to talk with the Regent, and it was agreed, he should come to Glasgow, acknowledge the King's Authority, and renounce the Queen's; for which some advantages he had required were granted him. Notwithstanding this Agreement, he raised fresh difficulties to attain his end. But the Regent not being satisfied with all his evasions, began to march with his Army to attack him. Then the Duke having no other refuge, was constrained to go to the Regent with the Lord Herries. A few days after, the Regent having assembled at Glasgow the Lords of the King's Party, it was resolved that a Proclamation should be published, offering to all who had hitherto refused to own the King's Authority, to receive their submissions, and restore them to the enjoyments of their Lands. But the Earls of Argyle and Huntley would not accept of these terms, being extremely displeased at the Duke of Chateaufort's putting himself into the hands of the Earl of Murray. At the same time, Queen Mary writ Letter upon Letter to her Friends, exhorting them to stand firm, and giving them hopes of a speedy and happy revolution in her affairs. She was then in expectation of the success of the Projects concerning her Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk.

The Regent's Proclamation not meeting with the expected success, and no one appearing to accept the offered favour, he departed for Edinburgh, carrying with him the Duke of Chateaufort and the Lord Herries. He had delayed thus long to press them to make their submission to the King, because he was desirous it might be a general affair. But at last, finding the Queen's Friends were in no haste to make their submission, he resolved to incite them by the Duke of Chateaufort's example, who was the head of the Party, and summoned him to perform the agreement made at Glasgow. The Duke seeing himself pressed sought excuses, saying he did not mean to treat for himself alone, but for the Queen's whole Party, and therefore could do nothing without the concurrence of the other Lords, and the Queen's approbation. Whereupon, the Regent asking him what he intended to do if the Queen approved not the agreement of Glasgow? He replied, that he believed himself bound to nothing. The circumstances of the Duke of Norfolk's Plot, the success whereof he expected every moment, made him think it not very dangerous to talk thus. However, the Regent finding himself thus amused, sent him and the Lord Herries Prisoners to the Castle.

of Châteleraut's imprisonment, an account which the circumstances of affairs renders very probable. But Camden and his Followers have been pleased to say only, the Regent having summoned at Edinburgh the Lords of both Parties, to labour an agreement, the Duke of Châteleraut and the Lord Heriot first repaired thither, and were ordered to prison. In this manner has Camden maimed and disfigured the History of Scotland, to give some colour to his Invektives against the Earl of Murray. I am going to relate another instance, either of his prejudice or unfaithfulness. I have reserved it till now, though it be not its proper place, because it would have been impossible to convince the Reader of my assertion, if he was not first inform'd of what has been said concerning the affairs of the Queen of Scots. I hope I shall be pardoned this sort of digression.

Camden, after a very brief account of the murder of King Henry Darnley, in the year 1567, and an insinuation that the Earl of Murray was the real Author of it, Says, that the same Murray earnestly pressed the Queen to marry the Earl of Bothwell, to which she consented at last, after much difficulty. Then he immediately adds,

Forasmuch as the Earl of Murray and others, to colour their Rebellion against the Queen, whose Authority they usurp, do openly slander her, as guilty of the Murder of her Husband; we do publicly protest and witness these things following. In the month of December (1) 1566, when the Queen was at Craigmillar, Murray and Lidington acknowledged before us, that Morton, Lindsay and Ruthven slew David Rizzo, with no other intent than to save Murray, who was at that very time to be professed. Therefore, that they might not appear ungrateful, they greatly desired, that Morton and the rest who were banished for Rizzo's Murder, might be recalled. But this they said could not be done, unless the Queen were divorced from her Husband, which they promised to accomplish, would we but give our consent. Afterwards Murray promised to me (Huntley), that my ancient Inheritance should be restored to me, and I should be an ever-lasting Favourite with the exiles, if I would but countenance the Divorce. Then we applied to Bothwell for his Consent also. And lastly, we came to the Queen, and Lidington, in the name of us all, earnestly intreated her to reverse the Banishment of Morton, Lindsay, and Ruthven. The King's faults and offences against the Queen and the Realm, he aggravated with very great bitterness; and showed how much it concerned the Queen and State, that the Divorce should be made out of hand, it being impossible for the King and Queen to live together in Scotland with safety. She answered, she had rather withdraw for a time into France, till her Husband should be sensible of the Errors of his Youth, being unwilling any thing should be done to her Son's prejudice, or her own dishonour. To this Lidington replied, we who are of your Council will look to that. But I command you, says she, to do nothing that may blench my honour, or offend my conscience. Let the thing remain as it is, till God pleases to provide a remedy from above: That which you imagine will be for my good, may, I fear, turn to my hurt. [To which Lidington said, please to leave matters to us, and you shall find nothing will be done but what is just, and what the Parliament will approve of.] A few days after, the King happening to be murdered in an execrable manner, we do from the inward Testimonies of our consciences, hold it for certain, that Murray and Lidington were the Authors, Counsellors, and Abettors of this Regicide, whoever were the Actors.

This Protestation, as may be easily observed, squares exactly with Camden's design in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth, namely, to clear the Queen of Scots from the crime of murdering the King her Husband, and to accuse the Earl of Murray. But wital, it is directly contrary to the Testimony of Melvil, an Eye-Witness, who, in his Memoirs, says not a single word which can give occasion to suspect, the Earl of Murray was thought guilty of the murder. If this Protestation therefore be true, Melvil's Memoirs must be only a heap of Fables, which no man of sense will ever believe. But to shew that this Writing is counterfeit, it will be proper to examine it particularly, and make some remarks which will discover the Forgery.

Camden begins with saying: I shall willingly insert here what George Earl of Huntley, and the Earl of Murray, who were the principal Lords of Scotland, protested soon after.

This soon after must have been two whole years at least, as I shall demonstrate hereafter.

As I have taken it from an Original signed with their own Hands.

Camden has not set these two Lords hands to the Writing, it may be, because he did not know in what order they were to be placed. In a certificate however, one would think the signature is a material thing (2).

Which they sent to Queen Elizabeth.

Supposing the truth of this Protestation, it could not be sent to Queen Elizabeth till the latter end of the year 1568 at the very soonest, when the Earl of Murray went to York to accuse the Queen before the English Commissioners. This remark discovers Camden's artifice, who designedly neglecting to date the Writing, places it in his Annals the beginning of the year 1567, immediately after the King's Murder, as if at that very time Murray had been accused of killing that Prince; whereas it was not till after the Queen's flight into England that she thought of casting the crime upon him. It was not therefore out of pure negligence that Camden avoided dating the Protestation.

Forasmuch as the Earl of Murray and others, to colour their Rebellion against the Queen, whose Authority they usurp, do openly slander her as guilty of the Murder of her Husband.

The Earl of Murray cannot be said to usurp the Queen's Authority, till after he was declared Regent, or the Queen to accuse him publicly of killing the King, till the York Conference, or rather till that of Hampton-Court, that is, in October or November 1568. Now at that time the two factions were both formed. Murray was head of the one, and Huntley of the other. So, supposing this Writing not to be forged, what opinion can a man have of the attestation of one sworn Enemy against another? As to the Earl of Argyle, Buchanan affirms, he was retired a little before to his own House; so that it is not probable he should join with the Earl of Huntley to frame this Certificate at the time it must be supposed to be drawn. If it was dated, we might speak of it with more certainty.

We do openly protest and witness these things following. In the month of December 1566.

This way of beginning argues it was now some time since the things they are going to mention were transacted.

When the Queen was at Craigmillar, Murray and Lidington acknowledged before us, that Morton, Lindsay and Ruthven, slew David Rizzo, with no other intent than to save Murray, who was at that very time to be professed.

I have already made appear by the testimony of Melvil, that the Earl of Murray, far from owning that Rizzo was killed on his account, would not join with the Party of the Murderers, but remained constantly attached to the Queen. Besides, the Earl of Argyle, Author of this Protestation, was then a fugitive as well as Murray, and was no less to be condemned than he. And yet, he speaks here of this affair, as if he were a Stranger to it, though he was the most considerable of those who were to be banished, and though Melvil affirms, it was for his and the others sake, who had taken arms against the Queen, Murray excepted, that Rizzo was murdered.

Therefore that they might not appear ungrateful, they greatly desired that Morton, and the rest who were banished for Rizzo's Murder, might be recalled.

What has Lidington to do here, when he was never concerned in Rizzo's affair? and wherein consisted his ingratitude, if the exiles were not recalled?

But this they said could not be done unless the Queen were divorced from her Husband.

Rizzo was killed by the King's order, and in his presence, and solely, according to the Author of the Protestation, to save the Earl of Murray. The point was to get the Murderers recalled, who had been banished for this Murder committed by the King's order, and these exiles cannot be recalled by the Queen, the only Person offended, unless she is divorced from the King. Let this consequence be well examined, and it will never be thought, that the Earls of Huntley and Argyle were so weak as to reason in

(1) Or thereabouts, in the Copy in Anderson's, Tom. IV. p. 188. Camden has very much contrived or curtailed this Protestation.

(2) This Protestation is in Mr. Anderson's Collection, Tom. IV. Part. 2. p. 188, &c. but it is taken from a Copy, without either Hands or Date. However, it is to be observed, that in the same Collection there follows an Answer of the Earl of Murray's, to the aforesaid Protestation, wherein he says, "In case any Man will say and affirm, that ever I was present when any Proceedings were taken at Craigmillar in my Audience, under the seal and authority of the Council, or otherwise, I have never been there, nor have I ever signed any Band there, nor that my Presence was his Men and of the above said, as my knowledge, I leave to the King's wisdom and enquiry; which I will maintain upon them as becomes an honest Man, to the intent my Letter, may thus be true. Subscribed, I, David Rizzo, was killed by the King's order, and in his presence, and solely, according to the Author of the Protestation, to save the Earl of Murray. The point was to get the Murderers recalled, who had been banished for this Murder committed by the King's order, and these exiles cannot be recalled by the Queen, the only Person offended, unless she is divorced from the King. Let this consequence be well examined, and it will never be thought, that the Earls of Huntley and Argyle were so weak as to reason in 1567. so wretched a manner. In December 1567, that is, about the time of the Prince's Baptism, the King was looked upon as a cypher, and exposed to all sorts of insults from the Queen.

Which they promised to accomplish, would we but give our consent.

At that time the Earl of Murray had no credit at court. It was Bathwell that ruled all. I don't know how it stood then with Lidington. However, Murray and Lidington are represented here as the Persons that were to be the chief Agents in accomplishing the Queen's Divorce, and as wanting for that purpose only the bare consent of the Earls of Huntley and Argyle. This is by no means probable.

Afterwards Murray promised to me (Huntley) that my ancient inheritance should be restored to me, and I should be an ever-lasting Favorite with the Exiles, if I would but countenance the Divorce.

The Author of the Proteftation has confounded the times. Murray having then no power, could not make any fuch promise to the Earl of Huntley. None but Bothwell was able to make and perform it. Befides, it is not likely the Queen, when ſhe recalled the Earl of Huntley, who was condemned to die, ſhould ſtill detain his ancient Inheritance which had been confifcated.

Then we applied to Bothwell for his Consent also.

This confounds the whole History of Scotland. Murray and Lidington are made Authors of the project of the Queen's Divorce, and the Earl of Bethwell, as one who is only to give his consent, though it is certain, he had then an absolute sway over the Queen, who married him very soon after.

And lastly, we came to the Queen, and Lidington in the name of us all, earnestly entreated her to reverse the banishment of Morton, Lindsay, and Ruthven. The King's Faults and Offences against the Queen and the Realm, he aggravated with very great bitterness; and shewed how much it concerned the Queen and State, that the Divorce should be made out of hand, it being impossible for the King and Queen to live together in Scotland with safety.

Can it be conceived, that to induce the Queen to pardon Men who had killed her Favorite in her presence, and by the King her Husband's express order, there should be occasion to aggravate the King's faults, and demonstrate to the Queen, that she must be divorced from him?

She answered, she had rather withdraw for a time into France, till her Husband should be sensible of the errors of his Youth, being unwilling any thing should be done to her Son's prejudice, or her own dishonour.

The Author of this Protestation represents the Queen in December 1566, as being under oppression, and speaking of retiring into France till the King should be pleased to amend his errors. This suffices to shew, that the whole is a forgery; for it is not likely, the Earls of Huntley and Argyle should talk in this manner.

To this Lidington replied, We who are of your Council will look it that. But I command you, says he, to do nothing that may bleisſh my Honour or offend my Conſcience. Let the thing remain as it is, till God pleaſes to provide a remedy from above: That which you imagine will be for my good, may, I fear, turn to my hurt.

The artifice of these words which the Queen is made to speak, conflicts in this : The Queen having commanded all these Lords to do nothing with respect to her Divorce, Murray and Lidington found no other way to get the Exiles recalled, but by causing the King to be murdered. As if the King alone was an invincible obstacle to the recalling of the banished Lords, who killed Rizzio by his orders, and in his presence. I confess this reasoning appears to me incomprehensible.

A few days after, the King happening to be murdered in an execrable manner.

What has been just related passed in December 1566, according to the Proteftation, and the King was killed in February 1567, that is, two months after. Now can it be supposed, that the Earls of Huntley and Argyll could possibly be so mistaken, as to call two months a few days?

We do, from the inward Testimonies of our Consciences, hold it for certain, that Murray and Liddington were the Authors, Contrivers, and Abettors of this Regicide.

The Inference the Author of this Paper would draw, that the Earls of Murray and Lidington were the Contrivers of the King's murder, from their having projected the Queen's Divorce, appearing to him, without doubt, liable to strong objections, he seems to give it up in part, when he grounds it wholly upon the inward Testimony of Hunt- 1562.

ley's and Argyle's Conscience.

Never were the Affairs.

It was notorious that Bethwell was the contriver of the King's murder, and Camden himself makes no scruple to own it, joining however the Earl of Murray with him. But the Author of the Protestation durst not name him, because it was giving a sensible wound to the Queen's Honour, who, within a few months, married the murderer.

I shall only add one remark, which to me seems decisive to demonstrate the forgery of this Paper. Lidington was never accused but in this writing only, of being concerned in King Henry's murder (&c.). On the other hand, so far was he from being considered as an Enemy to the Queen, that he was rather very much attached to the young King's and the Earl of Marblehead's Party, and not without reason. What Melville says of him, at the occasion of the Torh and Hampton Court Conferences, is a clear evidence that he continued in the Regent's Party, only to have opportunities to serve the Queen. Buchanan confirms Melville's Testimony, in a Book, entitled, the Camelion, wherein he pretends to shew, that Lidington betrayed the young King's Party, and in 1. History he drops many the like Expansions against him. Now, how can it be thought, that the Earls of Hunt and Angle, Heads of the Queen's Party, should be ignorant, that Lidington was privately labouring for them? If they knew it, 'tis by no means likely, that at the very time when Lidington was at Torh or Hampton Court, and frequently conferring with the Duke of Norfolk, to hinder the Earl of Murray from accusing the Queen, these two Chiefs of the Party should publicly accuse their secret friend of being Author of the King's murder; especially as there was not the least ground for such a charge. But very possibly, the Author of the Porefection was ignorant of Lidington's secret practices, and seeing him among those who attended the Regent at Torh, imagined he might safely join them together in the same Accusation.

But however this be, though this Protestation be as true as it appears to be counterfeit, it cannot serve for proof to support what Camden advances concerning the Earl of Murray, because it will be still true, that it came from one of his most mortal Enemies. I return to what passed in Scotland during the year 1569.

Shortly after the Duke of Chatsworth's arrest, the Regent convened the council on certain Letters he had received, upon which it was necessary to consult together. The first was from a friend in England (3.), to give him notice of the Conspiracy in favour of the Duke of Norfolk, to espouse the Queen of Scots, telling him, that, the Conspiracy was in such a state, that all the Forces of Great Britain were not capable of preventing its success; and advising him therefore to think in time of his own affairs.

The second Letter was from Queen Mary, and directed to the States of Scotland. It was to define, that the validity of her Marriage with the Earl of Bathwell might be examined, adding, if there appeared any essential defect in it, she would very willingly consent, it should be dissolved. As Bathwell was still alive in Denmark, it was necessary his Marriage with the Queen should be annulled, before she could espouse the Duke of Norfolk. For this reason she wanted the States of Scotland to get it dissolved, pretending only to give her consent to it, though she could not proceed without it.

The third Letter was from Queen Elizabeth, to the same States, to demand one of the three things, in favour of Mary. The first, That she should be restored to the Throne as formerly. The second, That she should reign jointly with the King her Son. The third, That she might live in Scotland, with such Honours, as should not be prejudicial to the King's Authority. Camden, who agrees, in it, with Buchanan, will have it, that the demands of Elizabeth are to be considered as the effect of her Compassion for the Queen of Scots. But where was the Compassion, to propose to the States three things so disproportionate, and to leave the choice to them? She knew, the two first would be rejected, and though the third it could be accepted, many difficulties would occur before it could be settled. Thus what Camden considers as an effect of Elizabeth's pity, was in truth only a consequence of the project she had formed to prolong the affair, under the specious colour of favouring her Prisoner.

(1) Rapin has it here and elsewhere September, which, I suppose, is a mistake, for it is December in Camden, from whom he takes the P. 1. 1. 1. 1. King James was christened December 15, 1566.

121. Here McJannet is mistaken. McJannet properly says, "That Captain Crawford was directed to arrest John in behalf of Prosser," and that John was being arrested on account of the crime. McJannet was right in saying that John was not the one time arrested by Deane. The one time arrested by Deane was John. But McJannet observes, in the same Page, that he and Sir John St. John were separately paid, only of the first and only of the second of the "Officers".

1569. Letter ought not to be answered, because she addressed to the States as if she was fill the Queen, which they would not allow. She did what she could to remove this difficulty; but all her endeavours served only to confirm them the more in their resolution. They were far from being willing to facilitate the Queen's Marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, by causing Bothwell's to be nullified. Mary, who did not know they were so well acquainted with her Secrets, complained very much of their scrupling to dissolve a Marriage, which had served them for a cloke to take Arms against her. But her complaints were little regarded.

As to Elizabeth's demands, the Lords resolved to reject the two first, and accept the third, if Mary would be satisfied with it, and sent their answer to the Court of England by a young Gentleman. But Elizabeth, who only fought to gain time, writ to them, that she desired a person of more consideration to be sent to confer with her about so weighty an affair. For this reason the Lords deputed Robert Pittcain.

While Pittcain was on his way, the Regent perceiving the Queen's Faction daily grew stronger, by the hopes which the Duke of Norfolk's project gave the whole Party, thought it necessary to secure Lidington's person. This Lord, by feigning to be attached to the King's party, served the Queen to the utmost of his power, and as he was a Man of great sense and parts, did much more prejudice to the Regent, by outwardly embracing his side, than if he had openly declared for the Queen. So, the Regent having on some pretence drawn him to Stirling, ordered him to be apprehended, and sent Prisoner to Edinburgh (1). But Kircaldie coming unexpectedly with part of the Garrison of the Castle, rescued him (2), promising to see him forth-coming when it should be required. This notable proceeding rendered Kircaldie very suspicious to the King's whole party (3).

Mean while, the Duke of Norfolk being sent to the Tower, without effecting any thing of his projects, all Mary's designs, as well in Scotland as England, vanished into air. Shortly after, the Earls of Huntley and Argyle were reconciled to the Regent, and submitted to the King's Authority. By that the Queen's Faction was in a manner extinguished for some time. This shews how much Queen Mary and her Adherents relied on the Duke of Norfolk. I shall close this year with a brief account of what passed in France and the Netherlands.

The war continued in France during the whole year 1569. On the 13th of March was fought the Battle of Jarnac, wherein the Prince of Condé was killed. D'Andelot the Admiral's Brother did not long survive him. Some time after, the Duke of Deuxponts led an Army into France, to the assistance of the Huguenots, but died there in June, leaving the Command of the Army to Count Manfeldt, who joined the Admiral. With this Re-inforcement the Admiral laid Siege to Poitiers, but was forced to raise it in September. In October, the Huguenots lost the battle of Moncontour. This defeat obliged the Admiral to fend for a speedy aid from Elizabeth, who lent him Money upon the Queen of Navarre's Jewels, which were sent to her in pawn. She also permitted a Company of a hundred Gentlemen-Volunteers to be raised, to serve in the Army of the Huguenots (4). The Campaign ended with the taking of St. Jean d'Angeli, which the King became master of before the end of October.

The Duke of Alva still continued his oppressions in the Netherlands. He had set up the Inquisition, and ordered the Council of Trent to be received, as well as the new Bishops, whose Jurisdiction had been hitherto rejected. The bloody Council still acted with fury. The Privileges of the Cities, Universities, Provinces, were delivered to the King's mercy. In a word, the Duke of Alva ordered the hundredth part of the Revenues to be paid to the King, after that, the twentieth part of the real, and the tenth of the personal, Estates, every time they were sold. Some of the Magistrates of the Towns having the boldness to appeal to the King from these Ordinances, were severely punished. In short, these Provinces being now considered by the Spaniards, but as a conquered Country, all were driven to despair (5).

The beginning of the next year 1570, the Earl of Murray having notice that the Earl of Northumberland was concealed in Scotland, found means to seize him, and committed him to prison at Loch-lewin. Camden says, he offered to deliver this Lord to Elizabeth, in exchange for the Queen of Scots; but this is not likely. Mary was better guarded in England than she could be in Scotland, and Murray was not ignorant of Elizabeth's reasons never to release her.

A few days after, Murray was shot through the body by one of the Family of Hamilton, who pretended it to be only in revenge of a private Injury. But it soon appeared to be by the direction of the Queen's Faction (6). On the morrow, the Scots and the Carri, great friends of the Queen (7), entered England in Arms, and destroyed the Borders with fire and sword. As they had no private reason to make this Incurtion, it is easy to perceive, they were encouraged by the heads of the Queen's Faction, who were willing to try to give a new turn to affairs. Their Scheme was this.

The Queen's Faction was ruined, and without any likelihood of being ever able to rise again, because the Earl of Murray could be always sure of assistance from England in case of necessity. Wherefore the heads of that Faction (8), who had submitted to the King against their wills, formed new projects. They considered the strict Union between England and Scotland, as a strong fence against all their enterprizes in favour of Mary, and therefore resolved to break it at any rate. To succeed, they deemed it necessary before all things, to assassinate the Earl of Murray, that the Kingdom might for some time be in a sort of Anarchy, as it happened indeed. That done, they hoped, by provoking the English on their Borders, they should excite them to a revenge on all the Scots without distinction; that this would revive the old enmity between the two Nations, and so all Scotland would be united against England; that then Succours might be easily sent for from France and Spain, and the project be refused of invading the borders of England, whilst the Catholics should on their part act within the Kingdom. The Lord Seaton's Embassy to the Duke of Alva, and the Pope's Bull, of which I shall presently speak, plainly shew, this was their Intent, though Camden is pleased to consider the Invasion of the English Borders, as a mere caprice of the Scots and Carri.

Immediately after the Earl of Murray's death, Kircaldie released Lidington, who used all his art to hinder the King's Party from proceeding to the election, of a new Regent. He intimated, that Scotland would never be in Peace, unless a Regent were chosen, who should be approved by the two Parties, and consequently it was necessary to assemble the Great Men of both sides, that they might agree together. In what he said there was the appearance of good. But he knew, it would be difficult to get all the great Men together in one place, and though they should meet, they would never agree upon the choice. However this served to gain time, in the expectation Queen Elizabeth, by resolving to revenge the injury she had received, would drive all the Scots to despair, and unite them all against her.

1570. He succeeded in the first part of his design, and by his intrigues managed it so, that the election of a Regent was deterred. But he was not so happy in the other part of his project. Elizabeth and her Council were too wise to fall into the Snare. On the contrary, the more they divided, the more they judged it necessary to keep them divided, nothing being so advantageous to Elizabeth as to foment confusion and discord in that Kingdom, till she could take other measures.

To that purpose she sent Randolph into Scotland, to complain of the Inroad made into England. But instead of laying the fault upon the whole Nation, as the Authors of the Invasion expected, she said wistly by her Ambassador, she was very sensible, those who governed Scotland were not concerned in the insult on the English, and therefore she was willing to distinguish the innocent from the guilty. That she demanded however a suitable reparation, and if they who were at the helm could not procure it for her, she offered them the assistance of her Forces. That in case they refused it, she would send an Army into Scotland, not to attack the whole Nation, but to punish such only as wantonly, and without provocation, had insulted the English. As it was then a time of Anarchy, there being no Regent yet, the giving the Ambassador an answer was put off till May, when the States would be assembled. Randolph insisted not upon a speedy answer (1). He contented himself with exhorting the Scots to Peace and concord, whilst he privately laboured to cherish their divisions, in his Memoirs. Mean while, Elizabeth prepared an Army, which she intended to send into Scotland, as well to revenge her Subjects, as to support the King's Party, and cause a Regent to be elected, who should not be against the interest of England.

Though the heads of the Queen's faction saw Elizabeth did not fall into their snare, they endeavoured however to provoke her, and incense her against the whole Nation, by Libels and Slanders which they took care to publish. But all their Artifices were not capable of making her alter her course. Mean while, her Army which was to be commanded by the Earl of Suffex, was preparing with all possible expedition.

In the mean time, Mary's Adherents taking courage since the Earl of Murray's death, held frequent Councils upon the situation of their affairs. Their aim was to gain time, in expectation of the Succours which Verac the French Envoy (2), put them in hopes of. They expected likewise an aid from the Netherlands, and as these Succours could not be ready so soon as they wished, they endeavoured to amuse the King's Party by Proposals of agreement. But these last constantly refused to conclude any thing before the Assembly of the States.

In this interval, the Lord of Grange released the Duke of Chateaufort, the Lord Heriot, and the rest of the Prisoners, and thereby the Queen's Party was considerably strengthened. It must however have been still very weak, since it could act but by negotiations. Be this as it will, the heads of that Party resolved to meet at Linlithgow (3), by the name of the States, since there being no Regent, they thought they had as much right to convene the States as the other Party. In this Assembly they vainly sought means to engage England to break with the whole Scotch Nation. Elizabeth was too much upon her guard to be easily surprised. At last perceiving they could not succeed, they believed it necessary for their safety to try to become matters of Edinburgh. But as this could not be effected by force, they desired the Magistrates of Edinburgh to permit them to hold their Assembly in the City. This was readily granted; but the Inhabitants kept so strict a Watch, that the Project of the Queen's Adherents was frustrated. Mean time, there were sundry Negotiations between the two Parties which came to nothing.

Presently after, upon news of the Earl of Suffex's being come to Berwick, the Assembly of Edinburgh broke up. The Heads had now sent Deputies to Elizabeth, to try to divert the impending storm, and to gain time, till the Arrival of the French Succours. They even offered to make her Umpire, and were so well seconded by the French, that the Queen's Party consented to be Mediators between the two Parties. But she pretended, the affair, for which she sent an Army into Scotland, had no relation to the differences between the two Parties, for it was only to chastise the Violators of the Peace, who were owned by neither Party, without however either being able to procure her any satisfaction. So the Earl of Suffex received no counter-orders. When that General was come to Berwick, the Duke of Chateaufort sent Melvil, to know whether he intended to join one of the Parties, or endeavour their reconciliation. Melvil says in his Memoirs, that in his Conferences with the Earl of Suffex, he found the Earl had orders indeed to favour the King's Party, but would not quite discourage the Queen's (4). He infers that his chief aim was to continue the troubles in Scotland, which is very likely.

The English Army entering Scotland in April, ravaged the lands of the Scots and Garri, and of those who were concerned in the late insurrection into England (5). Camden says, in this expedition were burnt about three hundred Houses, and about fifty Castles. Melvil adds, the Earl of Suffex assaulted and took the Castles of Hume and Pals, belonging to the Lord Hume, to oblige him, who had hitherto remained in a state of neutrality, to declare for Mary's Party, left the balance should incline too much to the King's side. This conjecture is grounded upon the project formed by the Queen's faction, to unite all Scotland, and upon Elizabeth's interest to prevent such an union.

The beginning of May, the States summoned in the King's name, met at Edinburgh. Their first care was to depute Robert Pitcairn to Elizabeth, to bespeak her favour, and acquaint her, they were ready to chuse a Regent to her liking.

Whilst Pitcairn was on his way, Mary's Adherents besieged the Castle of Glynn, where a braver defence than was expected. The Earl of Suffex, having notice of this, sent Sir John Hume, Drury, and a thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse. At their approach, the Besiegers retired, and dispersed themselves in the Mountains. Mean while, Drury being joined by a body of Scotch Royalists, ravaged the lands of the Hamiltons, and took the Castle of that name, belonging to the Duke of Chateaufort.

In the mean time, Pitcairn returning from England, reported to the States, that Elizabeth thought it very strange, that since Murray's death she had not been informed of the posture of affairs in Scotland; that her ignorance in that respect had kept her in suspense, concerning the course she was to take. That at length, tired with continual solicitations, she had consented, that a conference should be held between the two Parties, wherein she was very willing to act as a Mediator, provided they would both refrain from violent methods, and leave things as they were: That she desired therefore the States to observe this condition, and defer the election of a Regent till the success of the Conference should be known. This demand very much embarrassed the States. They could remain no longer without a head, and yet, durst not disoblige the Queen of England, who alone was able to support them. Wherefore they resolved to elect an Inter-Rex, who could be revoked without any consequence, and the choice fell upon the Earl of Lenex, then in England. Shortly after, they received a Letter from Elizabeth, acquainting them with her consent, that they might chuse a Regent, and recommending to them the Earl of Lenex, who was instantly chosen.

Mean while, the Earl of Huntley receiving from Spain Money and Ammunition, took the field, and stored the Castle of Brechin. Shortly after, the Earl of Lenex arrived in Scotland, and when the States broke up, resolved to recover that Castle which was of so great importance. He assembled for that purpose his Forces at Linlithgow, and demanded Artillery and Ammunition of Grange, Governor of the Castle of Edinburgh, who refused them, on pretence he would not be instrumental in shedding the blood of his Countrymen. Grange was properly of the Queen's Party, but had other views than the rest of her Friends. His project was to set himself at the head of a third Party, with which he pretended the other two should join, to restore the Queen to the Crown upon certain Terms. This was the cause of his ruin, as will hereafter appear. Sir James Melvil, Author of the Memoirs so often quoted, was in the same sentiments, as he discovers in several places, but probably waited for a more favourable opportunity to declare.

Grange's refusal hindered not the Return from Brechin, but the Earl of Brechin, and compelling the Earl of Huntley to fly to the mountains, where it was not easy to pursue him. Not long after, the Queen's Party obtained a Truce (6), at Queen Elizabeth's instance, who sought death of her first Husband, she had never ceased holding Intelligence in England, to try to excite the English to rebellion. This is what very evidently appears in Melvil's Memoirs. Her misfortune to fall into the hands of Elizabeth did not make her discontinue her practices. On the other hand, the project of her marriage with the Duke of Northumberland's Conspiracy, and the Correspondence of her adherents with foreign Courts, tended only to raise her to the Throne of England, even in Queen Elizabeth's Life-time. In short, it was manifest, the Pope, the King of Spain, the Princes of Lorraine, the English Catholics, all the Irish, and part of the Scots, were labouring to accomplish this design. How imprudent would it have been to release her, that she might the better prosecute her pretensions? It is true, after the death of Francis II. she quitted the Title of Queen of England, and protested, she claimed not the Crown of England till after Elizabeth's and her posterity. But, that a bare Protestation may serve for efficacy, the sincerity of the Person protesting must be first well-established. Here was quite the contrary, all Mary's Proceedings having shewn the destined not from her claim. So her bare Protestation was only her word, on which it was very dangerous to rely. Certainly Mary was unhappy only in having too zealous Adherents, who, by all their proceedings, pushed her continually towards her destruction. But in no wonder. They acted not for her sake, but for their own ends, and the Interest of the Romish Religion, to which she served for pretence. Sir James Melvil, who was not Mary's Enemy, observes in his Memoirs, that both parties equally hurt her, the one in acting directly against her, the other in serving her with too much zeal. He adds, the Queen's Party groundlessly flattered themselves with ruining their Adversaries, who were supported by England. The reason he gives is very strong, namely, there was no likelihood that the Queen's party would ever receive great assistance from the Court of France, which dreaded nothing so much as to see the two Crowns of England and Scotland upon the same head. He relates upon this occasion a particular, which may be of great Service to discover the situation of Mary's affairs. Sir Robert Melvil, at his return from his Embassy to England, gave Queen Mary a Paper, signed by five and twenty English Barons and Lords, promising to set her on the Throne of England. Mary sent the Paper to the Cardinal of Lorraine, her Uncle, desiring a verbal assistance necessary to execute that design. But the Cardinal himself dissuaded Queen Catherine de Medici from thinking of such an Enterprize, demonstrating the prejudice France would receive by the Union of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland. Nay, to hinder the thing from being effected by other means, they gave notice thereof to Queen Elizabeth, who always feigned Ignorance of what she was told by the Court of France. Melvil affirms, he had this from the Queen of Scots own mouth, at a time when she was dissatisfied with the Cardinal. It is evident then, that the eagerness of Mary's friends was prejudicial to her. But especially they who continued the war in Scotland, only helped to secure Elizabeth's affairs, who thereby was sheltered from the quarter she had most to fear, whereas the Scots, by their Union, would have been more considerable, and doubtless, Elizabeth would have had more confidence for her Prisoner. Upon this Principle it was that Grange and Melvil laboured to procure an Agreement between the two parties, wherein they endeavoured to serve Mary effectually. But it was not easy to bring passionate Men, to sacrifice their Passions and Interests to the good of the publick. The Council of England improving their Disposition, never ceased fomenting the troubles of Scotland, under colour of assisting them, till it should be Elizabeth's Interest to end them. This Melvil plainly shews in his Memoirs; but it would be too long to allege the proofs. Thus Mary was in a wretched condition, by the 11 Councils which were given her, and which she was so unwise as to follow with ardor. The Bishop of Ross, her Agent at London, a great zealot for his Religion, but whose views were not very extensive, did her infinite damage by his passion and pains to cherish the discontent of the English Catholics. As Elizabeth had good Spies, she was not ignorant that this pretended Ambassador was concerned in all the Plots laid against her, from whence she could not but infer, that he acted agreeably to his Mistress's Inclinations and Orders. As soon as this Prelate had the Articles proposed to Mary, he sent Copies to the Pope, to the Kings of France and Spain, to the Duke of Savoy, intimating to all these Potentates, that Mary would be at length constrained to accept them, if some vigorous Effort were not made in her favour. But his Solicitations were fruitless. The King of Spain being then employed in his Marriage with Ann of Austria his Niece (1), Daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, left to the Duke of Alva, the care of assisting the Queen of Scots. But the Duke was himself employed in the Netherlands. The City of Brussels refusing to pay the hundredth Penny, Gallows were now prepared to punish the disobedient, when he heard the Prince of Orange was levying an Army in Germany. So, instead of aiding the Queen of Scots, he was preparing for the war, which he saw ready to kindle in the Low-Countries, and wherein, probably, he would have to deal with the Inhabitants of these Provinces, as well as the Germans.

As for the Court of France, besides that they never really intended to set the Crown of England on the head of the Queen of Scots, but only to create Elizabeth troubles, they began to form projects, which suffered them not openly to espouse Mary's Cause. Though the King had gained several Victories over the Huguenots, he saw with grief there was no end of the affair, and that these people chusing rather to die with their swords in their hands, than at the stake, or the gallows, it would be very difficult to destroy them by open force. He resolved therefore, in order to attain his ends more easily, to amule them with a Peace, which he granted them in August this year. From that time his sole care was to dissemble his Sentiments, and make them believe they had nothing more to fear from him. To convince them the better that the design of extirpating them was entirely relinquished, Catherine de Medici proposed a Marriage between the King her Son and Elizabeth, who replied in two words, that he was too Great and too Little. This project failing, Catherine proposed her second Son the Duke of Anjou, as a more suitable match. This was therefore no favorable juncture for the Queen of Scots, since the Court of France could undertake nothing openly in her behalf, without breaking their own measures (2).

Secretary Cecil was created Baron of Burleigh the beginning of the year 1571. No Man had better deserved than he to receive this Mark of Distinction, which was very considerable in the reign of a Queen, who conferred Honours with great circumspection.

I have several times observed, that Elizabeth was resolved not to declare publicly for either of the Scotch Factions, but to prolong the Negotiation as much as possible, that she might never want a pretence to detain Mary in prison. We are going to see an effect of this resolution in the course she pursued during the year 1571. Though in June the last year, she had agreed to a Conference between the two parties, of which she was to be Mediatrice, six months were passed, and nothing more said of it. At last, Elizabeth resolving to negotiate her Marriage with the Duke of Anjou, did not question, but on that occasion, the French Court would strongly solicit her in behalf of the Queen of Scots. To be provided therefore with an evasion, she caused at length the Conference to be held in the months of February and March, that she might be able to say to the King of France, the affair of the Queen of Scots was upon terms of agreement, fully bent however to manage it so, that the Conference should be without effect.

The Earl of Morton, Pitcairn, and others (3), were sent from Scotland to the Conference, which was to be held at London to maintain the King's Cause. For Mary appeared the Bishops of Ross and Galloway, with the Lord Falkland, Livingston, and the Queen appointed seven of her Privy Counsellors (4) to hear the reasons of both parties. They immediately required the Earl of Morton, and his Col- leagues, to declare plainly the Inducement of the Scots to depose their Queen, and give the Crown to the Prince her Son. The Scotch Deputies delivered a large Remonstrance in writing, wherein they took for granted, that the Queen was privy to the King her Husband's death, and afterwards married the Earl of Bothwell the murderer: That to justify their conduct with regard to the Queen, there were two points to be examined, the one of Fact, the other of Right. For the first, they stood to the proofs given by the Earl of Murray at Hampton-Court before the English Commissioners, and which the Queen of England had in her hands: That the Earl had so evidently proved Mary guilty of the Crime laid to her charge, that they thought it needless to repeat the same things, which besides they could not without great reluctance. As to the point of Right, which consisted in knowing, whether the 1571. Scots had power to depose their Sovereigns when they became unworthy of the Throne, they maintained, it was an undoubted Right enjoyed by the Scotch Nation, ever since the beginning of their Monarchy. They supported this Principle with divers Instances drawn from the History of Scotland, and of other Countries, as Spain and Denmark.

Elizabeth still pursuing her Scheme, not to declare herself, briefly answered to the Scots Remonstrance, which was communicated to her, that she was not thoroughly convinced of the Justice of their Proceedings, and desired them to confer with her Ministers, in order to find some Expedient to adjust this affair. But they replied, it was needless to search for Expedients, since they had no power to agree to the diminution of the King's Authority. Whereupon, Elizabeth ordered a thing to be proposed to Mary's Agents, which the knew they would not accept, and this was, to give her the chief Lords of their Party in Holgate, with some Places in Scotland (1). And indeed they boldly rejected it, and made other offers which the English Commissioners rejected in their turn. At last, they demanded of the Scots, to give the young King of Scotland in Holgate to the Queen; to which they answered, they had not power to promise any such thing. Camden says here, that Mary's Agents made a Jest of this Evasion, affirming, the Deputies wanted not power, since the same Crime renders all the Complices equal.

At last, Elizabeth admitting the Scotch Deputies to an Audience, agreed with them, that the affair could not be determined but by the States of the Kingdom. Then, she desired them to order it so, that another Conference should be held in Scotland during the Session of the Parliament, which was to meet in May. She detained them however some time longer, being willing to know, before their departure, whether the Queen of Scots would consent to the Conference. But, so far was she from agreeing to it, that she complained very much of her Deputies suffering her Right to be called in question, and revoked their Powers. She ordered however the Bishop of Ros to refuse still at London, as her Ambassador. This gave Elizabeth great suspicion, being sensible the Bishop was the chief promoter of the Plots against her; but she durst not refuse him, for fear of giving occasion to say, she did not own Mary for Queen, and thereby wound her pretended Impartiality. At length, the Scotch Deputies departed the 8th of April, after a six weeks stay in London to no purpose. Wherefore it was not Elizabeth's Intention that this Conference should produce an agreement. Though this did not evidently appear in her whole Conduct, it might easily be seen in a Letter of Cecil to Walsingham, then Ambassador in France, wherein he told him plainly, that the sole aim, in that Conference, was to gain time. Another Letter to Walsingham from the Earl of Leicester about the same things, manifestly discovers Elizabeth's policy. The Earl told him, the Queen agreed, that Mary was unworthy to sway the Scepter, but could hardly believe her Subjects had power to depose her. That therefore she remained in suspense, not being able to determine either to restore Queen Mary, or defend the Cause of the Scots, because she did not think it entirely just. During this pretended uncertainty, Mary remained still in prison.

The Truce between the two Scotch Factions being expired, during the Conference at London, or shortly after, the Earl of Lenox took the Town of Dunbarton by surprise, which had till then been in the hands of the Queen's Adherents. Vrac the French Ambassador was taken there, and sent to St. Andrew's, from whence he was readily suffered to make his escape. But the case was otherwise with [James Hamilton] Archbishop of St. Andrew's, who being also taken Prisoner upon the same occasion, and sent to Sterling, was condemned to be hanged. He was accused of being a complice in the murder of the late King, by a Priest (2), who was brought face to face, of whom, instead of defending himself, he demanded, what those Priests deserved who revealed the Secrets of Confessions? 'Tis said, Cardan going to Scotland to cure him of a Dropsy, told him, when he had restored him to health, that he had, by the help of his Medicines, freed him from the present danger, but it was not in his power to prevent his dying on the Gallows.

Elizabeth was not wholly taken up with the affairs of Scotland. There was another which gave her no less trouble, by reason of its difficulties, and the consequences it might be attended with. Her Ministers, knowing her Enemies were in perpetual motion, and when one Plot failed, were immediately forming another, were afraid her prudence would in the end be defeated. In Walsingham's Negotiations, there is a Letter from the Secretary of State, telling him, that whilst the affair of the Queen of Scots was in hand, her friends were thinking of carrying her away, of which the Court had some dark Intimations. The Earl of Leicester wrote to the same Ambassador, that Mary's Adherents were more bold than ever, which, in all appearance, proceeded from their hopes of the success of some fresh attempt. The Ministers therefore believed, nothing but a Marriage could secure the Queen from so many Conspiracies which were daily renewed. An Alliance with some powerful Prince would naturally produce a good effect, by reason of the Succours which might be thence received upon occasion, besides that it would strike a dread into the Queen's Enemies. On the other hand, they imagined, if it pleased God to bless the Marriage, the birth of a Prince would deprive the Queen of Scots of great part of her Adherents. Wherefore, they never ceased to represent to Elizabeth, the reasons which ought to determine her to marry. At last, whether she yielded to these reasons, or to be freed from their Importunities, she told them, that nothing hindered her but the difficulty of finding a suitable match. And indeed, it was not easy to make a fit choice. She must take either a Protestant or a Popish Prince. But as two principal Inducements prompted her to marry, namely, to make a strong Alliance, and to have a Successor; in chusing a Protestant, the first of these Inducements would not be answered, because there was no Prince of the Reformed Religion, whose Alliance could be very advantageous to England. In resolving upon a Catholic, there was no choice, since the Duke of Anjou, the King of France's Brother, was the only fit person. But this project had its difficulties. The Queen gave to understand, that in marrying she did not mean to give herself a master, or even an equal, since she was resolved to hold the reins of the Government alone, and communicate to her Spouse the external Honours of Royalty only. In the second place, she did not pretend the English Catholics should reap any advantage from her Marriage with a Prince of their Religion. But there was no likelihood, the Duke of Anjou would submit to what the Queen desired, or dissemble his Religion, to enjoy the bare Title of King, which was not sufficient to satisfy his Ambition. Mean while, the Ministers were so urgent with the Queen to marry, that at length they obtained her consent to treat with France upon that subject. But very probably, she gave her consent, only because she imagined it would be in her power to break off the Negotiation whenever she pleased, by the difficulties she should start. She concealed her Sentiments however from her Ministers. Burleigh thought her sincere for some time. The Earl of Leicester was not entirely of that opinion, but knew not what to think. Be this as it will, the Queen was told, that Catherine de Medici, having plainly perceived the reasons which moved her to reject the proposal of a Marriage with Charles IX., had intimated, that the Duke of Anjou would be more proper for her. It was also hinted to her, that the young Prince was by no means a Bigot, and might possibly be brought to communicate with the Church of England. The only thing therefore, was so to manage it, that the French Court should make the first advances, after which, the Treaty might begin. To that end it was, that in August 1570, Norris was recalled from his Embassy in France, to make room for Sir Francis Walsingham, who was doubtless thought more proper to manage this affair, being also a Creature of the Lord Burleigh, who was extremely desirous of the Marriage.

Walsingham stayed all the rest of the year, and part of the next at Paris, without any overture being made, and yet the marriage was much talked of. He informed the Court of England of it, and presently after received Instructions from Burleigh, importing, that if any person of distinction should speak to him of the marriage, he might answer, that upon the report, he had taken care to inquire how the Queen stood inclined in that respect, and found, as the Good of her People was her chief view, she had resolved to marry, if she could meet with a suitable match. Shortly after, the Lord Buckhurst being sent to Paris (3), as Ambassador extraordinary, King Charles, and his Mother Queen Catherine, opened their minds to him upon that subject, and a negotiation was begun. But as this Project was not executed, I shall content my self, without descending to particulars, to show here the real causes of the breaking off the negotiation.

It is almost certain, neither Elizabeth nor the Court of France had any desire to conclude this marriage, tho' it seemed to be seriously negotiated on both sides. Elizabeth found a double advantage in this feigned negotiation. First she amused her own Ministers, who pressed her earnestly to marry. Secondly, her Enemies believing this marriage was really going to be concluded, would of course remain quiet. And indeed, it was not likely they should think of attacking her, when they saw her upon the point of being strictly united with France. It was requisite therefore, the better to amuse those who might have formed Plots against her, to show some earnestness for this marriage, least, if she acted with indifference in this affair, her most secret thoughts should be discovered.

On the other side, the Court of France proposed the marriage only to amuse Elizabeth, and with her all the Protestants of Europe, but particularly the Huguenots. In all likelihood, Charles IX. had now formed the barbarous Plot which broke out the next year. But this was only the beginning of a greater project, which was to destroy all the Protestants in general, and suddenly attack Elizabeth herself. The Pope and King of Spain were engaged in the design, and pretended to be alarmed at what was negotiating at Paris, to enquire the more easily those they intended to surprise. Wherefore, it was necessary for the Court of France to appear very desirous of the Match, and to yield as far as possible, but without concluding any thing in point of Religion. So the difficulties started by Elizabeth in this negotiation, were extremely subservient to the designs of the French, as they gave them room to make advances capable of deceiving the Publick, and causing it to be thought they had no ill design against the Protestant Religion. By this means they removed all sorts of suspicion both from the Court of England and the Huguenots. Indeed, it was hardly possible to conjecture, that when the King and his Mother testified such a zeal to accomplish the proposed Marriage, they were thinking of extirpating all the Huguenots in the Kingdom. Nay, they were extremely careful to take away this suspicion by their great dissimulation towards them, pretending to lend an ear to the Leaders of the Huguenots, and place entire confidence in them. But notwithstanding all their care to conceal their designs, the French Court made Elizabeth very jealous during the whole negotiation, by their pressing and repeated instances for the Queen of Scots liberty. Elizabeth could not understand this way of proceeding. The King of France, as she thought, having proposed the Marriage with the Duke of Anjou, and a strict Alliance between the two Crowns, should have been entirely in her interest, whereas she saw him concerned for Mary's, which was directly contrary. Nay, she discovered at that time, that France privately favoured Mary's projects, which could not be reconciled with the design of the Marriage and Alliance. For this reason she frequently intimated to the King and his Mother, that she was offended at their conduct. But she was answered with Protections of friendship, esteem, and regard, and with excuses, that Mary being Queen Dowager of France, less could not be done than to solicit in her behalf. Charles did not even scruple to own privately, that what he did was only for form's sake, that he might not appear entirely to forsake the unfortunate Queen. Perhaps it will be thought strange, that Charles should not carry his dissimulation so far as to declare openly, he would not concern himself any more about Mary; but this Policy would have spoiled all. The design of the league of Religion was to extirpate the Huguenots at once, that being freed from the fear of any diversion in France, the Catholics might carry their Arms into England. If therefore Mary's Restoration to the Throne of Scotland could have been obtained, whether by Treaty or Solicitation, or any other way, England might have been invaded with much greater ease, whilst insurrections were raised within the Kingdom. This was the scheme which had been formed from the beginning of Elizabeth's Reign. To invade England by Sea, would necessarily have been very expensive, besides that such an undertaking was liable to greater inconveniences, as Philip II. afterwards experienced. Scotland therefore alone could afford a passage, but to that end the Kingdom was to be governed by Persons well affected to the Catholic Religion. This was the aim of all the intrigues, publick and private, for the Queen of Scots Restoration. I am persuaded that they who have intimated, that compassion for Queen Mary made her Friends act for her, had no just Idea of the incessant and extraordinary pains in her favour. I do not however deny, that among those who served her, some acted from that motive: But that was not the thought of those who managed affairs. In the intention of those, Mary's Restoration was only a means to execute greater projects.

It is therefore certain, the Court of France never seriously thought of concluding the Marriage, and in all appearance, the Queen herself was as little inclined to it, though her Ministers did all they could to persuade her. As she had declared at first by Walsingham, that she would not allow the Duke of Anjou the exercise of his Religion, the Court of France imagined there would be no great danger in making some advances with respect to that point, since they were almost sure of finding in it an occasion of rupture, as well as a continual pretence to prolong the Treaty as they pleased. The Duke of Anjou came therefore by degrees to be satisfied with a little Chapel in some private corner of the Palace, and the French Ambassador had orders to protest, that the Duke could not be contented with less, and to demand a positive answer in ten days. Hitherto the Queen had refused to agree, that the Duke should have the exercise of his Religion at all, nay, had pretended, he should accompany her when she went to Chapel, and be present at Divine Service. The business then was to answer the Duke's Proposal, which probably was to be the last. But whilst she was deliberating, the French Ambassador showed to some Person of distinction at Court, Letters from Paris, whereby it appeared, the Court of France did not insist upon that Article so strenuously as some would have insinuated. On the other hand, the Lord Burleigh was informed by a Frenchman of note, that if the Queen stood her ground, the Court of France would give way in the end. Moreover Walsingham writ from Paris, that the Duke of Montmorncy had given his opinion in Council, that it would be best not to mention Religion at all in the Treaty of Marriage, which was the same thing as leaving this Article entirely to the Queen. All these insinuations were so many snares laid for the Queen by the Court of France, to induce her to refuse a thing which seemed so reasonable, and that it might appear the rupture proceeded not from the Duke. She satisfied herself to be surprized, and in her answer defied not from her pretensions.

Elizabeth's obstinacy convincing the King of France, he might venture to proceed one step farther, he offered to leave this Article of Religion undetermined. But Elizabeth would not agree to it, saying, it would be an intollible means to sow discord between her and her Spouse. In short, the Court of France went so far, as to be satisfied with the Queen's promise in writing, that the Duke of Anjou should not be prosecuted according to the Laws of England, if he secretly exercised his Religion in a private Chapel. Whereupon Elizabeth, with great difficulty, agreed at length to this:

That if the Duke of Anjou would promise to accompany the Queen when she went to Chapel, and would not refuse to hear and learn the Principles of the Church of England, she would agree, that neither himself nor his Family, should be compelled against their Conscience to conform to the English Church, till they should be otherwise persuaded. Moreover, that neither himself nor his Domesticks, the number of whom should be agreed upon, should be disturbed in the use of any Rites and Ceremonies different from those established by Law, provided they were not repugnant to the word of God, and on condition it were done in a private place, for the satisfying their Consciences, and so as the people might not take occasion from thence to violate the established Laws of the Land. It was with much difficulty that the French Ambassador got the Term, repugnant to the word of God, to be changed into these, repugnant to the Church of God.

It is easy to perceive, that when Elizabeth seemed to relax a little on this Article, she added restrictions which required explication, and which left a door to go back, in case she had been taken at her word. Hence therefore it may be inferred, that she did insist so much upon the Article of Religion, only because she thought it serviceable to break off the Negotiation. Accordingly we find in Walsingham's Memoirs, that the Earl of Leicester, and the Lord Burleigh, were convinced at last, she had no mind to marry.

The affair standing thus, Charles IX. told the Queen, by La Moine Fenclos his Ambassador, that he thought her answer very hard, and desired her to send some trusty person to settle with him every thing relating to the Marriage. Elizabeth replied, she could not proceed to any other Article, without knowing first, whether the King and Duke intended to allow what she had proposed, with respect to Religion. So, the business stopped there. Charles still feigned to expect the trusty person he had demanded, and the Queen pretended the said for the Court of France's consent to the Article concerning Religion, as she had sent it. This Negotiation lasted from March till September, and the rupture altered not the good understanding between the two Courts. On the contrary, Charles thanked the Queen for dealing so freely with him, and without saying any more of the Marriage, desired to make a defensive League with her. Elizabeth readily consented. As she had no Ally, it was her interest to unite with France, as well to disengage that Crown from the Queen of Scots Interest, as to discourage the Pope, the King of Spain, and the English Catholics, by this Alliance. But she knew not that Charles's aim was only to amuse both her and the Huguenots, whose destruction was determined, though he affected to care, and make use of, them, to execute his pretended projects against Spain.

1571. However this be, Elizabeth sent Secretary Smith into France, to negotiate the League jointly with Walsingham.

Mary turns to Spain.

She employs Ridelpho the Bishop of Rols. Lesley's Negotiat. Camden. Thuanus.

Whilst the Queen's Marriage with the Duke of Anjou was treating at Paris, and both sides affected to publish, it would soon be concluded, the Queen of Scots was in a grievous condition, because she plainly saw she was going to lose France. This obliged her without doubt, to turn towards Spain, and try to obtain from thence the assistance she wanted. To that purpose, she dispatched Ridelpho to the Pope, and King of Spain, to inform them of the state of her affairs. At the same time she wrote to the Duke of Norfolk, and sent him in cypher the copy of her Letters to Rome and Madrid, recommending to him Ridelpho, as a trusty person, to whom she desired him to give Letters of credit. Upon the receipt of these Letters, the Duke ordered Higford his Secretary, who had the key, to decipher them, and then bid him throw them into the fire. But whether Higford was already gained by the Court, or designed to betray his master, he hid all these papers under a mat in his Bed-chamber.

The Duke of Norfolk is engaged in Mary's interest. Lesley's Negotiat. Camden. Thuanus.

Ridelpho, who was the Pope's private Agent, did all he could to persuade the Duke of Norfolk to undertake the Queen of Scots defence. He represented to him, there were in England many Male-contented, who would be glad to see him at their head, and by that means he might revenge the Injuries he had received, and the long Imprisonment he had endured. He put him in hopes of powerful Succours from the Pope (1), and the King of Spain (2), adding, that in this he would do no wrong to Elizabeth, since it was only to obtain her consent to marry the Queen of Scots, and oblige her to tolerate the Catholic Religion in England. At the same time, the Bishop of Rols frequently told the Duke, by Barker, one of his Confidants, that by the help of his friends, who were very numerous, it would be easy for him to seize the Queen, become master of her person, and detain her in custody, till he had married the Queen of Scots, and provided for the security of the Catholic Religion. But the Duke rejected the Bishop of Rols's project, and even refused to give Ridelpho the Letters of credit, which he desired for the Courts of Rome and Madrid, and for the Duke of Alva. But though all the Duke of Norfolk's proceedings in this affair are not particularly known, 'tis however certain, he engaged in it too far, in expectation of espousing the Queen of Scots. But it cannot well be conceived, how he intended to accomplish his enterprize, or what he designed to do after marrying the Queen of Scots. Nevertheless it is easy to conjecture, that the Pope and the King of Spain, who set Ridelpho, and the Bishop of Rols to work, would never have thought of employing the Duke of Norfolk, if they had not had some assurances from him, that he would comply with their Intentions.

Ridelpho's Letters are partly discovered. Lesley's Negotiat. Camden. Thuanus.

Ridelpho, having conferred with the Pope, and the Duke of Alva, informed one Baily, [a Fleming,] the Queen of Scots Servant, of what he had negotiated, and as this Man was to go into England, gave him several Letters for the Queen of Scots, the Spanish Ambassador, the Bishop of Rols, and the Duke of Norfolk (3). Baily was no sooner landed at Dover, but he was seized. His Packet was taken from him, and sent to the Lord Cobham, Governor of the Cinque-Ports. But the Bishop of Rols being informed of this accident, so artfully managed the Lord Cobham, the Duke of Norfolk's secret friend, that the Letters were changed, and others put in their place, containing nothing criminal, or of moment, which were delivered to the Council. However, Baily was put to the rack, and confessed the true Letters were in the Bishop of Rols's hands. But the Bishop had taken care to send all the Papers which might hurt him, beyond Sea with his Secretary. So nothing was found at his house, and yet he was arrested, and committed to the custody of the Bishop of Ely (4).

The Court discovers Norfolk's designs. Lesley's Negotiat. Camden.

Shortly after, the Court made a new discovery, which proved fatal to the Duke of Norfolk. The French Ambassador intending to distribute some Money in Scotland among the Queen's friends (5), applied to the Duke of Norfolk, who caused him to put it into the hands of Higford and Barker, to deliver it to one Brown [of Shrewsbury] who was to convey it to Louthier and Banister, and these were ordered to send it to the Lord Herrie. Brown, who was not in the secret, receiving the Money well packed up, and finding by the weight it was Gold, whereas he had been told it was Silver, carried it to the Secretary of State. The Packet being opened, there was found a Letter in cypher from La Motte Fendou to Verac the French Ambassador in Scotland. Whereupon Higford, the Duke of Norfolk's Secretary, being arrested, presently confessed, that the Money was returned by the French Ambassador. He discovered likewise where he had hid the Queen of Scots Papers, which the Duke his master had ordered him to decipher and transcribe. This was sufficient to cause the Duke of Norfolk to be apprehended, and sent to the Tower the 7th of September. There was found upon him a long Memorial in cypher, dated the 7th of February this year, wherein the Queen of Scotland told him, she was advised to retire to Spain rather than France, by reason of the Duke of Anjou's Marriage with Elizabeth, which was much talked of. She added, when she should be in Spain, she would feign a desire to marry Don John of Austria; but that the Duke should not be alarmed at it, because she reserved herself for him. Finally, after speaking of Elizabeth in very injurious terms, she desired the Duke to dispatch Ridelpho to Rome with Instructions (6).

Stow. Hollingh. Digges's Annals. p. 159.

The Duke of Norfolk being examined, confessed, that about a year since, he received four Letters in cypher from the Queen of Scots, and had answered them; but said, it was only to thank her for her goodwill, and to persuade her to rely entirely on the Queen. He said farther, that the Bishop of Rols having pressed him to write to the Duke of Alva by Ridelpho, he had refused it, neither would he give him any Instructions about the affair for which he went to Rome. He confessed also, he had helped to convey to Verac, a Letter from the French Ambassador residing at London. As to the Papers he had received from the Queen of Scots by Ridelpho, he said, they were burnt, as he really believed. Then his House was searched, and the Cypher which the Queen of Scots and he used, was found with the Papers hid by the Secretary. Some of the Complices who were apprehended, confessed all they knew, without being put to the rack.

The Duke confesses part of what he is accused of. O. b. 10. 11. Lesley's Negotiat. Camden.

Whilst proofs were collecting against the Duke of Norfolk, in order to form his process, the Council debated on what was to be done with the Bishop of Rols. He assumed the Character of the Queen of Scots Ambassador, and probably, had been acknowledged for such, Elizabeth not having thought proper to deny Mary the Title of Queen, or openly to own she was a Prisoner. So the case being something uncommon, some learned Civilians were consulted upon three queries (7). First, whether an Ambassador, convicted of conspiring against the Prince to whom he is sent, ought to enjoy the privileges of an Ambassador? The Civilians replied, such an Ambassador, by the Law of Nations, forfeits his privileges. Secondly, whether a Prince deposed can give his Minister or Agent the Title of Ambassador? The answer was, the right of sending Ambassadors belonged only to Sovereigns, and a Prince lawfully deposed cannot confer that title. It must be observed, Elizabeth had not owned that Mary was lawfully deposed. Thirdly, whether a Prince who comes into another Prince's Dominions, and is there kept Prisoner, can have an Agent? And whether that Agent may be reputed an Ambassador, though it be notified to him that he shall be no longer acknowledged for such? It was answered, [If such a Prince has not forfeited his Royalty, he may have an Agent; but whether that Agent may be reputed an Ambassador, depended upon the Authority of his Commission. And] a Prince may forbid an Ambassador his Dominions, if he does not keep himself within the bounds of his Office: But however, the privileges of Ambassadors are not to be violated (8).

But Higford, upon his being taken up, discovered to the Council where it was hid, with the Letters. It was thought of Queen Mary's designs, which the Duke of Norfolk imagining Higford had burnt, denied at first every thing that Higford had confessed; but when the Council produced Higford's and others Confessions, together with the Draughts and Letters to the Duke's Face, he was amazed, thinking they had been burnt. But at length, seeing this Defence was little regarded, and Witnesses began to be produced against him, he said, that by an inviolable custom, grown into a Law, the English and Scots could not be Witnesses one against another. Whereupon it was examin'd, whether this custom was to take place any where but on the Borders, especially in a case where the safety of the Queen and Kingdom was concerned. In short, the Bishop was sent to the Tower, and some time after examined (1) upon three and twenty Articles, to each of which he answered in particular: but Camden has not thought fit to give us either the Examination or the Answers. He says only in general, that the Bishop excused the Queen his Mistress, for that being a Prisoner, and in the flower of her age, it was no wonder she should use her endeavours to escape: that the project of her marriage was formed by the advice of several English Lords, some of whom were Privy-Councillors: That indeed the Duke of Norfolk had promised to think no more of the affair: but his promise was not capable of breaking a prior engagement (2): Lastly, He endeavoured to justify his own conduct, for that being an Ambassador, he was obliged to serve the Queen his Mistress to the utmost of his power: Adding, that he proposed the design of seizing the Queen to the Duke of Norfolk, only to try him; and he refused to name the great Men who had promised to assist him in this attempt. But he confessed, that by the orders of the Queen his Mistress, he had consulted the Earl of Arundel, Lumley, Throckmorton, and the Lord Viscount Montague, about the Queen of England's demand, that the King of Scotland should be put into her hands. This is all Camden says of the Bishop of Ross's defence. But it is not unlikely, the fear of death with which he was threatened, made him discover some things which Camden has not been pleased to publish, as will appear in the Sequel.

The Duke of Norfolk's imprisonment making a great noise in France and elsewhere, Elizabeth caused the reasons to be imparted to Charles IX. by Killegrew, whom she sent to Paris to ease Walsingham who was sick. The new Ambassador told the Queen-Mother, that it was now two years since the Queen of Scots, without acquainting his Mistress with it, had designed to marry the Duke of Norfolk, and therefore he was sent to the Tower, without however being deprived of the enjoyment of his estate: That afterwards, the Duke swore to think of that Marriage no more, and the Queen of Scots, both by Letters and Agents, promised the like: That nevertheless they had still continued their Intrigues, as it was easy to prove by their own Letters; and under colour of freeing the Queen of Scots, had projected to set her on the Throne of England, by raising a Rebellion in the Kingdom, and calling in foreign Troops, which evidently appeared by their Letters and the Confessions of their Complices: That the Queen of Scots had expressly ordered her Agents to conceal her designs from the Court of France, because she was entirely devoted to Spain, having even resolved to convey her Son thither, and marry Don John of Austria.

In the present situation of the French Court, Elizabeth's Complaints against the Queen of Scots were not much regarded. But the Parliament of England (3) took the Queen's Interest extremely to heart, and to prevent the dangers to which she was expos'd by these plots, pass'd a very remarkable Act. It was provided, "That if any man should attempt the personal hurt of the Queen, or the depriving her of any part of Sovereignty; raise war, or stir up others to war against her: If any one should dare to give out that another Person has a juster title than she to the Crown; or should say she is an Heretic, Schismatick or Infidel; or should usurp her Right and Title during her Life; or should affirm the Parliament has not power to settle and limit the Succession to the Crown, every such Person should be guilty of High-Treason" (4). It was also enacted, "That whosoever, by Bulls or other Mandates of the Pope, should reconcile any Man to the Church of Rome, and those who should be so reconciled, should be guilty of Treason: That whosoever should relieve such Reconcilers, or should bring into England any Agnus Dei's, Grains, or other things consecrated by the Pope, should incur the penalty of a Præmunire, loss of Goods, and perpetual Imprisonment." It was provided also, "That all the Fugitives should within such a time, under forfeiture of their Estates, return and submit themselves to the Government, and that all the fraudulent Conveyances of their Lands should be void". It was likewise moved, That if for the future the Queen of Scots should be concerned in any Conspiracy, she should be proceeded against by Law, as the Wife of an English Peer. But the Queen hinder'd this Bill from passing, being satisfied with letting her Prisoner see to what she would be expos'd, if she continued her practices (5).

Before we see what followed upon the late discoveries, it will be necessary to run over what pass'd in Scotland, after the Earl of Morton's return. The beginning of May, the Queen's Party became master of Edinburgh, by the assistance of the Laird of Grange, who favoured them, though he pretended to keep the Cattle for the King. This done, the heads of this Party convened the States belonging to their faction, and at the same time, the Earl of Lenox assembled the States of the King's Party in the Suburbs of the same City. These two Assemblies did nothing but mutually condemn each other, and as if they had given one another the word, they resolv'd each apart to meet again in August, the King's Lords at Sterling, and the Queen's at Edinburgh. These resolutions being executed at the time appointed, the Lords at Edinburgh formed the project of carrying away by force the Lords of the contrary Party, who were at Sterling without any precaution. Melvil says, his Friend Grange was the author, contriver, and manager of this enterprize. He would have headed them himself: but his Friends would not suffer him to be expos'd to the danger. This is the same Grange, whom Melvil represents as a neutral Person, and aiming only at the good of his Country. This project was executed with so much conduct and success, that the Regent and the Earl of Morton were presently made Prisoners. In all appearance, few of the King's Lords would have escap'd, had not the victorious Soldiers fallen to plundering. But whilst they were dispers'd about the Town, the Earl of Mar fell out of the Cattle with the Garrison, and compelled them to retire. In the disorder, the Earl of Morton fortunately escap'd, but the Regent was carried away, and murdered on the road in cold blood by one hired to do it, in spite of [David Spence] the Officer who guarded him. A few days after, [John Erskin] Earl of Mar was chosen Regent, to the great mortification of the Earl of Morton, who aspir'd to that dignity, and was supported by the English Ambassador.

To understand the situation of the Affairs of Scotland, it is necessary to consider, that though there seem'd to be but two Parties in the Kingdom, namely, the King's and the Queen's, there were however five, because there were so many different opinions in both, which occasioned that all of the same Party did not tend to the same end. Some were wholly attached to the Queen, and their chief view was to reform the Catholick Religion. Others earnestly adhered to the King's Party and the Protestant Religion. The new Regent, like his Predecessor, was desirous to unite the two Factions, and labour'd to bring all to the obedience of the King, which he hoped to accomplish, by granting to the Queen's Adherents all the favours they could reasonably expect. Grange and his Friends had formed the same design of uniting the two Parties, but in such a manner as that the Kingdom should be governed in the Queen's name. In fine, the Earl of Morton, who was Pensioner to the Court of England, was at the head of a fifth Party, who, though outwardly for the King, fought only to cross those that endeavour'd to unite the two factions. This was properly Elizabeth's Party, or at least the Party she favoured most, though she affect'd a neutral

(4) The Act goes on: And if any one, during the Queen's Life, should by Book written or printed, maintain that any Person is or ought to be the Queen's Heir and Successor, except the natural Issue of her Body, &c. Some looked upon this as too severe, thinking the naming of an Heir would tend to the establishing the Queen of the Nation. But it seems, abundance of Jews were press'd upon the Cause, except the natural Issue of her Body, find, in Law, those Children are called natural which are begotten out of Wedlock. So that Camden says, being then a young Man, he himself often heard People say, that the word natural was inserted into the Act by Lesley, with a design, one time or other, to impose some Balford Son of his upon the English for the Queen's natural Issue. Camden. p. 436.

That no Person shall retain a Benefice with cure, being under the age of twenty one years, or not up a Deacon at least. That none shall be admitted to preach or administer the Sacrament under the age of twenty four years; nor without a Testimony of his honest Life; nor unless he is able to render to the Ordinary an account of his Faith in Latin.

lity. Her Ambassador Randolph, a Man of a great Genius, and very fit for his Office, was the instrument she made use of to strengthen it. Nothing could be more prejudicial to England, than the union of the two Parties which was endeavouring at any rate. It was to be feared, that after this union Queen Mary's Friends would grow too powerful in the Parliament, and procure resolutions destructive of the interests of Elizabeth and England. Thus discord among the Scots was yet for Elizabeth's advantage, till affairs should take another face. But as the Earl of Mar, the new Regent, was not to be managed as she wished, she laid her measures beforehand, to procure the Earl of Morton a Party, capable of being opposed to the Regent if occasion required. Such was the state of the Affairs of Scotland in the year 1571. We must now see what passed in France.

All this year the Court of France used the highest diffimulation to draw the Huguenots into their snares. There were no favours at Court but for them. The King pretended to fear his Brother the Duke of Anjou, and to be displeased with the Gujises, who, as he said, kept him in a shameful captivity. Besides this he made use of two very effectual means to deceive the Admiral. The first was, to feign a real intention to wage war with Spain, and to trust him with the management of it. The second was, to conclude the Marriage of his Sister the Princess Margaret with the King of Navarre. After that, the Admiral and the Huguenots no longer questioned the King's goodwill towards them, especially as they saw him very intent upon the Marriage of the Duke of Anjou with the Queen of England, and as compliant as possible with respect to Religion.

At the same time, the Prince of Orange was striving to put the Netherlands in motion, having resolved to make some attempt, whilst the King of Spain's Arms were employed against the Infidels. The Kings of Sweden and Denmark refusing to assist him, he applied to Elizabeth, who durst not give him assistance, though she was not ignorant of the correspondence held by the Duke of Alva in Scotland and England with Mary's Adherents. She even forbid the Ships of Holland and Zealand, which acted against Spain, to enter her Ports. In this extremity, the Prince of Orange sent his Brother Count Lewis to King Charles IX., who loaded him with caresses, and even imparted to him the false secret of his pretended design to make war upon Philip. But all this was only to deceive him. In the mean time, the Count de la Mark, with four and twenty Ships, did the Spaniards all the damage he could. This was all the Prince of Orange could effect during this year (1).

The 16th of January the Duke of Norfolk was brought to his Trial before the Peers of the Realm (2). His Accusation ran: 1. That he had attempted to deprive the Queen of her Crown and Life, and seize the Throne himself by the help of Foreigners. 2. That, unknown to the Queen, he had treated of a Marriage with the Queen of Scots, though he knew she had usurped the Title and Arms of England. 3. That he had lent her a great Sum of money. 4. That he had supplied with money the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, who were banished the Kingdom, and declared Enemies of their Country. 5. That he had writ to the Pope, the King of Spain, the Duke of Alva, desiring aid to free the Queen of Scots, and restore the Popish Religion in England. 6. Lastly, that he had sent Supplies to the Lord Ferris, and other the Queen's Enemies in Scotland.

It may be said in general, the Duke made a very weak defense to most of these Articles. But it was not easy for him to deny what his own Letters, and the Confessions of his Servants, and Complices proved against him. Besides, an intercepted Letter from the Bishop of Ros in prison, to the Queen of Scots, clearly showed, the Duke had formed pernicious designs against the Government. Camden did not think fit to relate the Contents of the Bishop's Letter. It is probable however, it was very much to the purpose, since the Duke desired to see whether it was the Bishop's own hand. When he was convinced of it by his own eyes, he made the same defence as the Bishop had done, namely, that the testimony of a Scot against an Englishman was not valid. In this they both pretended, without ground, to take advantage of a custom introduced on the borders of the two Kingdoms, where, in cases of depredation, the evidence of one Nation against the other was not admitted, because they were Parties. But this custom was not become so general as to be of service to the Duke in his cause. The strength of his defence was, that his design to marry the Queen of Scots could not be reckoned High-Treason, neither could it be thence inferred, that he intended to seize the Throne. The Queen's Attorney replied, that all the circumstances of the affair, and all the Duke's proceedings, evidently showed, he aimed at something more than barely to marry a deposed and imprisoned Queen, for by the measures he would have taken with the foreign powers, it plainly appeared, that in espousing the Queen of Scots, he designed to assert her claim to the Crown of England. At last, after a long examination, he was condemned by his Peers as guilty of High-Treason: but the Sentence was not executed till June.

In the mean while, the Queen made Walter d'Evereux Earl of Essex. He was defended by the great Grandmother's side from the noble Family of Bouchier, which had long born that title. At the same time the Lord Clement High-Admiral was created Earl of Lincoln, and four new Barons were summoned to the next Parliament (3).

The Parliament hearing, Plots were formed to free the Duke of Norfolk, passed an Act, whereby it was made death to attempt to deliver a Prisoner condemned for High-Treason. By the same Act, it was perpetual imprisonment and forfeiture of Estate, if the Prisoner was only accused of High-Treason, though not condemned (4).

At length, the Queen, after having been long in suspense, signed a Warrant for the execution of the Duke of Norfolk, the 2d of June. He confessed part of his faults, excused himself as to the rest, and in general owned he was justly condemned. But he declared, he never had any thoughts of restoring the Popish Religion in England, and that he died a Protestant (5). He was Son to the Earl of Surrey, beheaded in the latter part of Henry the Eighth's Reign, for quartering the Arms of Edward the Confessor with his own, without the King's licence. All of that Family had firmly adhered to the Catholick Religion, except this Duke who embraced the Protestant in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign. Since he declared that he died in the Reformed Religion, I don't see how his sincerity can justly be questioned. But who can tell how far his ambition might have carried him, if he had found his projects more practicable? At least, it cannot be denied, that they who put him in motion, thought they had reason to rely on him. After all, if any one doubted that the end of this conspiracy was to restore the Popish Religion in England, he might be satisfied by the testimony of Hieronymo Catena, in the life of Pius V. Instead of clearing the Pope, the Author makes him glory in having been the promoter of this design, and in having sent Ridolpho into England to excite the English to rebel against Elizabeth.

Ten days after the Duke of Norfolk's death, Elizabeth sent two Privy-Counsellors to the Queen of Scots (6), not to accuse her criminally, as Camden affirms (7), but to inform her, of what she had been charged with in the Trial of the Duke of Norfolk and his Complices, and to tell her, the Queen would be extremely glad, she could justify herself. It was chiefly to let her know, that her Practices were discovered, and therefore she had been more closely confined and reduced to a smaller number of Domesticks. Elizabeth was also well pleased to let her see, she had good Spies, and knew, that it was not barely to obtain her Liberty, that so many Powers used their Interest for her, but rather to set her on the Throne of England. Wherefore the two Privy-Counsellors represented to her, 1. That she had assumed the Title of Queen of England, and afterwards, refused to ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh, whereby she had engaged to renounce it. 2. That she would have married the Duke of Norfolk without the Queen's knowledge, and there was reason to believe, it was with design to dethrone her, since she would have used foreign Troops to set the Duke free. 3. That she was deeply concerned in the Northern Rebellion. 4. That she had relieved the Rebels in Scotland and Flanders. 5. That she had sent Ridolpho to the Pope and the King of Spain, to solicit them to invade England. 6. That she had received Letters from the Pope, wherein he assured her of his Protection. 7. That she had procured the Pope's Bull, to absolve the Queen's Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance. 8. Lastly, That she had suffered her Agents in foreign parts to sully her publicly, Queen of England. All these facts were but too true; however, as it was not easy to convict her, that she had acted with the intention ascribed to her, she therefore boldly made her defence to this effect:

That if she had taken the Title of Queen of England, it was by command of the King of France her Husband, and she had quitted it after his death; nay, she had declared, and still did declare, she would not claim it so long as Elizabeth or her Children lived: That in desiring to marry the Duke of Norfolk, she had no design to hurt Elizabeth, but rather was of opinion, the Marriage would be advantageous to England: That if she had not renounced the Marriage, it was because she was contracted by the Duke (1). That she thought herself obliged, by conjugal Love, to warn him of the danger, and persuade him to make his escape: That she was accessory to no Rebellion, but on the contrary, was always ready to discover whatever came to her knowledge, if Elizabeth would have vouchsafed to see and hear her: That she had never relieved the English Rebels, but only recommended the Countess of Northumberland to the Duke of Alva: That hearing Ridolpho was in the Pope's favour, she made use of him in concerns now way relating to England: That she had employed no person to free her, but had willingly hearkened to such as offered their Service for that purpose, and with that view had given her Cypher to Raffon and Hall: That the Letters she had received from the Pope, contained only matters of piety and consolation: That she was not the procurer of the Bull, and had only seen a copy of it, which when she had read she threw into the fire: That it was in foreign Parts she filed her Queen of England, the words could not help it: That she had never desired a Lord of the Pope, or the King of Spain, to invade England, but implored their assistance to reduce her to her Kingdom. Lastly, That in case she was to be tried, she desired it might be before the Parliament, as a Princess of the Blood-Royal of England.

These answers show, that Mary did not deny the Facts, but only the intention ascribed to her. But on the other hand, though this intention could not be fully proved, her bare denial was not sufficient to show she never had it, or to efface the suspicions entertained of her. However, as there was no design to bring her to a Trial, the affair rested there; but Elizabeth was still perfwaded, that the end of Mary's and her friends Intrigues, was to dethrone her.

The Negotiation of the defensive League between France and England was still continued at Paris, with great dissimulation on Charles's side. He insisted upon difficulties which ought not to have caused any delay, since his sole aim was to make use of this League to surprize the Huguenots, but this served the better to conceal his designs. He pretended to be much afraid of the power of Spain, and therefore was obliged to join with England. The difficulties of the League consisted in two things. First, Elizabeth required, that both Parties should mutually promise to assist one another, in case either should be attacked, though on account of Religion. But Charles said, he could not admit of that clause, for fear of offending his Subjects, and all the Catholic Powers. He was willing however to agree, that the Article should be expressed in more general Terms, which should have the same meaning, namely, that the two Parties should mutually defend one another, if either was attacked upon any account whatsoever. The English Ambassadors objected, that England feared no attack, but only on account of Religion, whereas France had numberless quarrels with other States, and therefore the condition would not be equal. To remove this difficulty, Charles offered to write to Elizabeth a Letter with his own hand, wherein he would declare, that he understood the cause of Religion to be included in the general clause. But the English not being satisfied with this security, required at least a private Article under the Great Seals of France and England. Whereupon, Charles exclaimed against the Injury done him, in believing him capable of breaking his word, and said, he preferred his Honour to his Life. If English Plenipotentiaries, was so Charles, that he Elizabeth, the Elizabeth was contented with the Charles.

The second difficulty consisted, in that the King of France would positively include the Queen of Scots in the Treaty, to which Elizabeth would thought it very strange, that the King should so heartily espouse the Queen of Scots. Mary was Elizabeth's her utmost endeavours to dethrone her: The design of the League was, to prevent the attacks of their Enemies, and at the same time France earnestly laboured to have the Queen of Scots released, that is, to enable her to execute her designs. Elizabeth could not understand this proceeding, and it gave her great suspicion. However, as she believed the League necessary for her safety, she overlooked many things which gave her cause to mistrust the King of France's sincerity. There was no way found to surmount this difficulty, but by inserting in the Treaty a doubtful clause to this effect, That both Parties shall maintain the present Laws of Scotland. Elizabeth meant the present and actual Government, that of Kingdom, under the King's Authority, and Charles understood the preceding Government, under the Queen of Scots. But withal, he intimated, that he desired those terms, which were capable of a double meaning, to be used, only to avoid the blame of abandoning the Queen of Scots. Elizabeth imagined it a great advantage, not mentioned in the Treaty. These two difficulties being removed, the League was signed at Blois, April 11. The Substance whereof was as follows:

Charles and Elizabeth shall mutually assist one another against all persons who shall attack them under any pretence whatsoever.

The League shall remain in full force till a year after the death of either Party.

The Party of Elizabeth sent an Ambassador to the King of France, with eight Ships of war, manned with twelve hundred Soldiers, the whole at the expense of the Party requiring.

There shall be no Innovations made in Scotland, but both Princes shall endeavour to preserve the Peace of that Kingdom, according to the present Laws, without suffering the arrival of any foreign Troops.

Some time after, Elizabeth sent the Earl of Lincoln into France (2), to see the Treaty sworn; and the Marquis de Montmorency came to London upon the same account. Elizabeth swore to the League the 17th of June, and named the Marquis with the Order of the Garter. Montmorency was at the Court of England, he never ceased strongly to solicit for the Queen of Scots Liberty, to whom this eagerness did more hurt than good. On the other hand, the Queen ordered the Earl of Lincoln to show the King of France the intercepted Letter from the Queen of Scots, to the Duke of Alva, wherein it appeared, that she put herself entirely under the King of Spain's protection. Montmorency would likewise have resumed the affair of the Queen's Marriage with the Duke of Anjou, but did not much insist upon it. Probably, he had no orders to press it very strenuously, considering what happened in France immediately after his return, I mean, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's, wherein Montmorency and all the Huguenots were butchered (3), who had been drawn to Court, under colour of the Nuptials of the King of France, with the Princess Margaret, King Charles's Sister. It is needless to expatiate on this horrible massacre, so universally known. It suffices to observe in a word, it demonstrated to persons of the least penetration, that the Court of France was then the most perfidious in the world.

This massacre threw all the Protestants in Europe into the utmost consternation, especially when they knew it was openly approved of at Rome (4). The Protestant Princes of Germany began to prepare for their defence, believing it was only the beginning of a Combination to destroy their Religion throughout all Christendom, and the Swissers resolved in a Diet, to lend France assistance.

1572. Troops. But the Court of England reflected on it particularly, not questioning, it was an effect of the League of Bayonne, and that the storm would quickly fall upon England. Walsingham, who had expressed so great an esteem for Charles IX., wrote Letter after Letter, to give warning, that he was no longer to be trusted, though he should repeat his protestations of friendship to the Queen, and his assurances punctually to observe the late Treaty (1).

Charles IX. shows great regard for Elizabeth. Negotiat. p. 289, 285, 286, 289. N. g. nat. It was not without reason that Charles still desired to keep fair with Elizabeth. Though he had massacred an infinite number of his Huguenot Subjects, he saw the rest ready to take Arms to free themselves from his barbarity. The City of Rochelle which was as their bulwark, had refused to open her gates to the King's Forces. Some were already in arms in Languedoc, and other Provinces, and probably, Charles was going to enter into a new war, where he would have to deal with desperate people. Apprehensive as he was that Elizabeth would aid the Huguenots with all her Forces, there was no dissimulation but what he practised to divert her from it. When she told him by her Ambassador, that after the late massacre, she could no longer place any confidence in him, he endeavoured to excuse himself in the best manner he could. One while he said, it was done without his knowledge; another while, that he was forced to it, in order to prevent a Conspiracy formed by the Admiral against him, the Queen his Mother, and his Brothers. However, at the very time he showed the greatest desire to live in a good understanding with Elizabeth, he was taking private measures to raise her disturbances both in England and Scotland. After the massacre of St. Bartholomew's, the Pope sent a Legate into France. The Duke of Savoy, a great friend to Spain, was come to Paris, and Charles's pretended dread of Philip's design was entirely vanished. Nay, there was a strict Union between the two Kings. On the other side, Walsingham gave frequent notice, that the Duke of Guise had private Conferences with the Scots, and the Queen Mother frequently sent for the Bishop of Glasgow, Mary's Ambassador, to her house at unreasonable hours. These things were plain indications to Elizabeth and her Council, that the friendship of France was not to be relied on, though it had been earnestly sought.

Elizabeth's mistrust. Ib. p. 289, 285, 288, 290. Affairs being in this situation, it was not easy for the Queen to determine what course she should take. She suspected, some plot was formed against her, but was not sure (2). On one hand, she was afraid, France and Spain were in league against her; but she could not conceive how it was possible for them to agree, their Interests being directly contrary. She considered however, that Charles IX. was governed by the Lorrain Princes, who had different views from his, and who regarded their own private Interest, more than the welfare of France. Besides, an excessive religious zeal might cause him to overlook his true Interest. In this state of uncertainty, she thought it most advisable, to stand upon her guard, and make preparations as if she was to be speedily invaded, and to equal the King of France in dissimulation, letting him know however, it would not be easy to deceive her. So, each playing the hypocrite, never were there so strong and so frequent protestations of friendship between Charles and Elizabeth, as in the first months after the massacre of St. Bartholomew's. Both said, they desired above all things to keep the League inviolably, though Charles had no occasion for Elizabeth's aid, and Elizabeth could no longer depend upon the amity of such an Ally. It was hardly possible for them to love one another. Charles looked upon Elizabeth as the Protectress of the Religion he was endeavouring to extirpate, and Elizabeth could consider him but as a Prince without honour or honesty, and as a sworn enemy to the Religion he professed. Notwithstanding all this, Charles offered to renew the League with a fresh Oath, and proposed a Marriage between Elizabeth and his younger Brother, the Duke of Anjou. In short, to give Elizabeth a sensible mark of his pretended friendship, he desired her to stand Godmother to a Princess his Queen was delivered of in October. Elizabeth answered to the first proposal, that the Treaty of Blais not having been violated on her part, she did not see any necessity to renew it, or swear it again. As to the Marriage of the Duke of Anjou, she expressed herself in such a manner, that she left it undetermined, whether she would accept or refuse it. As to the King's requesting her to be Godmother to the Princess his Daughter, he replied, Charles offers to renew the League, and the Marriage of the Duke of Anjou to Elizabeth. He desires to be Godmother to his Daughter. The Queen's Answer. Walsingham's Negotiat. p. 289, 285, 288, 290. Though her own Subjects, and several foreign Princes dissuaded her from being spiritually allied to a sworn enemy of the Protestant Religion, she was willing however to give him a proof of her desire to preserve their mutual Alliance, as far as lay in her power. Thus, it was all dissimulation on both sides. But I don't know whether Elizabeth can be justified, for not having refused this last Article, in order to show at least her detestation of the deed Charles had lately committed. Be this as it will, all Elizabeth's the rest of the year was spent in reciprocal protestations of a sincere friendship, but withal, in a mutual distrust. Charles was afraid, Elizabeth would assist the Huguenots, and thereby all his measures be broken. Elizabeth had a mind, before she came to any resolution, to see a little farther into the designs of her enemies, and to that purpose it was necessary for her to keep, at least outwardly, some correspondence with King Charles. Mean while the Huguenots knew not what to think of her. They saw themselves upon the brink of destruction, considering the great Forces with which the King was preparing to attack them, and at the same time they saw Elizabeth, who was their sole refuge, stand Godmother to the child of their Persecutor and Executioner. But the interest of the Huguenots was not the thing she had chiefly in view. Her zeal for the Protestant Religion was always subordinate to her private Interest.

The Earl of Northumberland, who, after his being seized in Scotland, had been delivered to the Queen, was beheaded in this juncture, wherein the Queen thought she could not take too many precautions to provide for her safety (3).

I must now mention the affairs of Scotland, to which the Queen had always an eye. The discovery of the Duke of Norfolk's Plot had much weakened Mary's party. Some had forsaken it, and others were ready to do the like. If they still adhered to it, it was only to obtain advantageous terms for quitting it. Grange, Governor of Edinburgh Castle, Lidington, the Lord Hume, Robert Melvil, and some others, who were in the Castle, still affected a sort of neutrality, and a great zeal for the Good of their Country. But they made this Good to consist in a certain union of the two Factions, which should not be prejudicial to the captive Queen. That is, they would have the King's authority to be annulled, and if it could not be agreed, that the State should be governed in the Queen's name, as indeed it was very difficult to gain that point, at least the administration of Affairs should be put in to the hands of a certain number of Regents chosen by the two Parties, without any mention of Queen or King. By this means they would have preserved the Queen's Rights entire, and broken the measures of the contrary Party. Probably, James Melvil Author of the Memoirs was in the same Sentiments, though he desired to be looked upon as neuter, and as such, was employed on both sides, to serve for mediator. The Men of this Party durst not however fully discover their minds; but flattered themselves, that being Masters of Edinburgh Castle, with the help of never so few Succours, they should be able to support their Pretensions. They spent the whole winter of the year 1572 in several Negotiations in France and the Netherlands, to obtain the Succours they wanted. They were made to hope for assistance from both places; but it was only empty promises without any effect. The Court of France durst not pull off the mask for fear of obstructing the grand design which was executed within a few months. For that reason they consented at length that the Queen of Scots should not be mentioned in the Treaty of Blais. They were contented to agree with the English Ambassadors, that the two Crowns should send Plenipotentiaries into Scotland, to adjust the differences between the Scots, or compel them to lay down their arms. And indeed Charles IX. nominated du Crocq, who had been often sent into Scotland, to endeavour this agreement, ordering him to pass through England, and strongly solicit Elizabeth to send the Queen of Scots into France. He gave him moreover certain Instructions, which he was to impart by word of Mouth to the captive Queen. Elizabeth thought this proceeding very extraordinary, just as the Treaty of League was going to be concluded. So, suspecting some mystery in this conduct, she plainly refused du Crocq leave to see Mary, and even to pursue his Journey to Scotland till the League was signed.

A few days after, she made a discovery which much increased her suspicions. The Lord Seaton a Scotchman, who called himself Mary's Ambassador to the Duke of Alva, had taken a journey to Paris, and there held several Conferences with the King and the Queen-Mother. Then, he returned to Brussels, and shortly after departed for Scotland. But the stormy weather compelling him to land at Harwich, he disguised himself like a Sailor, and before it was known who he was, crossed England and came to Edinburgh, where he frequently conferred with Grange, and the other Lords in the Castle. But as he had not been able to carry away his Papers, they were found in the Ship, whereby it was discovered, he had orders to encourage the Lords in the Castle of Edinburgh to hold out, and give them hopes of a speedy assistance. It was also known, he was commissioned some time before by the Scots of the Queen's Party, to tell the Duke of Alva, that with a little aid, it would be easy to carry away the young King, and send him into Spain. In short, Elizabeth heard that Grange and his Companions who had begun to treat of an accommodation with the Earl of Mor, would hear no more of it, since they had seen the Lord Seaton. All this, added to du Græve's influences for the Queen of Scots liberty, and for leave to speak with her, made Elizabeth and her Council judge, this Envoy was not sent into Scotland to appease, but rather to foment, the troubles. This was the more credible, as he had said himself, that his instructions reached no farther than to exhort the Scots to peace. It would therefore have been imprudent to suffer him to confer with Mary, or to pursue his Journey into Scotland.

I observed before, that the Court of England was no less forward than that of France, to perpetuate the troubles of Scotland; and this was true, during the Regency of the Earl of Lenox, because the Queen's Party was then very strong, and it was to be feared the two factions would be united, to the great detriment of England. But after the Duke of Norfolk's death the case was altered. The Queen's Party being considerably weakened, the Council of England thought it time to end the troubles of Scotland, by giving some content to those in the Castle of Edinburgh, in order to induce them to submit to the King, and deliver up the place. To this end, the Earl of Mar, with Elizabeth's consent, had begun with those of the Castle a Negotiation, interrupted by the arrival of the Lord Scaun.

The League between France and England being concluded shortly after, the Earl of Mar thought it a favorable opportunity to resume the Negotiation with those of the Catle, and to that purpose offered them by James Melvil very advantageous Terms. Melvil insinuates, that the Regent's inducement to this accommodation was only to free Scotland from the yoke of the English. He adds further, that Grange scrupling to demand any Terms for restoring Peace to the Kingdom, left it to the Regent's discretion, who privately fwores to the Peace, in the preference of two or three persons only. But Walsingham's Memoirs show that Melvil was not well informed, since this agreement was made with Elizabeth's approbation, and even some Articles were signed, whereof Secretary Smith sent a copy to Walsingham at Paris.

This project was defeated by the death of the Earl of Mar. He went to Edinburgh with design to have this private Treaty approved, and the Earl of Morton was the chief person to be prevailed with to sign it. To this end, he made him a visit at Dalkeith, where he was honourably received, and treated magnificently. But before the Banquet was over (1), he felt himself seized with a violent illness, which hardly suffered him to ride to Edinburgh, where he died (2). Many suspected he was poisoned. However, on the 24th of November, the Earl of Morton was chosen Regent, by the interest of Elizabeth's Friends in Scotland.

Nothing could be more advantageous to Elizabeth, than to see the Regency of Scotland in the hands of a Man who depended upon her, and whom she could manage almost as she pleased. But on the other side, the Court of France, where the Guises then ruled, finding that by the Earl of Morton's promotion, they were going entirely to lose Scotland, resolved to do their utmost to ruin the new Regent, and support those who still held the Scales of Edinburgh. Indeed, that was their only way to have still any influence upon the Kingdom. The Duke of Guise, who managed all every thing, plainly saw, if the Earl of Morton was left unmolested, he would not fail, with the help of the English, to crush the Queen's Party entirely, and shut out the French from Scotland for ever. He resolved therefore to send Verac thither with money to supply the occasions of those in the Castle, under colour of labouring to appease the troubles. But Verac not being ready soon enough, the money was put into the hands of Grange's Brother, who had been sent into France to solicit aid. At the same time, great pains were taken to gain the Earls of Argyle and Arbuthnot, and the Duke of Chateaufort was told, if Grange could hold out till Whitplains, he would be strongly assisted by the Pope, Spain, and France. This was what Walsingham, who had good spies at Paris, had frequently writ to the Court of England. It was therefore no longer Elizabeth's interest to continue discord among the Scots. On the contrary, it was necessary the Queen's faction should be destroyed, before the measures which were taking in France and Flanders could have their effect. We shall see presently that she neglected not her interest.

During all that year, the Queen of Scots and her Adherents relied much upon the Duke of Alva's assistance, and yet, they had nothing to hope from thence. From the beginning of the year to the time of the Massacre of Paris, the Duke had not been employed, that it was not possible for him to think seriously of the Queen of Scots concerns, though he did not want a Good-will to annoy Elizabeth. The Count de la March, whom the Queen had driven from her Ports, for not breaking with Spain, had taken the Brille in Holland, and by that unexpected Blow revived the Courage of those who wished to be freed from the Dominion of the Spaniards. Shortly after, the whole Province of Holland threw off their yoke, and Flushing, with some other Towns in Zealand, followed that example. The Duke of Medina-Celi, sent afterwards from Spain with a Fleet, was defeated by the Confederates, and most of his Ships taken. In a word, whilst the Duke of Alva was employed in reducing the revolted Towns in Holland, the news of the City of Mons being surprized by Count Lewis of Nassau, obliged him to quit Holland in order to attempt the recovery of that Place. Mean while, the Prince of Orange entered the Netherlands at the head of an Army raised in Germany (3). On the other hand, Charles IX. sent the Count of Nassau five thousand Foot and five hundred Horse commanded by Gentili, which were defeated by the Duke of Alva, to whom the King himself had sent notice of the march of this aid, designed only to amuse the Huguenots. The tragedy which was acted in France shortly after, having opened the Prince of Orange's eyes, he was forced to disband his Army, finding the King of France, who promised to help to maintain it, would not keep his word. In the mean time, the Duke of Alva was taken up with the Siege of Mons, which surrendered not till the 19th of September. After the Siege, his Troops under the command of Frederico de Toledo his Son, were employed in taking Zutphen, Naerden, and other Places. Hence it appears, that during the course of this year, the Duke of Alva was not able to send an Army into Scotland, though Mary's Friends were still in hopes of it. Mary's expectation of assistance from Spain was very prejudicial to her, because, when her practices were discovered, Elizabeth was more intent upon ending the troubles of Scotland. Besides, the King of France grew a little cool, when he found Queen Mary threw herself into the arms of the Spaniard (4).

Though Charles IX. and Elizabeth were very jealous of each other, they kept however a strict correspondence, capable of deceiving those who knew not the interests of the two Courts. Nothing passed on both sides but Protections and Assurances of observing inviolably the Treaty of Blis. The beginning of the year 1573 Elizabeth sent [William Somerset] Earl of Worcester to Paris to stand in her stead to the Princes, Charles's Daughter (5), who was named Elizabeth. She had ordered her Ambassador, not to be perfwaded to be present at the Mass in the ceremony of the Baptism, and in case it was insisted upon, to desire the Queen of Navarre to stand in his room.

A little before, Queen Catherine had sent to Elizabeth the Earl of Rais her confidant, to propose once more the marriage of the Duke of Alençon her third Son. But this was not the sole motive of his coming. The Earl had orders to observe what passed in England, where the Earl of Montgomery and some other French Refugees were equipping 1572. a Fleet to relieve Rochelle, which, after a long blockade, was at length besieged in form. The Duke of Anjou commanded at the Siege, having with him the Duke of Alençon his Brother, and all the Catholic Nobles of France. Elizabeth answered concerning the proposal of the Marriage, that she was very willing to begin a Treaty about it, provided the Article of Religion was first settled, else it was in vain to say any more of it.

Complaints of France about the Succession to Rochelle, Wallingh. Negotiated by the Queen. Camden.

About the same time, Montgomery failing to the relief of Rochelle, the French Ambassador complained that he was suffered to depart; and that the English Merchants had supplied the Besieged with Provisions. Answer was made, that the persons who were failed out of the ports of England, were not owned, and carried counterfeit flags, and if they could be taken, should be severely punished. As for the Merchants, they were men who followed their gain where-ever they hoped to find it; and not being able to send their commodities to any other port of France, since the people were left to butcher whom they pleased, it was no wonder, they should send them to Rochelle where they could vend them with safety. Probably, the Court of England had connived at Montgomery's armament, which however had no effect, and at sending provisions to the Rochellers. This was all the assistance she gave the Huguenots in their wretched condition. She had resolved to avoid a breach with the French, whether she hoped to gain them to her interest, or make the world believe there was a greater union between her and King Charles than there was in reality. This was doubtless to render her enemies both at home and abroad less eager to form plots against her.

End of the War in Scotland.

We are going at length to see an end put to the troubles of Scotland. The Earl of Morton the new Regent having good intelligence of what passed at the Court of France, and knowing it was resolved to assist powerfully the Queen's faction, after the taking of Rochelle, believed he ought to improve this interval to prevent their designs. He proposed therefore to Grange by James Melvil, to renew the negotiation begun before the Earl of Morton's death. Grange and his companions made some scruple at first, because they expected the French succours promised them by the Lord Seaton. However, not to give occasion to say, they were entirely against a Peace, and to try to gain time till Whitjuntide, Grange replied, he was willing to accept the same terms as had been offered by the Earl of Mar, provided the Queen's whole party were included in the Treaty. The Regent, who was better informed than Grange imagined, easily judged, this answer tended only to prolong the agreement, by the difficulties of contenting every one. He refused therefore to treat with the whole party; and offered to give Grange and his companions all the satisfaction they could reasonably expect; but his offer was rejected. Whereupon he turned to the Duke of Chateleaur, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, who were not so scrupulous as those of the Castle of Edinburgh. They treated for themselves and dependents, that is, for almost all the rest of the Queen's party, without regarding the concerns of Grange and his associates. They perceived they could no longer rely on the assistance of France; which was too remote, and withal very uncertain, considering the civil war which afflicted that Kingdom. The Treaty which they made with the Regent, assisted by Drury and Killegrew the English Ambassadors, was to this effect:

Camden. p. 448. Spotswood.

That they should submit to the King, and conform to the established Religion. That if any person should violate this article he should be declared a Traitor.

That the sentences pronounced against the Hamiltons and Gordons should be repealed, excepting such however as concerned the murders of the Earls of Murray and Lennox, which should be left to the Queen of England's discretion.

That the Queen of England should bind herself by some public instrument, that the Hamiltons and Gordons should not be prosecuted for the murder of the Earls of Murray and Lennox, without her express consent.

The estates of the Kingdom meeting shortly after, confirmed this agreement by their authority.

As soon as Grange heard of the agreement which was negotiating between the Regent and the heads of the Queen's party, he endeavoured to obstruct it, by offering to surrender the Castle of Edinburgh in six months. But as the Regent was better informed than Grange imagined, it was easy for him to perceive, this offer tended only to gain time, till the French succours should arrive (1). At last, when Grange knew, the heads of the Queen's party were upon the point of signing their Treaty, he offered to deliver the Castle immediately, provided he might put it into the hands of the Earl of Rothel. But the Regent did not think fit to place in that Fortrefs a Governor of Grange's chusing. Besides, all the proceedings of those of the Castle, and the evasions they used to avoid surrendering the place, plainly showed, they were not heartily inclined to an accommodation. So, without farther ceremony, he declared them Traitors, and prepared in good earnest to besiege them. Melvil says upon this occasion, that he knows not what rage possessed the Regent, to desire to have by way of siege a place which was offered to be surrendered voluntarily and instantly (2). It is indeed little probable the Earl of Morton should desire to expose himself to the difficulties of such a siege, if he could otherwise have had the place. But what Melvil ascribes to the Regent's rage, may, with much more likelihood, be imputed to the cavils of those of the Castle, who strove to prolong the time till the promised succours should arrive. In Walsingham's negotiations there are several letters from the Queen, the Lord Burleigh, Secretary Smith, blaming Grange and his companions for their foolish presumption and invincible obstinacy, in attempting alone to continue the troubles in Scotland. Melvil, Grange's intimate friend, gives quite another turn to this affair, and lays the whole blame upon the Regent (3).

Be this as it will, the Earl of Morton having but few Troops, and wanting Artillery and Ammunition, by reason the public Magazine was in the Castle of Edinburgh, applied to Queen Elizabeth. I have already shown, of what consequence it was to England, that the troubles of Scotland should be ended before France could interpose. For this reason, Elizabeth immediately made a Treaty with the Regent, which, among others, contained the following Articles:

Elizabeth shall send to the Regent, Men, Ordnance, and Ammunition, for the besieging the Castle of Edinburgh jointly with the Scots.

No capitulation shall be granted to the Besieged, without the mutual consent of the Regent, and the English General.

If the Castle be taken [by the English] it shall be delivered to the King of Scotland.

The Prisoners, after the taking of the Castle, shall be detained to be proceeded against according to Law, the Queen of England being first acquainted therewith.

Pursuant to this Treaty, Elizabeth ordered Sir William Drury, [Marshall of Berwick] to march into Scotland with fifteen hundred Men, and a train of Artillery, which was a manifest breach of the Treaty of Blis, which ran, That no foreign Troops should be suffered to enter Scotland. But as she had discovered by the Lord Seaton's Papers, that France intended to violate this same Article, she believed doubtless, it would be simplicity to suffer herself to be prevented. However this be, the Castle was invested, and the Besieged defended themselves a whole month like Men in despair. But at last their Water failing, they were forced to surrender at discretion, if we may believe the English and Scots of the King's Party. Melvil affirms on the contrary, that they capitulated, but the Capitulation was not kept. Thus much is certain, the Laird of Grange, James Kirkcaldie his Brother, and some others, were condemned to be hanged, and the Sentence was executed accordingly (4). Lidington died in prison, having himself, according

(1) The following Project was formed between the Court of France and Queen Mary's Party: That the Marquis de Maine should land at Alir, with one thousand Shot, and, after joining the Queen's Party, repair to Edinburgh, where Cathie Lidington and Grange had promised to deliver to the French, and in consideration thereof, were to receive a Pension, or some other Livelihood, in France; after which they were to fortify themselves in Loughborough, Brochty, Dundee, and Armagh. And then the Duke of Guise was to come over with Forces to deliver the Queen of Scots; and at the same time, her Friends in England, who were very numerous, were to rise in Arms, and deliver her in spite of Queen Elizabeth. See Digger's Compl. Ambass. p. 314.

(2) To which he adds, "seeing he might have obtained his intent without the help of England, having all Scotland at his devotion; saving that few numbers without the Castle, who would likewise have agreed upon any reasonable condition." p. 120.

(3) Melvil says, that having told the Regent, Grange, for his honour's sake, was resolved to agree for the whole Party: The Regent answered, He would not agree with all, because then their Faction would be as strong as ever; and besides, as the troubles had occasioned great wrongs and extortions, he chose rather that the Crimes should be laid upon the Hamiltons, &c. because their Estates were greater than those of Grange, and the rest in the Castle, and consequently more Land would discharge to him as the reward of his labours. Melvil telling Grange the Regent's resolution, he insisted upon agreeing with all; and shortly after hearing of it, pretended to like him the better for standing upon his Reputation and Honour, and seemed as if he had been resolved to agree with those in the Castle. He thanked Melvil for the trouble he had been at, desiring him to go home, and in the mean time he would propose the matter to the rest of the Noblemen of his side, who he doubted not, would be very well satisfied with his Proceedings, and then he would send for him again, and put the form of the Agreement in writing. But he took immediately another course, and sent and offered an accommodation to the Hamiltons, &c. who accepted of it as above. Melvil, p. 123—120.

(4) Melvil gives Grange an extraordinary Character. He says he heard Henry II. of France say, (pointing to him) gordon is one of the most valiant Men of our Age. The great Constable of France would never speak to him uncovered. Camden says, a hundred of the Family of the Kirkcaldies, offered to be 1574. Crown to the King of Poland, who was absent. And indeed Charles IX. died the 30th of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his Age. The manner of his Death was so uncommon, that it gave occasion not only to the Protestants but the Catholics themselves, to consider it as an effect of the divine Vengeance, for the horrible massacre committed by his orders. The blood gushed out of all the passages of his Body, and even spouted through his Pores. The Queen-Mother took her measures so well, that causing the dying King to confer on her the Regency of the Kingdom, she kept all quiet till the arrival of the King of Poland, who succeeded his Brother, by the name of Henry III. He arrived in France the 5th of September, but came not to Paris till about the middle of February the next year.

Nothing memorable passed in England during the year 1574, (1). The only thing Camden has remarked in his Annals, is the marriage of Charles Earl of Lenox, Uncle to the King of Scotland, with Elizabeth Cavendish the Countess of Shrewsbury's daughter. As this marriage was made unknown to the Queen, she imprisoned the Mothers of the new-married couple.

In the Netherlands, the Confederates took Middleburgh in Zealand. But on the other hand, Lewis Count of Nassau, who was leading an Army to his brother the Prince of Orange, lost a battle upon Mooker-beach, near Nimeguen, and was himself slain, with his Brother Henry, and Christopher Count Palatine (2). This same year, the Spanish Troops mutinying, surprized and plundered Antwerp, where they made an immense Booty. The Government of the Low-Countries, to avoid greater Mischiefs, was forced to pardon them.

As soon as Henry III. was arrived in France, it was resolved in his Council, to wage war with the Huguenots, though they had given no occasion, and presently after, Hostilities were renewed against them. Mean while, as Henry was afraid, the Queen of England would assist those whom he design'd to extirpate, his first care was to renew with her the League of Blais, after moving the Question to her, whether the mutual Defence against all Men, mentioned in that League, did include the Cause of Religion? Elizabeth answer'd, it did, as she could prove by a letter from the late King which she had by her. Adding, if he were attacked on account of religion, and required her aid in virtue of the Treaty, she should be always ready to give it. Indeed, she ran no great risk in making that offer, being fully perswaded, the French King would not use English Troops against the Huguenots. Besides, by the terms of the League, she was not bound to send him any Troops, since instead of being attacked, he was himself the aggressor. However, Elizabeth's answer to Henry might have given the Huguenots ill notions of her, if he had not privately supplied the Prince of Condé with money to pay the Army, Prince Casimir Count Palatine was levying for them in Switzerland and Germany.

England was pretty quiet during the year 1575. There happened only an accident on the borders of Scotland, where Sir John Forster [Warden of the Middle March] (3), and Carmichael [Warden of Liddesdale in Scotland] holding a Conference, each at the head of a Troop of his own nation, quarrelled and fought. The English were worsted, Sir George Heron [Warden of Tindale] lost his Life, and Forster being taken Prisoner (4), was conducted to the Earl of Morton, who treated him very civilly, but detained him some time, for fear, if he were presently dismissed, he would in his heat attempt a revenge. At last, having released him, he made him promise to appear in Scotland at a set day. Elizabeth thought the Regent of Scotland's proceeding very strange, and at first took this affair very heinously; but Morton found means to appease her, by making all the submissions she was pleased to require. This year died the Duke of Chateleraut (5).

The Year 1576, affords as little matter for the History of England as the foregoing. We find only that the Earl of Essex died in Ireland (6), and the Earl of Leicester privately married his Widow, unknown to the Queen, though he was suspected of having caused the Husband to be poisoned. He was always in the Queen's good Graces, who was so biased in his favour, that no man durst tell her his thoughts. It was one of Queen Elizabeth's greatest failings, to place her esteem upon a Person who so little deserved it (7).

As it is necessary for the sequel of the History to know what passed in the Countries near England, I must make a short digression, not so much to inform the reader of things which are well known, as to refresh his memory. Lewis de Zuniga, Commander of Requesens, and Governor of the Low-Countries, died this year. After his death, the Council of State administered alone the Affairs of the Netherlands till a new Governor should arrive. The Council consisted of Natives and Spaniards. Shortly after, the Spanish Troops happened to mutiny, and resolved to plunder Brussels. The Magistrates alarmed at the danger, applied to the Council of State, who declared the Mutineers Rebels, though several of the Counsellors favoured the seditious. And indeed, presently after, the little town of Alost was sacked, and the Council of State took no care to punish the authors of that outrage, or prevent the like misfortune which threatened the other Towns. For this reason some Lords of Brabant drew together at Brussels a company of the Citizens, and investing the place where the Council of State held their Sessions, expelled such of the Members as were suspected to countenance the Mutineers, and put in their room Persons better affected to the good of their Country. This new Council of State, thus composed, joined the Confederates, who were now in Arms in defence of their Liberties, and they entered together into a League to free themselves from the Spanish Forces. Then Hieronymo de Roda, a Spaniard, one of those who were expelled the Council, headed the Rebels, and sent for the Spanish Troops which were in Holland, with whom the Germans joined. This Body, grown very considerable, plundered Maafricht and Antwerp, without any possibility of preventing them.

The Prince of Orange, who was in Holland, seeing the affairs of the Netherlands reduced to this point, offer'd the Council of State his Troops, his Person, and the assistance of the Provinces of Holland and Zealand, which began to make a separate State, under his Government. Upon this offer the Council of State resolved to enter into Treaty with Holland and Zealand. The Conferences were held at Ghent, where with an unanimous consent, Luxemburg excepted, was formed the union of the Provinces of the Low-Countries, called the Union, or Pacification of Ghent, for the defence of their Law and Liberties. Notwithstanding this, they were still willing to own the King of Spain's authority, provided he would govern according to the antient Laws. This union being thus formed, the Fortresses rais'd by the Duke of Alva to keep the Netherlands in subjection, were demolished every where. Some time after, the Association was sworn by the Clergy and Nobility, solemnly approved by the Council of State, and published at Brussels. By that, Philip II. lost almost all his authority in the Low-Countries, having only the bare title of Sovereign, unless he would confine himself to the Rights enjoy'd by his Predecessors, which was very far from his Thoughts.

France was not more quiet than the Low-Countries. The Duke of Alençon had assembled an Army against the King in favour of the Huguenots. On the other hand, the Prince of Condé, with the Forces levied by Prince Casimir in Germany, entered France and joined the Duke of Alençon. Thus the Huguenots, whom the Court had determin'd to extirpate, were in a condition to sell their lives dear, having at their head the King's Brother, the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé, with an Army of thirty Camden, p. 454. — This year also, on May 17, died the learned Matthew Parker Archbishop of Canterbury.

(6) Being constrained to give over his enterprise in Ireland, he returned into England, having much wasted his Estate, where openly threatening Leicester, when he is said to have a him ill officers, he was by his cunning Courtiers sent back into Ireland, with the insignificant Title of Earl Marshal of Leinster; where grief and sorrow throwing him into a bloody flux, he died Sept. 22. 1576, in the 56th year of his age. Upon which, Leicester putting afterwards doubly married, fell private, and then publicly, for Sir Francis's satisfaction, who married at this private marriage. Camden, p. 455. 457.

(7) This year, the Parliament met, by Proclamation, at Westminster, on February 8, and was prorogued again March 15. The Lords and Commons granted two Petitions and Tenets, and a Subsidy; and the Clergy gave a Subsidy of six Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in three years. See Statute. The Acts n. w. made, were, 1. That all persons which by any means whatsoever import, smuggle, or falsify the Coins of the Realm, shall be guilty of Treason. 2. An 1576. thousand men. But the Queen-Mother had the address to break all their measures. She sent them offers of Peace, and during the negotiation, found means to sow jealousy among them, and win from them the Duke of Alençon and Prince Casimir. In short, she caus'd them to agree to a Peace, which, for all its seeming advantages, proved fatal to them, as it disunited their forces. The Treaty was concluded the 9th of May, and enrolled six months after by the Parliament of Paris. The Huguenots had never obtained so advantageous a Peace since the beginning of the Troubles. In October the Duke of Alençon came to Court, where the Queen his Mother disengaged him entirely from the side of the Huguenots. Then it was that he assumed the Title of Duke of Anjou, borne by the King his Brother before he ascended the Throne.

The Peace was no sooner signed, than, according to the Sincerity some time since professed by the Court of France, they took new measures to ruin the Huguenots. Treaties and Oaths went then for nothing, and were considered only as lawful Snares to surprize Hereticks. The Cardinal of Este the Pope's Legate, and Don John of Austria, who was going to take possession of the Government of the Low-Countries, came to the Court of France, and had several Conferences upon this occasion with the King, the Queen-Mother, and the Duke of Guise. Guise was looked upon as the Head of the Catholic Party, and for that reason, the Legate took with him measures of which the King was not fully inform'd. The most proper means, in their opinion, to attain their end, was to unite several associations, made in divers Provinces by the zealous Catholics, and form one general association against the enemies of the ancient Religion. This is what was called the Holy Union, or simply, the League. Humieres was the first that signed it in Picardy, from whence it spread afterwards over the Kingdom. The Pope was the chief promoter of it, the King of Spain gloried in being called its protector, and the Duke of Guise, who aimed at being declared the head, supported it to the utmost of his power. The Queen-Mother willingly came into it, not from a religious zeal, but because the Huguenots had threatened to call her to an account, for her administration during her Regency. In fine, the King himself, seduced by ill counsels and his own supineness, was carried away with the torrent, and suffered the evil to encrease, which was one day to prove his ruin.

When the late Peace was negotiated, the Huguenots earnestly solicited a general meeting of the States, imagining, besides a great many Deputies of their Religion, they should have for them the Duke of Alençon's party, and many others who were not pleased with the Government. But when the Deputies came to be elected, the Duke of Alençon had now changed sides. Besides, the Court, by intrigues and money, found means to procure a great number of Deputies to be chosen who were against the Huguenots. So, the States meeting at Blais, instead of moving any thing in favour of the Reformed Religion, were going to demand of the King the confirmation of the League, and request him to appoint the Duke of Guise for head. But the King, who was now grown extremely jealous of the Duke of Guise, resolv'd to prevent it. To that end, he declared himself head of the League, and signing it first with his own hand, caus'd the Great Men of his Court to subscribe it, and sent it into the Provinces that every one might do the same. Shortly after, the States having sent to pray him, that he would not allow any Religion in the Kingdom but the Catholic, he answered, it was his intention; and if he was under a necessity of promising the contrary, even with an oath, he would keep his word only till he had forces sufficient to enable him to break it. Thus the Huguenots were forced to defend themselves to the last drop of their blood, without the least hopes of seeing an end to their calamities by a Treaty, since the King himself declared he would never make any with them, but only to deceive them (1).

Don John of Austria came into the Low-Countries the beginning of the year 1577, full of vast projects. He was a Prince of a great genius, and of an ambition futable to his birth. The condition of a Subject was a burden of which he would have been glad to be eased. All his views tended to Sovereignty. His first project was to make himself

King of Tunis: That failing, he thought of marrying the Queen of Scots, and becoming Sovereign of all Great-Britain. Camden affirms, he had this from the mouth of Antonio Perez, who told him moreover, that the project was imparted to Pope Gregory XIII. who approved it, but was concealed from King Philip. This was probably the subject of Don John's conferences at Paris with the Duke of Guise. So, Don John when he arrived in the Low-Countries had two grand designs in his head: First, to subdue the Netherlands entirely; Secondly, to become master of England and Scotland. Elizabeth was not ignorant of the first, but the second was still a secret to her.

The Pacification of Ghent was communicated to the Spanish Court, and Philip giving way to the times, thought proper to confirm it by an edict. So, when Don John of Austria came to the Netherlands, he was forced to sign it before he was owned for Governor. This was followed by an Assembly held at Marche en Famine, where it was resolv'd to publish a perpetual Edict (as they call'd it) for driving the Spanish Troops out of the Low-Countries, pursuant to the Pacification of Ghent. Philip approving also this edict, the Spaniards were sent into Italy, all the places remaining in the hands of the States. Hitherto Don John had been forced to dissemble: But some time after, he took off the mask and surprized the Castle of Namur. At the same time he solicited the German Troops, who were waiting in that Country for their arrears, to surrender the places where they were in garrison. But he was prevented by the States, who found means to gain those Troops before him. The States imputed this rupture to Don John's ambition, and carried their complaints to the King, to whom Don John also writ, that the cabals of the Prince of Orange had constrain'd him to provide for his own safety. Be this as it will, the States of Brabant called the Prince of Orange to their relief, and gave him the superintendency of their Country, by conferring on him the title of Ruart (2). This proceeding rais'd the jealousy of the Duke of Arles, and some other Brabant Lords, who, to ruin the Prince of Orange's credit, propos'd to the united Provinces, the electing a Governor-General, under colour they should all have the same head. The Prince of Orange perceived he was aimed at, but not to give occasion to a fatal division of the forces of the confederates, oppos'd not the election. The choice fell upon the Archduke Matthias, Brother of the Emperor Rodolphus II. and the Prince of Orange was declared his Lieutenant. In the Archduke's Patent however were inserted certain conditions, which, giving him the title and honour of Governor, left the whole authority to the States. This done, Matthias stealing away, as it was pretended, from his Brother the Emperor's Court, came into the Low-Countries, where he was put in possession of his post. Then the States proclaimed war with Don John, who had taken care to be prepared, by sending for Troops from Italy, which were now on their way.

Then, and not before, Elizabeth perceived she must have an eye to what pass'd in the Netherlands, because, at the same time, the Prince of Orange inform'd her of Don John's design to marry the Queen of Scots, and the States sent Ambassadors (3) to desire her assistance. So, finding the designs of the Governor of the Low-Countries reached farther than he imagin'd, he immediately lent the States a hundred thousand Pounds Sterling, which they desired of her (4). Camden speaks here of a Treaty whereby the Queen engag'd to assist the States with a thousand Horse well-mounted, [and five thousand Foot,] on condition the General, or Commander [being an Englishman] should be admitted into the Council of State, and nothing determined without his consent. But Gratius does not mention this Treaty in his Annals of the Low-Countries. He says only, from that time Elizabeth concern'd herself so far with the affairs of the united Provinces, that she did not suffer the States to come to any important resolution without giving her notice (5). Indeed, it was very much her interest to order it so, that the war now beginning in the Low-Countries, should be continued in such a manner, as to disable Don John of Austria to execute his projects upon England. These projects were not the inventions of the Prince of Orange, to engage Elizabeth in the defence of 1577. the Netherlands. Famianus Strada positively mentions them in his History. He even says, Gregory XIII. sent a Nuncio to Don John with the sum of fifty thousand Crowns, to be employed in the expedition projected against England, but that he was forced to use it in his war with the States. Mean while, at the very time Elizabeth lent money to Philip II.'s enemies, she writ to him (1), that she by no means intended to break the ancient Alliance between England and the House of Burgundy: That, on the contrary, she supplied the confederates with money, only to secure these Provinces to him, and hinder them from desperately throwing themselves into the arms of France. It is likely, Philip was not very well pleased with these reasons, but feigned to be so, not to induce Elizabeth to do more.

At this time the affairs of France were in a sad condition. The Transactions of the States at Blais, could not but raise a Civil War in the Kingdom. The Huguenots findings, a resolution was taken to extirpate them, made a Counter-League, whereof the King of Navarre was declared General, and the Prince of Condé appointed for his Lieutenant. The former Edict of Pacification being revoked, as had been resolved by the States, Hostilities were renewed on both sides, but with great disadvantage to the Huguenots, who were very weak. However, as the war gave the Duke of Guise too much credit, of whose power the King was extremely jealous, Henry thought it his interest to grant a Peace to the Huguenots. From thenceforward he plunged himself into pleasures, and lived at so expensive a rate, that he forfeited the love and esteem of his subjects. The Prince of Lorraine knew how to improve the advantages which the King's Conduct procured him, as will hereafter appear (2).

1578. Whilst Elizabeth assisted the Confederates of the Low-Countries, under colour of hindering them from submitting to France, Philip returned this favour, by endeavouring to raise a Rebellion in Ireland. This project was formed some time before, on account of Pope Gregory XIII., who wanted to procure for his Son Jacomo Boncompagni the Crown of that Kingdom. Thomas Stukely, an English Fugitive, was the first author of it, and Philip II. undertook to supply whatever was necessary to accomplish it. In the year 1570, Stukely went to Pius V., and persuaded him, it would be very easy to burn the English Fleet, and then conquer Ireland; and to that purpose he desired the command of some Ships, and three thousand Italians. This project, which could not then be executed, was refused under the Pontificate of Gregory XIII., who was allured with the hopes of procuring the Crown of Ireland for his Bastard Son. As Stukely knew, that, besides the Navy-Royal, Elizabeth could, upon occasion, equip a good number of other Ships, he proposed the freightage of as many English Vessels as possible, by the Flemings, French, Spaniards, Italians, and the sending them some long Voyage. After that, he was to attack the Royal-Navy, which was then very weak, and try to burn the Ships in the several Harbours where they lay. Which done, he intended to make a descent in Ireland, where he did not question the native Irish would join him; and after the expulsion of the English, he was to cause the Pope's Son to be proclaimed King. It is not very likely, Philip II. depended upon the success of this enterprise; but he hoped, no doubt, to cause a diversion, which should hinder Elizabeth from assisting the Rebels of the Low-Countries, or at least, convince her, she ought to pay him more regard. However this be, the Pope, having conferred on Stukely several honorable Titles (3), taken from the Kingdom of Ireland, as if he had been in possession, gave him some Ships, and eight hundred Italian Soldiers, paid by the King of Spain. Stukely sailed from Civita Vecchia, and safely arrived at Lisbon, with intent to pursue his Voyage and Undertaking. But Don Sebastian King of Portugal, being then going into Africa, to make war upon the Moors, persuaded him to accompany him in his Expedition, and obtained Philip's leave. Shortly after, they both perished in the battle of Alcazar, and Philip relinquished the project of conquering Ireland, for that of securing the Crown of Portugal, after the death of the old Cardinal Henry, who succeeded Don Sebastian.

The war commencing in the Netherlands, several Companies of Volunteers were formed in England, who went to serve the States, with the Queen's consent, or at least connivance (4). On the other hand, part of the Spanish Troops, disbanded at the arrival of Don John of Austria, were now returned to the Low-Countries, and moreover, Alexander Farnese, Son of Octavia, had brought Don John a considerable Body of Italians. With these Forces, Don John gained, at Gembours, a signal Victory over the Army of the States, which was followed with the taking of several Places. Some time after, Philip II. offered a Peace to the States, but, as it was upon terms very different from the Pacification of Ghent, and as he did not talk of recalling Don John of Austria, his offer was rejected.

The affairs of the States were however in an ill situation. The jealousies among the great Men, and the diversity of Religions, bred very dangerous troubles in the rising Commonwealth. The Duke of Anjou, and the Prince Casimir, equally offered their assistance to the States, who knew not which way to turn. But at this very time a fortunate and unexpected accident happened. The City of Amsterdam, which hitherto had been for the King, resolved to join the Confederates, and by that considerably strengthened their Party. On the other hand, what passed soon after in the same City, very much increased the suspicion and distrust of the Catholics. They who had been banished on account of Religion, being recalled, found means to expel the Magistrates, and put the Government of the City into the hands of the Reformed. The same thing was done at Haerlem, Utrecht, and other places; and this gave the Catholics reason to suspect, that, under colour of maintaining the cause of Liberty, there was a design to abolish the ancient Religion, contrary to the Pacification of Ghent. And therefore, to prevent the execution of this project, the Catholics proposed to give the Government of the State to the Duke of Anjou, a Prince attached to his Religion, and over whom they hoped the Prince of Orange would not have the same influence, as over Matthias. The Prince of Orange not thinking proper to oppose this motion, for fear of confirming the suspicions of the Catholics, the Duke of Anjou was declared by the States, Protector of the Belgick Liberties.

Mean while, the Reformed fearing, the Duke of Anjou's arrival would produce some change prejudicial to their Religion, presented a petition to the States, desiring to be admitted to the exercise of the publick Offices, as well as the Catholics. This request was granted, on condition the Catholics should enjoy the same Privilege in Holland and Zealand; but these two Provinces, without directly opposing this resolution, found means however to evade the condition annexed. Thence arose great divisions among the Confederates. The Catholics would yield nothing in the Provinces where they were masters, since Holland and Zealand did not perform what was ordained, and the Reformed would seize by force, what was granted them by the States.

Whilst these differences sensibly lessened the Union of the Confederate Provinces, it happened, that the Inhabitants of Ghent expelled the City all the Romish Priests, and without obeying the Archduke, and Prince of Orange, who commanded them to recall them, prepared for their defence, in case they should be compelled to submit. On the other hand, the people of Artois and Haynault refused to suffer the Reformed in their Territories, and even pretended, that the Catholics ought to be reduced to their duty by force. But the Prince of Orange stoutly opposed all violent methods, by reason of the manifest danger of turning the arms of the Confederates against themselves, at a time when Don John of Austria was preparing to do his utmost to destroy them. And indeed, shortly after, he attempted to force the Army of the States, which was strongly intrenched, but was bravely repulsed. This attempt failing contrary to his expectation, he made fresh offers of Peace, to amuse the States, till the arrival of a considerable body of Troops, which were coming to him. For the same reason, the States readily entered into Treaty to gain time, because they expected Prince Casimir with an Army, and the Duke of Anjou, who was now on the borders of Haynault with eight thousand Men. Don John's Succours coming first, he broke off the Negotiation, and renewed the Hostilities, being at the head of thirty thousand Foot, and sixteen thousand Horse. Prince Casimir arriving also presently after, the army of the States was sixty thousand strong, whilst the Duke of Anjou took, in Haynault, the little Town of Binec. Casimir's army was chiefly paid by the Queen, whose interest it was to hinder Don John from growing too powerful in the Netherlands, though, feigning to be ignorant of 1578. Men, it was opened to him, and he entered without opposition. Then, he went directly to the King's Palace, of whose person he became master, and expelling his Enemies, refused the Post he had been obliged to relinquish. The Earl of Arbol, who had been made Chancellor, died shortly after, not without suspicion of being poisoned. We must now return to the affairs of England (1).

Prince Cosmire left not the Court of England till about the middle of February. He had been honoured and caressed in an extraordinary manner, the Queen having shewn, it would be grateful to her to render his stay in England as agreeable as possible. Before his departure she conferred on him the Order of St. George, and put on the Garter herself about his leg (2). It was not without reason that she used him thus civilly. He had still a considerable body of Troops ready to assist the Protestants, and it was no small advantage to her, that she could rely on him, by supplying him with Money. In the present situation of her affairs, nothing deserved her care more, than to hinder the ruin of the Protestants in France and the Netherlands, since on their preservation depended her safety. Cosmire was her Instrument to continue, in the Low-Countries, troubles which made her sleep in peace. When he arrived in the Netherlands, he found his Horse had accepted the Duke of Parma's Pass-port, for their safe return into Germany, because wanting their pay, they would neither serve any longer, nor stay in the Country.

At the same time, the Queen was employed in an affair which required her whole attention: I mean, the negotiation of her Marriage with the Duke of Anjou. Besides Rambouillet and Bacqueville, who had been in England some time upon that account, the King of France had also sent Simé (3), a Man of parts, and very fit for the purpose. Elizabeth had a large share of wit and sense, and was perfectly acquainted with her own Interests; but was not free from all the Passions of her Sex. Simé soon discovering her temper, did not lose his time in soliciting the Duke of Anjou's suit, by reasons of State and Policy: She knew more of that matter than himself. But he so well knew the most proper way to win her heart, that he gained her ear more than the Duke of Anjou would have done himself. All were surprized at the great change they saw in her, and at the progress the Duke of Anjou had made by the help of Simé. Nay, 'twas believed he had used Love-Potions, and other unlawful arts, such was his address to render himself agreeable, if, after all, he was not himself deceived by the Queen. Above all things, he took great care to ruin the Earl of Leicester, not having the same reasons as the English Courtiers, to manage Leicester's clandestine Marriage with the Earl of Essex's Widow, and this discovery put her into such a passion, that she was going to send him to the Tower (4). Leicester was vexed to see himself thus braved by a Foreigner.

'Tis even said, he bribed one of the Guards to assassinate him. It is at least certain, the Queen fearing the French Envoys might receive some affront, took them under her especial protection, and commanded by Proclamation, that no Man should offer them any Injury. It happened shortly after, that as the Queen was in her Barge on the Thames, [near Greenwich], with three French Envoys (5), a Pistol was discharged out of a Boat, and one of her Bargemen wounded. The Man that fired the Pistol was taken immediately, and threatened with the rack; but he cleared himself so ingeniously, that the Queen was persuaded of his innocence. She took occasion from her pardoning this Man, to display the affection she had for her Subjects, saying, She could believe nothing of her People, which a Parent could not believe of his own Children.

Shortly after, the Duke of Anjou came incognito into England, with only two Servants. He went to Court, without being known, and after some private discourse with the Queen, returned into France. Two months after, the Queen ordered some of her most trusty Privy-Counsellors (6), to examine together the advantages and mischiefs which might arise from her Marriage with the Duke of Anjou, and report them to her (7).

1579. The Duke of Anjou came incognito into England, with only two Servants. He went to Court, without being known, and after some private discourse with the Queen, returned into France. Two months after, the Queen ordered some of her most trusty Privy-Counsellors (6), to examine together the advantages and mischiefs which might arise from her Marriage with the Duke of Anjou, and report them to her (7).

Whilst Elizabeth was intent upon gaining the King of France's friendship, the Duke of Guise was framing a plot capable of creating her one day much trouble. As England could be conveniently invaded only from Scotland, Guise, who had not relinquished the project formed by the late Duke his Father, and the Cardinal his Uncle, was devising means to accomplish it, by setting Elizabeth and the King of Scotland at variance. He made use for that purpose, of Eljne Stewart, Baron d'Avignyn, who came to Scotland under colour of paying his respects to the King as his near relation. He was Son of John Stewart, younger Brother of Matthew Earl of Lenox, the young King's Grandfather. This Lord, who was settled in France, where his Family held the Barony of Avignyn [in Berry], being come to the King, so artfully insinuated himself into his good graces, that in a little time he became his Favourite. There was also about the same time another young Man, sprung from a branch of the Stewart Family, distinguished by the name of Ogilby, who was very much beloved by the King. These two Favorites joined together to ruin the Earl of Morton, as well for the sake of their own Interest, as because it was necessary, in order to execute the Duke of Guise's designs, to be rid of a Lord, who was too much attached to the Interest of England. To compass their ends, they persuaded the King to take a progress into some of his Counties, well knowing the Regent had business which would not suffer him to attend him. The Earl of Morton not mistrusting these young Men, who seemed only to mind trifles, opposed not the King's design. During the progress, the two Favorites intilled into the King an utter aversion to the Regent, and an excessive desire to be freed from him. We shall see presently the effects of this aversion; but it will be proper first to mention what had passed in the Netherlands (8).

The Army of the States being much weakened by the retreat of the German Troops, the Prince of Parma besieged Maestricht, whilst Plenipotentiaries on both sides were treating a Peace at Cologne. But this Negotiation served only to divide the Confederates the more. From that time several Lords forsook them. Montigny came to the Prince of Parma's Army with the Forces under his Command. Artois and Haynault made a separate Treaty, and some other Provinces returned to the obedience of the King of Spain. The Prince of Orange seeing this defection, used his endeavours to unite still more strictly the Provinces which persisted in the resolution to throw off Philip's yoke. He succeeded at length, and caused the famous Union of Utrecht to be signed, between Holland, Zealand, Friesland, and Utrecht, the Articles whereof are to be seen in the Histories of those Countries. Ghent and Tyres afterwards came into the Union, and the Prince of Orange was made Governor of Flanders. Mean while, the Prince of Parma took Maestricht, after which he disbanded most of the Spanish and Italian Troops, according to his promise. This sincerity procured him Mechlin, Lille, and Valenciennes.

The City of London increasing excessively, to the detriment of the rest of the Towns, the Queen thought it necessary to remedy this inconvenience. She published therefore in the beginning of the year 1580, a Proclamation, prohibiting any new buildings within three Miles of the gates of the City, upon pain of Imprisonment, and forfeiture of the materials (9). It were to be wished for England, that this prohibition had been punctually executed even to this day, since the City is so enlarged, that it is grown a monstrous head, to a body of a moderate size, to which it bears no proportion.

But there was a still more pressing evil, which it was no less necessary to remedy. I mean the hindering of the English Seminaries in foreign Countries from sending Priests into England to preach sedition and rebellion, under colour of administering the Sacraments to the Catholics. The Priests expelled England in the beginning of this Reign, had set up a College at Douay [in 1568.] by means of William Allen, an Oxford Man, afterwards Cardinal. Whilst the Duke of Alva was Governor of the Netherlands, in this College were formed all the Plots I have mentioned in favour of the Queen of Scots. But Don Lewis de Requesens having banished from the Low-Countries all the English fugitives, the members of Douay College retired, some to Rome, and some to Rheims, where they erected Seminaries, under the protection of the Pope and the Cardinal of Lorraine, Archbishop of Rheims. It was these two Seminaries which supplied the Catholics in England with Priests. So long as the Court imagined these men only administered the Sacraments in private to those of their religion, no notice seemed to be taken of it. But it was discovered at length, that they were diligent in spreading pernicious principles, which might be attended with ill consequences. They maintained, that the Pope had [by divine right] full power to dethrone Kings, and, Elizabeth being excommunicated and deposed by Pius V's Bull, her Subjects were freed from their allegiance. Four of these dangerous emissaries were condemned and executed, for daring to maintain publicly, that the Queen was lawfully deposed (1).

This did not hinder the two Seminaries from continually sending into England Incendiaries, with whom were joined Robert Parsons and Edmund Campian Jesuits, who were the first of that Order employed to preach the fore-mentioned dangerous Tenets. They had obtained of the Pope a Bull, dated the 14th of April 1580, declaring that Pope Pius's Bull did for ever bind Elizabeth and the Heretics, but not the Catholics, till a favorable opportunity should offer to put it in execution. These two Jesuits had professed the Protestant Religion, and even bore offices in the University of Oxford (2). After that, withdrawing out of the Kingdom, they returned from time to time, appearing one while like Clergymen, another while like Soldiers, or in some other disguise, and frequented the Houses of the Catholics, under pretence of instructing and comforting them, but in reality to inspire them with sedition and rebellion. Nay, they had the confidence to challenge the Protestant Clergy to dispute in print (3). All this coming to the Queen's knowledge, a Proclamation was issued out, commanding all those who had any Children, [Wards, Kinsmen] beyond sea, to give in their names [to the Ordinary] in ten days, and call them home within a month (4), with a prohibition to supply them with money after that time. By the same Proclamation, all persons were forbid to entertain or harbour any Jesuits or Priests, sent forth from the Seminaries of Rome or Rheims, on pain of being punished as rebels and seditious persons.

Shortly after, printed Books were dispersed, intimating, that the Pope and King of Spain had conspired to conquer England and restore the Catholic Religion, and exhorting the English Papists to encourage the design. Whereupon the Queen issued out another Proclamation, declaring, she was not ignorant of the practices of her enemies, but by the blessing of God and the help of her faithful Subjects, she was able to withstand their attacks, both at home and abroad: That moreover, as the Plots which were contriving, were not only against her person, but also against the whole Kingdom, she did not intend to be cruel to the good, by sparing the bad; and therefore such as would not for the future keep within the bounds of their duty were to expect no favour (5).

The menaces from the Pope and King of Spain were not entirely vain, since it appeared this very year that there was a plot formed against Ireland. Arthur Grey, Lord-Deputy of that Island, had intelligence that seven hundred Spaniards and Italians, sent by the Pope and Philip II., were landed without opposition (6), under the command of San Yoseph an Italian, and had raised a Fortification, which they called The Fort del Oro. The Earl of Ormond, who was not far from those quarters, posting thither with some Troops, took a few Prisoners, who declared, they had brought arms for five or six thousand Men, who were to join them, in order to drive the English out of the Island. The Earl not having sufficient forces to besiege the Fort, contented himself with investing it, till the Lord-Deputy, who was on the march, should join him. A little after, the Fort was besieged in form, and compelled to surrender the fifth day at discretion. This good success was followed by the cruelty of the English, who, under pretence of the great difficulty of guarding so many Prisoners, put the Spaniards to the sword, and hanged all the Irish.

This year was memorable for the return of Francis Drake from his Voyage round the World. He had navigated in America, upon the North and South Seas, and amassed a prodigious quantity of Gold and Silver taken from the Spaniards. At his return, which was in November, the Queen knighted him, and was pleased to dine in the Ship which had made so great a Voyage. After that, she ordered it to be drawn up in a little creek near Deptford, and certain inscriptions to be set up in memory of the thing (7).

Bernadine de Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador made great complaints against Drake. He required, that he should be punished for his Robberies, and for daring to sail in the Seas which were under the dominion of the King of Spain, Drake and all the money, plundered upon the Spaniards, restored. He was told, that the Indian Ocean was common to all the Nations of Europe, and that the English by no means allowed of the propriety assumed by the King of Spain, nor of the Pope's pretended donation, who had no right to dispose of Countries and Seas which belonged not to him: That Drake should be always ready to answer in Law whenever he should be attacked, and to hinder him from converting the Gold and Silver to his own use, the Queen had ordered all the goods, he had brought home, to be sequestered, with design to satisfy the King of Spain, if he could prove they belonged to him or his Subjects, though the charges she had been at in defending Ireland against the attacks of the Spaniards, amounted to a much greater sum. The Queen however repaid afterwards part of the Treasure (8).

Henry Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundel died this year. He was the last of that illustrious Family which had flourished in England above three hundred years. One of his Daughters married Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, and thence it was that the Title of Earl of Arundel came to the Howard Family.

The religious War was renewed in France in the month of January, and ended in November, by a sixth Treaty of Peace.

This year Philip II. seized the Throne of Portugal, Philip II. vacant by the death of King Henry. Don Antonio, Prior of Crato, natural Son to Don Lewis, Brother of the late King, would have disputed the Crown with the King of Spain, but the Forces of the two Competitors being very unequal, Don Antonio's endeavours were fruitless.

The affairs of Scotland began to give Elizabeth some uneasiness, because she knew King James's two Favorites were using their utmost endeavours to turn him against England. The first point of their project was to finish the Earl of Morton's ruin, whom they had already destroyed in the King's favour. The second, to engage the King to marry a French Princess. The third, to persuade him, after his marriage, to declare the Duke of Guise his Lieutenant-General. The advices, the Queen received upon this occasion, wanted not proof, since she had long known the design to invade her from Scotland, and since what was contriving at King James's Court was very proper to accomplish that project. She saw moreover, that the two Favorites, one of whom was wholly devoted to the House of Lorraine, gained more and more the love and confidence of the King, who delighted to load them with favours. Aubigny had been made Earl, and then Duke of Lennox (10), and James Stewart was honoured with the Title of Earl of Arran. Upon the intelligence she had received, she believed it necessary to begin with opening the young King's eyes, in relation to the Plots of his Favorites, or put him under a necessity to shew that he approved them, which could not but breed great discontent among the People of Scotland. To that purpose, she sent Sir Robert Bruce, 1580. [Treasurer of Berwick] into Scotland, to accuse the Duke of Lenox before the King and Council, of holding with the Court of France, and particularly with the Duke of Guise, intelligence destructive of Scotland and England. The Council of Scotland, governed by the Duke of Lenox, thought not proper to admit the accusation; but the King sent into England the Lord Huntly, to clear his Favorite to the Queen, who refused him audience. Nothing could be more grateful to the Favorites, than the misunderstanding which began to be formed between their Master and the Queen of England. Not to give him time to cool, one day, as the Earl of Morton was present in the Council, the Earl of Arran accused him of being concerned in the late King's Murder. Upon which he was immediately arrested, sent to prison in the Castle of Edinburgh, and afterwards removed to Dunbarton.

Elizabeth hearing of the Earl of Morton's disgrace, and finding, his attachment to England was the sole cause of it, dispatched Randolph immediately to solicit in his behalf. But the Favorite's intention being rather to exasperate than appease, his intercession was in vain. Randolph seeing the King so beset, that it was not possible to prevail, demanded an audience of the States, then assembled. He represented, how necessary a good understanding with England was to them, what the Queen his mistress had done for Scotland since the King's birth, how great an affection she had ever expressed for him, and with what pains and charge he had always protected his faithful subjects: That, notwithstanding all this, the Duke of Lenox was endeavouring to sow discord between the two Kingdoms, and had so far succeeded, that the King now looked upon the Queen of England his good kinswoman as an enemy. The States heard his harangue, and returned a general answer, which demonstrated their being directed by the Court. So, finding he could obtain nothing either from the King or States, he began to practice upon the great Men, to persuade them to rise in arms, whilst Elizabeth should send forces towards the Borders (1). As all this could not be done without the knowledge of the King and his Favorites, the Government of Sterling was taken from the Earl of Mar, who was suspected of being too good a friend of the English, and the King published an order to all his Subjects fit to bear arms, to hold themselves ready to march at a moment's warning. But as Elizabeth meant only to terrify the King of Scotland, and not to wage War with him for the sake of the Earl of Morton, she ordered her Troops to retire. Probably Elizabeth's endeavours to save the Prisoner's Life, rather hastened his Death, since presently after he was condemned and beheaded. He confessed the Earl of Balgownie imparted to him his design to kill the King, but denied, he had any hand in the murder. He said also, he had intended to carry the King into England, that being educated among the English, he might find the less difficulty to obtain the Crown of that Kingdom after the Queen's death. Randolph seeing Elizabeth had no design to support the great Men of Scotland, whom he had gained, retired without taking his audience of leave.

The Earl of Morton being dead, the two Favorites became more and more masters of the King, and the Government of the Kingdom, without regarding the People's murmurs, who could not, without indignation, see themselves at the mercy of two raw and unexperienced young men. The Duke of Lenox had some good qualities; but had no knowledge of the affairs of Scotland, and besides, was a Catholic, and deemed the Duke of Guise's creature. This gave occasion to fear he had formed Projects destructive of the Religion and Liberty of Scotland. The Earl of Arran was an Atheist, and one of the most wicked of Men, if Melvil's Testimony is to be entirely credited. He pretended to be the Duke of Lenox's Friend, but laboured to ruin him, by giving him Counsels capable of making him forfeit the love and esteem of the Nobles and People. On the other hand, he privately hinted to the Clergy, that the Reformed Religion was in great danger, if timely care was not taken to oppose the Duke of Lenox's pernicious designs. By these secret practices, he so managed, that the Duke became odious to the whole Kingdom.

During these transactions in Scotland, the Court of France earnestly pressed the Duke of Anjou's marriage with Elizabeth. At last, the Queen having agreed with Simi upon the chief Articles, Henry III. sent into England an honorable Embassy, consisting of Francis of Bourbon Prince of Dauphin, Arthur Caste Marshal of France, President Brisson, and some other persons of distinction. These Ambassadors were received with great pomp and magnificence, and the Queen appointed to treat with them the Lord Burleigh High-Treasurer, Edward Clinton Earl of Lincoln, Lord Admiral of England, Thomas Ratcliffe Earl of Sussex, Francis Russell Earl of Bedford, Robert Dudley Earl of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton, and Sir Francis Walsingham, who was made Secretary of State in the room of Sir Thomas Smith lately deceased. As every thing was almost settled, the following Articles, which were to be digested in form of Treaty, after being approved by the King of France, and the Duke his Brother, were drawn by common consent.

The marriage shall be consummated within six weeks after the ratifying of the Treaty.

The Duke of Anjou and his Domesticks who are not English shall have the free exercise of their Religion, in some certain place to be appointed within his Court.

The Duke of Anjou shall alter nothing in the Religion now received and established in England.

After the consummation of the marriage, he shall enjoy the Title of King of England, but the administration of affairs shall remain in the hands of the Queen alone.

Whereas the Duke has demanded that he may be crowned King of England [presently after the marriage] and enjoy that honour, in case he shall come to be Guardian of the Children he may have by the Queen, it is agreed, the Queen shall lay the affair before the Parliament, and promote it as far as lies in her power.

Letters Patents, &c. shall run in the name of the King and Queen, as in the time of Philip and Mary.

The Queen shall assign the Duke by authority of Parliament an honorable pension to be disposed of as he pleases.

She shall procure the Parliament to assign a yearly pension in case he survives her.

The Duke shall make the Queen a Dowry of forty thousand Crowns a year out of the Dukedom of Berry, and shall put her in present possession thereof.

As to their Children, the following Articles shall be settled, which shall be ratified in the Parliaments of England and France, namely,

All the Children, as well Males as Females, shall succeed to their Mother's inheritance, each in his order, according to the Customs of England.

If the Crown of France happens to fall to the Duke of Anjou, or his Heirs, and there be two Males, the eldest shall succeed in the Kingdom of France, and the second in that of England.

If there be but one Son, he shall enjoy both Crowns, but shall be obliged to reside in England eight months in every two years.

If the Duke never comes to the Crown of France, his Children shall inherit his Appennage.

If he out-live the Queen, he shall have the Guardianship of the Children; of the Males till they are eighteen, and of the Females till fifteen.

If the Duke die before the time of Guardianship be expired, it shall be left to the disposal of the Parliament.

After these Articles relating to the Children, and serving to settle the Succession, it was further agreed:

The Duke shall prefer no Foreigner to any Post or Office in England.

He shall not carry the Queen out of the Kingdom, without her own, and the express consent of the Peers of the Realm.

If he die without Issue, he shall pretend no claim to England.

He shall not convey the Crown-Jewels out of the Kingdom.

He shall leave all the places in the hands of the English, and shall not remove from thence any warlike Stores.

There shall be a particular Treaty of League between France and England, with the proper Ratifications.

By a separate Article signed apart by itself, it was agreed, "The Queen shall not be bound to consummate the Marriage, before she and the Duke of Anjou shall thoroughly satisfy one another in certain points, and shall certify the King of France thereof within six weeks." It is not known upon what account it was necessary to take this precaution.

Ever since the last year, the States of the Low-Countries had begun to treat with the Duke of Anjou, concerning their offer of the Sovereignty of the confederate Provinces, and this Negotiation was so far advanced, that the Conditions were now agreed. As soon as the Prince of Orange was almost sure of the success of this affair, he so ordered, that the States declared the King of Spain to have forfeited the Sovereignty of the Netherlands, and the Duke was expected every hour to take possession of his new Dignity, and oppose the Prince of Parma, who was besieging Cambray. The Duke arrived indeed in August,

The Duke of Anjou is made Sovereign of the confederate Provinces, Philip II. is degraded from the crown of Spain, &c.

(1) There were seventeen Companies sent thither. Melvil, p. 127. No. 49. VOL II.

with an Army of twenty thousand Men, and constrained the Prince of Parma to raise the Siege, and retire to Valenciennes. He made his Entry into Cambray the 18th of August, and was declared Prince thereof, having first taken the Oath.

In the mean time, Elizabeth showed, she had altered her mind with regard to her Marriage, or had never seriously resolved to consummate it. She only wanted a pretence to break it off, or at least to defer it, till time should produce a more favorable opportunity. To this end, she sent into France, James Sommers Clerk of the Council, to require, that pursuant to the last Marriage-Article, a League Offensive and Defensive should be instantly concluded between France and England. Henry III. answered, that in the Articles there was no mention of an offensive, but he was ready to sign a defensive League. Sommers replied, the League spoken of in the Articles must be deemed offensive, since there was already a League defensive concluded in 1572, which not having been violated, wanted no renewal. Upon this, Elizabeth sent Secretary Walsingham to Paris, to improve this difficulty, and add some others. Walsingham therefore told the King, when the Queen his Mistress first resolved to marry, it was only to satisfy her People, who desired a certain Succession by her Children, to which end, she had preferred the Duke of Anjou before all other Princes, on account of his personal qualities, and Royal descent: Nevertheless she could not think of consummating the Marriage, till she perceived whether it was pleasing to her People, for fear she should be accused of considering it too late: That she heard with grief, the minds of the best Men were averse to the Marriage, and for that reason she thought it necessary to delay it, though she had still the same esteem for the Duke of Anjou: That besides, since the conclusion of the Articles, things had happened which required her to think more attentively of her engagement: That the Duke having accepted the Sovereignty of the Netherlands, had incurred the displeasure of the King his Brother, and this new Dignity could not but engage England in a war with Spain, since it was not possible for the Duke to be in war, without the Queen his Spouse being so too: That she believed therefore the present juncture very unreasonable to consummate the Marriage; and that it was proper to defer it till the Duke should be disengaged from his war, and the League offensive and defensive between France and England, concluded according to agreement. Henry plainly perceiving this was only an evasion, briefly answered, he was ready to renew the League defensive, and would treat of a League offensive, as soon as the Marriage was consummated.

These things passed whilst the Duke of Anjou was in the Netherlands. After he had raised the Siege of Cambray, and taken Cateau in Cambrisis, the States pressed him to join his Forces with their Army, to improve so fair an opportunity: But the approach of Winter furnished him with an excuse to send back his Troops into England, that he might go and follow his affairs in England himself. He arrived there in November, and was received by the Queen with so great respect and civility, that he thought himself almost sure of success. One day, as the anniversary of her Coronation was celebrating, the Queen being in conversation with him, pulled off her Ring from her finger, and put it on the Duke's, which made all present imagine, she had just then given him a promise (1).

Mean while, this Marriage was exclaimed against publicly in the Court and City. Walsingham, [Leicester,] Hailton, and others of the Queen's Confidants, murmured at it more than the rest. Her Maids of Honour that were most intimate with her, never ceased to represent to her, all the mischiefs which might from thence befall her, as well as the whole Kingdom, and strove by persuasions mixt with tears, to divert her from this resolution. I know not whether I am mistaken, in suspecting all this to be a mere Farce, acted by the Queen's private orders, to give her a pretence to go from her word. Ministers, Courtiers, Favorites, are seldom seen to oppose so openly and publicly, the Will of their Sovereign, if they are not certain of approbation. Be this as it will, the Queen having spent the whole night without taking any rest, amidst the sighs and tears of her Ladies, went to the Duke's room (2), and talked with him in private. When she withdrew, the Duke was seen to throw the Ring from him, and presently to take it up again, complaining bitterly of the levity of Women, and the inconstancy of the English.

Elizabeth's Conduct in every thing relating to this Marriage was so singular, that there is no guessing her thoughts. If the business was only a bare Negotiation, prolonged and broke off upon the point of conclusion, there would be no cause of wonder. Nothing was more agreeable to this Queen's Character, and I'll venture to say, to her Interest. But the signing and sealing of the Marriage-Articles raises a difficulty not easy to be removed. It is scarce probable, this wise Politician should think of amuling to such a degree, a Brother of the King of France, and who might himself one day be King, since Henry had no Children. This is so much the harder to be believed, as there was then no visible necessity to carry her Diffimulation so far. For my part, I see no proper way to explain this extraordinary Conduct, than by saying, that in the beginning of the Negotiation, her design was only to amuse the Duke of Anjou, who she thought she suffered herself to be won, with sincerity, in a resolution to perform them; but that after signing, she repented, and chose rather to affront the Prince, than keep her word. It was then that she carried her diffimulation to the greatest height, in expressing an extraordinary value for the Duke, and labouring withal to put him out of conceit with the Marriage. There are two Facts very difficult to be reconciled, but upon my supposition. The first is, during the Duke's stay at Court, she caused a Man's hand to be cut off for writing a Satyr upon their Marriage (4). After that, she published a Manifesto, to satisfy the Publick, that the Duke of Anjou had no ill design against the Protestant Religion, nor had demanded any thing in favour of the Catholics. The second fact, very opposite to the first, is, that she took the opportunity whilst the Duke was with her, to put to death Edmund Campian a Jesuit, with three other Priests (5), convicted of endeavouring to raise Commotions in the Kingdom, and clandestinely maintaining, that the Queen was lawfully deposed. It is easy to perceive, if her esteem and affection for the Duke of Anjou had been so great as she pretended, she would at least have deferred these Men's punishment till after his departure. It is doubtful, if he had not been put to death, he would not find in his Marriage those comforts he thought to have been to expect. Be this as it will, which ever way her Proceedings are explained, there is no justifying, in my opinion, either her signing the Articles, or afterwards breaking her word.

Whatever the Queen's intention might be in this negotiation, it is certain 't was extremely prejudicial to the Catholics in England, who entertaining great hopes from this marriage, were too hasty to discover them. When it was known in the world that the Articles were signed, England was suddenly over-run with Jesuit Priests, Jesuits, and other Catholics, who hoped to be secure there under the Duke of Anjou's protection. Among these, some were so imprudent as to vent openly the most extravagant doctrines concerning the Pope's power, a crime then unpardonable, because it tended to deprive the Queen of her Royalty, and raise a Rebellion. It is no wonder therefore, that the furious zeal and imprudence of some of the Catholics drew upon the whole body, severities to which the Queen would not have been easily led, if they had been contented to live in quiet, and exercise their religion in private, without attacking the Government. What did them still more injury was, that some of them owned they were come into England with power to absolve every man in particular from his oath of allegiance, from which Pius V's Bull had absolved the whole nation in general.

(3) Strada, and some other Historians say, that Queen Elizabeth set this Treaty of marriage on foot, only to break off the design of a Match between the Duke of Anjou, and a Daughter of the King of Spain, which had been some time in agitation: And this is very probable, considering how strange Queen Elizabeth was in a union between the Crowns of France and Spain. Which was done accordingly, by virtue of an Act of Parliament, 1584. against seditious writings: by diving a Cleaver through the wrist with a mallet, upon a scaffold at Westminster. I remember, (says Camden) being present, that Strachey, after his right hand was cut off, pulled off his Hat with his left, and said with a loud voice, either out of honour of the Punishment, or pity to the Man, or their hatred of the Match. of Spain, withdrew into France. After which, he came to Elizabeth, who took care of him, and put him in hopes of a greater relief.

The Parliament meeting the beginning of the year 1582, whilst the Duke of Anjou was still in England (1), passed very severe Laws against the Catholics, wherein all those are declared guilty of High-Treason, "who shall endeavour to dissuade the Subjects from their allegiance to the Queen, and from the Religion established in the Kingdom, or shall reconcile them to the Church of Rome, as also those who shall be thus reconciled. Those also are fined in two hundred Marks, and imprisonment for a year, who shall say Mass, and they who shall be knowingly present at Mass, are fined in a hundred Marks, with imprisonment also for a year. Moreover they who absented themselves from their Parishes Churches on the days appointed for Divine Service, are fined in twenty Pounds a month." It must be observed, that hitherto only one Shilling to the use of the poor, had been exacted for absence on Sundays and Holidays. This shows, that before, the Laws against the Catholics were not very severe, neither were they, it is certain, executed with rigour. But the indolent zeal of those who would not be satisfied with this advantage, was the occasion that all the Catholics were deprived of it.

The Duke of Anjou, and those who had attended him into England, could plainly perceive, under what constraint they should live, if the marriage was consummated. In all appearance, the proceedings of the Queen and Parliament against the Catholics, did not a little contribute to comfort him, and perhaps put him out of conceit with a Country so opposite to France. Nay, it is very likely, all this was done before his eyes with that view. He departed in February, having received from the Queen many tokens of esteem and affection, the most substantial whereof was a good sum of money (2) to assist him in maintaining the war in the Netherlands. The Queen having accompanied him to Canterbury, ordered several English Lords (3) to wait upon him as far as Antwerp, where presently after he received the Ducal Crown of Brabant. By all these Marks of esteem and friendship, and by all her civilities, the Queen had a mind to repair in some measure, the mortifications she made him undergo during his stay in England. It is extremely probable, this stay was not to his advantage, and served only to discover the meanness of his Genius and other qualities.

Elizabeth was too wise not to perceive that her conduct in the negotiation of her marriage could not but disoblige the King of France. So, the plainly saw, that though there had been no other reason but this alone, she could not much rely on his friendship. On the other hand, she was not ignorant how angry the King of Spain was, for that whole bodies of English Troops served in the Army of the States of the Low-Countries, under the command of Norris. Though these men were called Volunteers, that is, owned by none, and who served at their own charge, it was easy to judge, that they were not there in such numbers, without the tacit or express consent of their Queen. Besides, it was hardly possible for Elizabeth to conceal the supplies of money she had given Prince Casimire, and the Duke of Anjou, for the maintenance of their Armies. Philip II. was the most potent Prince in Europe, and the conquest of Portugal had lately rendered him still more formidable, particularly to the English. He was supported by the Pope, and had but too much influence in the King of France's Council. But Elizabeth had no friend on whom she could depend. The Duke of Guise was now labouring to take from her the King of Scotland. The Irish wanted only a favorable opportunity to revolt, and the English Catholics were incited to rebellion by the Pope's emissaries. To these may be added a great number of Protestants, the Queen of Scots Adherents, who only waited an occasion to show their affection for her. Elizabeth's Ministers could not, without dread think of all these things. They were in continual apprehension that some terrible storm was going to fall upon England. To this fear were owing, first the League defensive with France, and then the project of the Queen's marriage with the Duke of Anjou, the Ministers judging it almost impossible for her to support herself without some powerful Alliance.

Mean while, whether Elizabeth thought herself able to prevent, or repel, the danger, she took but few precautions, relying wholly on the affection of her people. This was her best, or rather, her only refuge. And therefore to endeavour to corrupt, and cause them to lose the love and esteem they had for her, was wounding her in a very sensible part. To this must be ascribed her tender expressions whenever she spoke to her people. It must however be confessed, that she won her people's love, not only by words and other external demonstration, but chiefly by very substantial deeds. Let a man peruse the whole History of England, and he will find no Reign, wherein justice was administered so impartially, or the Subjects enjoyed their privileges more peaceably, or were freer from wars abroad and at home, or from extraordinary taxes and impositions; in a word, wherein the Kingdom was more flourishing. The Queen spent no unnecessary money, and her Treasury being regularly managed, the people had no cause to complain, since whatever they gave was employed for their own good.

But it was not only at home that the Queen laboured to make her People happy, her care reached also abroad. This year she sent an Ambassador (4) to Frederic II. King of Denmark, under colour of carrying him the Order of the Garter. But the chief motive of this Embassy, was to induce that Prince to desist from certain Customs paid by the English Merchant-Ships in passing the Sound, in which however it was not possible to succeed. Frederic gratefully received the Collar of the Order, but refused to take the usual Oath, because he had denied the same thing before, when admitted into the Order of St. Michael by the French King.

Tho' Henry III. had no reason to be pleased with Elizabeth, he gave her notice however, that the Duke of Guise was plotting something in favour of the Queen of Scots, and was to embark in Normandy some Troops designed either for England or Scotland, tho' he pretended to send them into Flanders. For this reason he recalled Sir Walter Mildmay, who had been sent to treat with the Queen of Scots, or at least to pretend so.

As there was no likelihood, the Duke of Guise would invade England directly, but on the contrary every thing looked as if he intended to execute some project in Scotland, the Queen turned her thoughts wholly to the affairs of that Kingdom. They were then in a violent convulsion. Some persons of great distinction, among whom were the Earls of Mar, Lindsay, Grou, full of indignation to see the realm governed by a young Prince of fifteen years, and two rash inexperienced Ministers, who had nothing less in view than the Kingdom's welfare, conspired together to seize the King's Person and remove his two Favorites. To that end, taking their opportunity whilst they were both absent from Court, and the King intent upon hunting near Abol, they lent and invited him by the Earl of Grou to pass a few days at his house at Huntingtown, and when he came there, secured his person (5). This was called the Ruthven-Conspiracy, because Ruthven was the name of the Earl of Grou's Family (6). For the same reason the Conspirators were called the Lords of Ruthven. The Earl of Arran, one of the King's Favorites drew together some people, and attempted to free his Master, but was repulsed and forced to retreat to Ruthven Castle, where the Earl of Grou received him and saved his life, but kept him prisoner. The Duke of Lennox hearing what had passed, speedily retired to Dunbarton, of which he was Governor, and the King was carried to Sterling, free in appearance, but Prisoner in reality.

Upon this news, Elizabeth, who probably was not ignorant of the Conspirators design, ordered Henry Carey to go immediately, and offer her service to the King of Scotland. But James terrified by those who had him in their power, answered, that every thing was done with his consent, and he was very well pleased with the Lords who were about him. Melvil affirms however, that the King found means to tell Carey in private the contrary to what he had said in publick. The King of France sent likewise La Motte Fenelon into Scotland (7) to try to support the Favorites, knowing those who had seized the King were all friends to England. La Motte had also orders to inform the King, that the Queen his Mother, who had hitherto refused to own him for King, agreed to make him partner in the royalty.

1557. Mary, the Queen Mary writ to Elizabeth, to try 1558. her in the deliverance of the King her Son.
 But she took a very improper way to obtain this favour, since her Letter is full of reproaches for the barbarous usage she met with (1).

This year, Pope Gregory XIII. published his Bull for reforming the Calendar, and ordered ten days of this very year to be cut off at once. As England and the rest of the Protestant States refused to comply with this ordinance, because it flowed from the Papal Authority, there began from that time to be a difference of ten days in the Dates, the one reckoning it the first day of the month, when it was the tenth with the others. This difference still subsists in some places, and particularly in England, [and Swedenland,] where the old way of reckoning is still used, with the addition however of the new (2).

Elizabeth pretended, that Elizabeth was very much moved with Mary's Letter, and that compassion for the afflicted Queen made her advise with her Council upon what terms she could be released. We shall see presently that this proceeding was far from demonstrating a desire to set her at liberty. It is much more likely, she sought only to amuse her, and keeping her in hopes of deliverance, had no other view than to put a stop to the continual Plots which were contrived in her favour, and free herself from the solicitations she was perpetually troubled with. However this be, some time after the receipt of her Letter, she sent to her Robert Beal (3), one of the Clerks of the Council, with certain articles founded upon Mary's offer of affixing her Son in the Government. Consequently they supposed a previous agreement betwixt them; but never had there been a more improper juncture to negotiate this agreement, since King James was captive in the hands of Queen Elizabeth's Adherents. Here are the Articles, with some remarks, which will serve to show Elizabeth's aim in feigning a desire to release her Prisoner.

I. The Queen of Scots and the King her Son should promise to attempt nothing prejudicial to England.

It is easy to perceive, that this Article is expressed in such general Terms as required a large explanation.

II. She should disclaim as unjust whatever was done by Francis II. her first Husband, and ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh.

The former part of this Article was very general, and liable to abundance of cavils. As to the latter part, it must be observed, that Mary could not ratify the Treaty of Edinburgh but with the restriction she had offered. So, in proposing to her the ratifying of that Treaty simply and absolutely, a snare was laid for her, or else she was put under a necessity of rejecting this Article.

III. She should discover and condemn all the Conspiracies against Queen Elizabeth that were come to her knowledge.

This was accusing her of being concerned in these Conspiracies, and making her own it, which was very hard measure for Mary. She could have done no more, had she been fully convinced of Elizabeth's sincerity, which is not very likely.

IV. She should contrive nothing against the Government of England, Ecclesiastical or Civil.

Mary was a Catholic, and the Laws of England excluded the Catholics from all Posts. So if she agreed to this article without farther explanation, it might have been inferred, that she excluded herself from succeeding Elizabeth.

V. She should claim no right to the Crown of England during Queen Elizabeth's life, and after Elizabeth's death should reier her Title to the judgment of the Parliament.

This was also laying a snare for Mary, in making her own that her Title was dubious, though she did maintain, and had always maintained, that it was incontestable.

VI. She should swear to these Articles, to the end there might be no room for the objection taken from her not being at liberty.

VII. The King her Son should ratify them by Oath and Writing.

To enable the King of Scotland to ratify these Articles, it was necessary first that he should agree in an authentic manner that he was King only as associated by the Queen his Mother, which was not then under process, since he was in the hands of the Lords of Rutland, who by no means acknowledged Mary's authority.

VIII. For the performance of this Article the Queen of Scots should give Hostages to the Queen of England.

This Article was also liable to many difficulties, concerning the number and quality of the Hostages.

It is therefore evident, Elizabeth proposed these Articles to Mary, only to amuse her and the world, at a time when it was not possible even to enter into Treaty upon this subject; besides their being almost all insinuating and liable to discussions, which the Court of England might have prolonged as they pleased. Camden says, the Scots of the p. 491.
 English party were utterly against this agreement, affirming it was owing to the intrigues of the French Court. It is true, if the conditions proposed had been reasonable to Mary, 'tis not unlikely, Elizabeth would have been obliged to oppose the conclusion of the Treaty. But there was no occasion for this, since she had taken sufficient care to hinder Mary from accepting them.

I must now proceed to relate what passed in the this year. If a Man is contented to what Camden says, his idea of things will be very imperfect. The story of these intrigues which then took place, is too short to be very short, for fear of injuring King James's reputation, for whose sake he wrote the Annals of Queen Elizabeth.
 But by good fortune, we have Melvil's Memoirs, which give us a fuller information.

The Duke of Lenox seeing the King in the hands of the Lords of Rutland, and the little probability of his a Party strong enough to free him, withdrew into Ireland where he died soon after.

Mean while, the Lords of Rutland, whose sole aim had been to remove from the King his two Favorites, finding that one was in prison, and the other in France, thought proper to convene the States, where the King was present.
 He declared, whatever they had done was with his consent, and to his satisfaction. He writ the same thing to the General Assembly of the Kirk, whereupon the States and the Kirk approved by authentic Acts all that was passed. So that This done, the King was no longer watched, but left entirely at liberty.

Shortly after, the King assembled the Nobility in the City of St. Andrew's, before whom he declared, that tho' p. 156.
 he had been detained against his Will, he owned however it was done for his service: That he did not intend to call any person to an account, but would speedily publish an act of Oblivion. To show that he forgot all that was past, he visited the Earl of Gouy, who casting himself at his feet, begged pardon, which he very readily obtained.

All being thus quiet, the King appointed twelve Coun-cellors to assist him to govern the State. But shortly after, p. 157. his affection for the Earl of Arran reviving, he wished to see him; and as all his Counsellors were unanimously against it, he protested he would send him away again within four and twenty hours; but was not as good as his word, for he kept him for ever. In a short space, the p. 158.
 Favorite had such an influence over him, that he would not suffer any but him to meddle in the publick affairs.
 Whereupon the Council of twelve being no longer consulted, broke up of themselves. As soon as the Earl of Arran saw himself fully retired, he suggested to the King, that he had made a false step, in not punishing the influence of the Lords of Rutland, and persuaded him to length to alter his resolution (4). So, instead of an act of Oblivion, he issued out a Proclamation, commanding the Complices of the Rutland Conspiracy, to come and beg pardon for their crime. Every one plainly saw the difference between this Proclamation, and the promised act of Oblivion. The King being free, had declared, that they who had detained him, intended him no ill, and for that reason he had promised them a pardon. But by the Proclamation, he considered them as guilty, and obliged them to submit to his mercy, at a time when he suffered himself to be governed by one of those very Favorites against whom they had conspired. This was sufficient to induce

(2) Three hundred and sixty five days six hours, exceeding a year by about eleven minutes, a day is gained in a hundred and thirty two years, by which means, from the year 325, wherein the Council of Nice was held, to the year 1582, ten whole days were gained. Whereupon, to set matters right again, Pope Gregory ordered the 10th of October 1582, to be called the 15th, and to prevent the like error again, he decreed that three days should be taken out of every 100 hundred years; (which comes to almost the same as taking out one day every hundred and thirty two years) and this was done by making every hundredth year common, which, according to the Julian account, is always Leap year, but every four hundredth year to continue Leap-year. Though this be the truest and most exact way of reckoning, yet such is the perverseness of the English and Swedes, that they still keep to the old way, and hence comes what we call Old and New Styles, which differ now by eleven days, and are the worse for it. Camden, p. 491.

 (4) Arran insinuated to the King, that it would be a troublesome business to be incumbered with so many contrary opinions. He desired him to recreate himself with hunting and hawking, and he would assent the Council, and report to his Majesty all their opinions and conclusions. Thus he did remove those times, but at length, he gave account of no Man's advice but his own, and made the King believe, it was all their opinions, that it was his interest to follow a violent course. Melvil, p. 159.

Elizabeth's Letter to the King of Scotland. Melvil. P. 139, 140.

Elizabeth being informed of the King of Scotland's proceedings, and the danger of the Earl of Arran's entirely ruining the English party, wrote to the King, representing the consequences, and mixed in her Letter some reproaches for breach of promise. She told him moreover, she intended to send Secretary Walsingham to talk with him from her. James returned a stout answer, and vindicated himself for not performing his promise, since it was extorted from him when a Captive. This excuse might have served, with respect to what he said to the States; but it was insufficient, since he repeated the same thing to the Nobility when at full liberty. However, he promised the Queen to proceed no farther till Walsingham's arrival. In the mean time, the Favorite made the Earl of Gowry undergo so many mortifications, that he forced him at length to quit the Court. Walsingham being arrived, imparted to the King, in two private Audiences, the Queen's advice concerning the management of his affairs. But as this advice tended to the Earl of Arran's ruin, the Ambassador brought back no very satisfactory answer (2).

The Duke of Anjou's attempt upon the Low-Countries is frustrated. Guicciardi. Strada. Stow.

The beginning of the year, the Duke of Anjou being too much confined by the terms laid upon him by the States, attempted to seize, on the same day, Antwerp, and seven or eight other Towns of the Netherlands. But missing his aim, he was forced to retire to Dunkirk, and from thence into France. Mean while, the affairs of the States were in a melancholy situation. The Prince of Parma made great progress this year, and very likely would succeed at length, in obliging all the United Provinces to return to the obedience of the King of Spain.

Affairs of France. Inguenot. Thuanus.

Henry III. behaved in France after so strange a manner, that he daily incurred the contempt of his subjects. In public he affected an over strained devotion, whilst in private he plunged himself into the most criminal pleasures. Philip II. taking advantage of Henry's indolence with regard to his most important affairs, strove by all sorts of ways to raise him troubles, which should hinder him from undertaking the defence of the Netherlands, who showed a strong inclination to put themselves under the Dominion of France. He tried first to perwade the King of Navarre to take Arms, promising to aid and protect the Huguenots. This way failing, he applied to the Duke of Guise, who accepted the Succours offered by Philip, to revenge the mortifications he daily received from the King's minions (3).

1584. Affairs of Scotland. Melvil. P. 150.

Whether Queen Elizabeth's advice to the King of Scotland had a good effect upon him, or Melvil's Remonstrances, as he hints himself in his Memoirs, made some impression on his mind, he seemed resolved to put a stop to the prosecution of the Lords of Rutbuen. To that purpose, he assembled the Nobility at Edinburgh, to end this affair with the advice of the great Men, as he had at first projected, by publishing an Act of Oblivion. But the Earl of Arran, a bold and daring Man, defeated this project in spite of the King himself. When the great Men were come to Edinburgh, he went and talked with every one apart, intimating, that the King's intention was only to get his Conduct approved, with regard to the Lords of Rutbuen, after which he would pardon them, when they had acknowledged, they owed that favour to his Clemency. The great Men seeing the point was only to save the King's honour, and thinking the Fugitives would receive no prejudice, promised the Favorite to do as the King desired. So, when the King asked their advice in this affair, they answered, it was their opinion he acted with great Clemency, in opening the Fugitives a way to obtain their pardon. This done, the Earl of Arran told him, if, after this declaration, he published an act of Oblivion, without the Fugitives owning themselves guilty, he would disoblige the Nobility, by neglecting their advice, and extremely injure his own Dignity. Thus the Fugitives obtained no advantage, though the Assembly was convened purely for their sake.

Melvil. P. 154.

The Declaration of the Nobility drove the Lords of Rutbuen to despair. They were required to ask pardon for a thing which the King had approved, as done for his service. Nay, they could not be sure of their pardon, since, as the King had once departed from his word, they could not trust him any more. The Earl of Arran having obtained his desire, grew more proud and insolent, and so persecuted all his enemies, that he forced them at length to form a new Conspiracy against him (4). Tho' the Earl of Gowry had saved his Life, and procured him the King's pardon, he never ceased to molest him, till he had forced him to ask leave to go out of the Kingdom. He was now at Dundee, in order to retire into England, when he heard that the Earls of Mar, Angus, and Glames, who were fled into Ireland, had some enterprize in hand against the Favorite. This news made him stay in Scotland, and at last, he entered into the Conspiracy himself, without stirring however from Dundee. The Conspirators had so well laid their measures, that arriving unexpectedly in Scotland, they immediately took Sterling.

confused intelligence of this conspiracy, and knowing the Earl of Gowry was concerned, ordered him to be arrested, which was done accordingly, just as the Conspirators became masters of Sterling. This arrest quite disheartened them. As he was a near relation of the King, they fancied, he had designedly suffered himself to be taken, and believing they were betrayed, abandoned their enterprize and fled out of the Kingdom. It cost the Earl his life, who being brought to Edinburgh was there beheaded (5). Thus the Earl of Arran still kept his post in spite of his enemies. He was extremely odious to the whole Kingdom, because he was a wicked, atheistical man, and of an insatiable avarice. There was also another thing which very much troubled the Scots. And that was, the King for some time had held private intelligence with the Queen his Mother, which bred a fear, that he would engage in designs destructive of the State and Religion. He had privately accepted of the affection she had offered him, and it was seen that none but the Queen's known friends had access to him. Nay, it was whispered, he intended to turn Catholic, and began to listen to the Proposals of the French Court, or rather of the Duke of Guise.

All these things were but too apt to give Elizabeth great uneasiness. She was afraid, the King of Scotland would be perwaded to take a French Wife, and such a marriage produce ill effects for England. To try therefore to prevent the mischiefs which might happen from that quarter, she sent Davison into Scotland, under colour of excusing her protection of the Scotch fugitives, though the King had demanded them by virtue of the Treaty of Alliance concluded between the two Kingdoms. But Davison's chief business was to endeavour to win the Earl of Arran to the Queen's interest. This method was better and speedier than to support the Male-contents of Scotland, who were always to be supplied with money, without being certain of the success of their undertakings. Besides, the Queen ran the hazard of entirely losing King James. That Prince had sense, but as he was young, inexperienced, and too much governed by his Favorites, it was to be feared he would be drawn into projects detrimental to both Kingdoms, for the sake of others. Davison succeeded entirely in his negotiation with respect to the Earl of Arran, and by means that are easy to be guessed, prevailed with him to be guided by the Queen. Before his return to England, it was agreed between the two Courts, that the Earl of Hunfion for England, and the Earl of Arran for Scotland, should meet upon the borders, and make a regulation proper to preserve a good understanding between the two Kingdoms. Under this pretence, these two Lords conferred together, and before they parted, made a private Treaty, whereby the Earl of Arran engaged to keep the King unmarried for three years. Elizabeth pretended, she designed to give him a Princess of the Blood-Royal of England, who was not yet marriageable. This was at least the pretence with which the Treaty was coloured.

Whilst these things were in agitation, the master of Elizabeth Gray a young Scotch Lord, insinuated himself so far into King James's favour, that the Earl of Arran growing jealous, found means to remove him, by causing him to be sent Ambassador to Elizabeth. Gray was no sooner in England, but the Queen won him by her caresses and bounties. From that time this Ambassador feigned to be strongly attached to Queen Mary's interest, and by that means drew secrets from her, which Elizabeth knew how to improve. The Earl of Arran having some intelligence of this intrigue, informed the King of it, in order to ruin his Rival; but as in all likelihood, he could bring no proof of what he advanced, Gray being returned to Scotland, was very well received by the King, and spared no pains in his turn to ruin the Favorite.

Whilst these things passed in Scotland, Plots were form-

1584. ing in England in favour of the captive Queen. But some intercepted Letters to Queen Mary from Francis Throckmorton (1) beginning to discover the conspiracy, Throckmorton was arrested. Immediately Thomas Lord Paget and Charles Arundel fled into France, and gave out that the Catholics were so cruelly persecuted in England, that it was not possible for them to stay there without danger of their lives: That the Court had Spies every where, not only to watch the Catholics, but also to lay snares for them: That forged Letters from the Queen of Scots were left in their Houses, to force them either to bring them to the Secretary of State, or render themselves guilty by concealing them. There is no doubt, the Queen had spies to watch the motions of the Catholics, having but too much reason to suspect their fidelity (2). Nay, it is very possible that among these spies there were some, who to improve their services, laid snares for the Catholics. Those who take upon them such an office, of what Religion soever they be, are not usually the most honest men. But the behaviour of the Catholics had made these precautions necessary, the knowledge of what passed among them being of the utmost consequence to the Queen. Several Books, as well printed as in Manuscript, were handed about, wherein the Queen was slandered to the highest degree. She was taxed with putting to death many Catholics without cause, having first racked them, to compel them to confess crimes of which they were innocent. Her Maids of Honour were exhorted to serve her in the same manner as Judith did Holofernes, and render themselves, by such an action worthy of the applause of the Church throughout all future ages (3). These Books, with what had been discovered after Throckmorton's arrest, made it thought some plot was ready to break out.

Mean while the Queen, willing to show it was not for their Religion that some Catholics had been punished, sent for the Judges of the Realm, and sharply reproved them, for having been too severe in the tortures they had made these men suffer. Probably, this was done to afford them an opportunity to clear themselves from this charge, by an apology which was made publick. They affirmed, "That no person had been made to suffer for his Religion, but only for dangerous practices against the Queen and State; that indeed Campian the Jesuit had been put to the rack, but with so little violence, that he was presently able to walk and subscribe his confession: That Brian, one of his complices, obstinately refusing to speak or write the person's name who penned the Papers found about him, was indeed denied food, till he asked it in writing." However, the Queen, willing to take from her enemies all occasion of slandering her in foreign parts, forbid the putting of any person whatever to the rack, and was satisfied with transporting out of England seventy Priests who were in prison, and of whom some were under sentence of death. Among these were certain Jesuits (4), who afterwards proved very ungrateful for this favour. Perhaps indeed she acted, upon this occasion, not so much from a motive of clemency, as to separate two things which were always endeavoured to be confounded, namely, Religion and the crimes against the State, under pretence that most of the Conspirators were Catholics.

Before Throckmorton was apprehended, he sent a cabinet full of Papers to Mendoza the Spanish Ambassador, of which the Court had notice (5). He denied all at his first examination: but at the second, confessed, "that going some few years since to the Spa, he conferred several times with Jency and Sir Francis Inglesfield, two English fugitives, how England might be invaded (6): That after his return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, told him, the Catholic Princes had formed a design to free the Queen of Scots, and to employ the Duke of Guise for that purpose: That nothing was wanting, but to know what succours might be depended upon from the English Catholics: That in order to take their measures the better, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was sent into the County of Sussex, where the Duke of Guise intended to land: That he (Throckmorton) imparted the project to the Spanish Ambassador, who had been already informed of it, and showed him the Ports where it would be most proper to land: That he moreover acquainted the same Ambassador, with the names of the great Men to whom he might freely open his mind, because, as he was a publick person, he would not be so narrowly watched.

"Finally, that he conferred with him how to raise Soldiers privately in England, to have them ready when the foreign Troops should arrive."

Upon these depositions, the Spanish Ambassador was desired to come to the Council, where he was told what Throckmorton had witnessed against him. As he did not think himself, doubtless, innocent enough to clear himself from these accusations, he chose by way of recrimination to charge the Queen, with detaining the Spanish money she had seized, and with assisting the Duke of Anjou. Then, he spoke against the Ministers, saying, That by their ill counsels they incessantly laboured to sow discord between the Queen and the King of Spain. A few days after, the Queen commanded him to depart the Kingdom, which he readily obeyed, thinking himself very happy in coming off at so easy a rate. However, when he came into France, he loudly complained, as if in England the Law of Nations had been violated in his person. Meanwhile, the Queen dispatched Wade (7) to Spain, to inform the King of what had passed, and to tell him she was ready to receive another Ambassador from him. But Philip would not give Wade audience, who refused also in his turn to impart the contents of his Embassy to the Prime Minister.

When Throckmorton was brought upon his trial, he denied what he had confessed at his examination, affirming, he had invented it on purpose to avoid the rack. But after his condemnation, upon the evidence of his own letters to the Queen of Scots and the Papers found in his Coffers, he owned all, and even made a more circumstantial declaration than at first. And yet when he came to the Gallows, he denied again whatever he had confessed.

Elizabeth, as she could not doubt, her enemies were perpetually contriving to deprive her of the Crown, and set it on the head of the Queen of Scots, lived in a constant uneasiness, and under the apprehension that some one of their plots would at last succeed. So, to discover more fully the designs of her enemies, she seemed willing to resume the negotiation begun with the Queen of Scots. To that end she sent Wade, at his return from Spain, to tell her, she was ready to renew the Treaty which had been interrupted, and would dispatch to her very soon Sir Walter Mildmay for that purpose. But withal, she let her know she insisted upon two conditions, namely, that she should prevail with the King her Son, to grant the Parson promised to the Lords of Rutben, and put a stop to the Plots of the Bishop of Glasgow her Ambassador in France.

At this time happened the surprise of Sterling, the imprisonment of the Earl of Gowry, and the flight of the Conspirators into England. Whereupon Elizabeth sent Basil to desire the Queen of Scots, to intercede with the King her Son for the Fugitives, and inform her of the Duke of Guise's designs, as she had promised Wade. Mary answered, she had promised nothing, but on condition she should be released: That she would readily intercede for the Scotch Fugitives, provided any advantage would accrue from thence to herself or the King her Son, and in case they would confess their fault. She did not deny, she had desired the Duke of Guise to use his endeavours to free her; but said, she knew nothing of his designs, nor, if she did, would she discover them, unless she was assured of her deliverance. She besought Elizabeth to use her with more humanity, and desired the Treaty might be concluded with her, before the Scots were treated with. Lastly, she added, that as the King of France had owned and received her Ambassador jointly with her Son's, as Princes associated, Elizabeth would be pleased to cause this association to be published in Scotland.

Elizabeth took care not to serve her in what she desired, her aim being only to draw from her a sollicitation in behalf of the Scotch Fugitives, and an information concerning the Duke of Guise's designs, upon the uncertain hope of an agreement which she flattered her with. But finding she could get nothing out of her, she relinquished the negotiation as needless. However, perceiving by Mary's answer, that the King of Scotland had accepted the Association, she was afraid some dangerous Plot was contriving in Scotland. It was this chiefly that made her resolve to gain the Earl of Arran at any rate, wherein she succeeded as I said before.

Shortly after, Elizabeth also discovered that her enemies did not cease their secret practices. Chrichton a Scotch Jesuit, going by sea into Scotland, and his Ship being attacked by Pirates, tore some papers he had about him, and threw them into the sea. But by a very extraordinary accident, the wind hindered the torn papers from falling into the water, and blew them back into the Ship, where somebody took the pains to gather them up. These papers being delivered to Wade, he passed them together upon another paper with great labour and patience, and by that means a Plot was discovered, framed by the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Guise, to invade England. Whereupon, by the Earl of Leicester's means, a general association of Men of all degrees and conditions was formed in England, who bound themselves by oath to prosecute to the death those that should attempt any thing against the Queen.

The Queen of Scots easily perceived that the plots of her friends were discovered, since the association was a clear evidence that Elizabeth thought herself in danger. As she was afraid she could not avoid the efforts of this Association, in case it came to be known that she was concerned in these Plots, she used fresh endeavours to free herself from captivity. To that purpose she sent Naus her Secretary to Elizabeth with these proposals:

That if she might be released, she offered to enter into a closer amity with the Queen of England: To renounce the title of Queen of England, and never lay claim to the Crown of that Kingdom so long as Elizabeth was alive: To sign the Association: To make a league defensive with England, (so far as might stand with the Alliance between France and Scotland) provided that nothing was done in England to her disadvantage, before she herself or the King her Son was heard in the Parliament: To stay in England till hostages were given: To make no change in the Religion established in Scotland, provided she might have the free exercise of her own: To bury in oblivion all injuries done to her in Scotland, on condition that whatever had been enacted to her disgrace should be repealed: To recommend to her Son such Counsellors as were inclined to preserve a good understanding with England: To procure a pardon for the Fugitives, provided they would own themselves guilty: To treat of no match for the King her Son without Elizabeth's knowledge. She required on her part, that the Treaty should be made with her and the King her Son jointly, and promised to have it ratified by the Duke of Guise. Moreover, the desired matters might be speedily concluded, for fear some accident should obstruct the Treaty. Lastly, she prayed Elizabeth to give her some token of her Esteem, by granting her a little more liberty.

Remark upon this Subject.

Had Mary made these offers at any other time, perhaps Elizabeth would have regarded them. But in the present juncture, they only served to increase her suspicions, since it was evident they were an effect of the fear instilled into the Prisoner, by the association and the discovery of the plots. Camden pretends, contrary to all appearance, that Elizabeth being satisfied with these Proposals, was going to set Mary at liberty, had she not been hindered by the clamours of the Scots. Hence he takes occasion to make a long invective against the Presbyterians and their Preachers, and to accuse them of insolence, contempt of the King's person, and rebellion against the Laws. Here also he speaks of the suppression of Buchanan's writings, which was foreign to the purpose. In a word, he would have Presbytery to be considered as the sole cause of the obstacles to Mary's deliverance. In spite of Elizabeth's good intentions towards her. This is no wonder, for it was the modish stile in England in the reign of James I. to whom court was made by inveighing against the Puritans. I own however, it is not wholly improbable, that on this occasion, Elizabeth even set the Scots upon forming the obstacles mentioned here by Camden. But it is very unlikely, that at a time when she saw her enemies in league against her, to place Mary, though a prisoner, on the Throne of England, she should really intend to release her, and so enable her the better to execute her designs. To take Elizabeth's dissimulation for her real intention, was an artifice of Camden, thereby to insinuate, the thought Mary innocent of the plots which were continually framing. But he contradicts himself, by saying a little after, that Mary losing all hopes of agreement, hearkened at length to dangerous Counsels, and wrote to the Pope, and the King of Spain, soliciting them to hasten what they had in hand with all speed, let what would happen to her. It is therefore evident, there was now some project on foot, which she knew, and had hearkened to dangerous Counsels before the time mentioned by Camden. But Elizabeth, better informed than Mary imagined, knowing what measures were taken to carry her away, took her out of the hands of the Earl of Shrewsbury, and committed her to the custody of Sir Drue Drury, a watchful Man, if ever there was one (1). Camden says, the Earl of Leicester desiring at once to free Elizabeth from the uneasiness, the Queen of Scots created her, bribed certain murderers to assassinate the prisoner; but as none durst give them an order for leave to approach her, Drury's watchfulness hindered them from getting access to her. If this denotes the Earl of Leicester's villany, and perhaps, in Camden's intention, that of Elizabeth herself, it shows too how dangerous a person the Queen of Scots was deemed, since it was thought, Elizabeth's life could not be safe, but by her death. It is not likely therefore, that Elizabeth should then think of releasing her. The same Author says, that to alienate Queen Elizabeth's affection entirely from the Queen of Scots, it was whispered in her ears, that a resolution was taken to deprive her of the Crown, and set it on Mary's head: That a Council had been held, wherein Cardinal Allen for the English Ecclesiastics, Inglesfield for the Laity, and the Bishop of Ross for the Queen of Scots, all three empowered by the Pope, and the King of Spain, had agreed, that Elizabeth should be assassinated, King James deposed, and Mary given in marriage to some English Catholic Nobleman: That this Nobleman should be elected King of England, and the Crown settled upon his Heirs. He adds, Walsingham diligently inquired who this English Nobleman might be, and that the suspicion fell upon Henry Howard the late Duke of Norfolk's Brother (2).

Ibid.

During this year, the affairs of the United Provinces daily grew worse, the Prince of Parma from time to time conquering Towns upon them. At last, to reduce them, as it were, to the last extremity, God permitted the Prince of Orange to be assassinated by one Balthazar Gerard, a Burgundian. Philip his eldest Son being then in the hands of the King of Spain, and educated in the Catholic Religion, the States conferred the Government of Holland and Zealand upon his second Son Maurice, about eighteen years old. Mean while, the Prince of Parma improving the conformation of the States, laid Siege to Antwerp. In this distress, the States, finding it was not possible to support themselves with their own Forces, debated, whether they should put themselves under the protection of France or England, and at length resolved for France. But Henry III. was then involved in troubles, which suffered him not to accept their offer. So, finding no encouragement from that quarter, they were forced to apply to the Queen of England. We shall see next year the success of this Negotiation.

The troubles with which France had been so long disturbed, and which seemed to be a little appeased, were renewed by the death of the Duke of Anjou in June. As the King had no Children, and was thought incapable of having any, the Duke of Guise projected to seize the Throne, as descended from Charles the Great. This at least is what several have accused him of, not without great probability. But as Henry of Bourbon King of Navarre, was become first Prince of the Blood, since the death of the Duke of Anjou, a pretence was to be found to exclude him from the Throne, otherwise it would not be possible for the Duke of Guise to execute his project. It was not difficult to find a pretence, since the King of Navarre professed the Reformed Religion. So the Duke of Guise hiding his ambition under the veil of Religion, pretended to have no other view but to maintain the Catholic Religion, which would be in great danger, if a Huguenot ascended the Throne. The King, who knew his design, did his utmost to persuade the King of Navarre to change his Religion, and the Duke perceiving endeavours were used to break his measures, renewed the League first at Paris, and then in the Provinces. By this means he could have an Army ready on the first occasion. The people were so blind and stupid, as to imagine, he only aimed at the preservation of the Catholic Religion. Mean while, the Duke having notice, that the King would cause him to be arrested, withdrew to his Government of Champagne, were on the last day of December, he signed a private League with the King of Spain, who, on pretence of Religion, fought only to foment the troubles in France. But as the Duke would not have it appear, that he aspired to the Crown, the Treaty ran, that the Cardinal of Bourbon should be raised to the Throne, after the death of Henry III, and to that end, the King of Spain should find fifty thousand Crowns a month. Thus, by means of the Duke of Guise, Philip II. kindled in France a flame which long consumed that King-

In the beginning of the year 1585, Elizabeth discovered a Conspiracy, of which William Parry was the Author. He was a Gentleman of Wales, Member of the House of Commons, and had signalized his zeal for the Catholick Religion in opposing alone a Bill preferred in the lower House against the Jesuits. He spoke upon that occasion with so much passion and vehemence, that he was committed to custody (2), but [his submission being made] he was in a few days readmitted into the House. Hardly was he at liberty, when Edmund Nevil, who claimed the Inheritance of the Earl of Wiltmoreland lately deceased in the Low Countries (3), accused him of conspiring against the Queen; whereupon he was sent to the Tower. He owned, "he had a design to kill the Queen, and was persuaded to it by Morgan an English Catholick Refugee in France; that he held Intelligence with Jesuits, the Pope's Nuncios and Cardinals (4); that the better to deceive the Queen, and procure free access to her person, he returned from France into England, and discovered the whole Conspiracy to her; that afterwards, repenting of his wicked intention, he laid away his dagger every time he waited on her, lest he should be tempted to commit the murder; but at length, Cardinal Allen's Book, wherein he maintained it to be not only lawful, but honorable to kill Princes excommunicated, falling into his hands, he read it, and felt himself strongly encouraged to pursue his first design; that Nevil his accuser coming to dine with him, proposed to attempt something for the deliverance of the Queen of Scots, to which he answered, he had a greater design in his thoughts; that a few days after, Nevil coming to see him, they resolved to kill the Queen, as he rode abroad to take the air, and swore upon the Bible to keep the secret; but that in the mean while, Nevil hearing the news of the Earl of Wiltmoreland's death, accused him, in hopes of procuring the Earl's Inheritance, to which he laid claim." Upon this confession, he was condemned and executed.

This Conspiracy occasioned the Parliament to take extraordinary care of the Queen's and the Kingdom's welfare. The General Association was admitted, approved, and confirmed by unanimous consent (5). It was also enacted, "that twenty four [or more] Commissioners chosen and appointed by the Queen should make inquisition, concerning those who should endeavour to raise a Rebellion in the Kingdom, or attempt the Queen's life, or claim any Right to the Crown of England. That the person for whom, or by whom any attempt should be made, should be utterly incapable of succeeding to the Crown, deprived for ever of all Right and Title to it, and prosecuted to death, if declared guilty by the four and twenty Commissioners."

It was impossible not to see, that the Queen of Scots was directly aimed at, for whose sake all these plots were contriving. Wherefore, very probably, from this time her death began to be determined; the two Queens being no longer able to subsist together. The Council of England at least was of this opinion. Mary doubted not that the Law was enacted against her. Perhaps she would have prevented the fatal effects of it, could she have resolved to renounce all correspondence in the Kingdom, and in foreign Countries. But she had not the prudence to take this wise course, or perhaps, to avoid the snares laid for her, nor was quick-sighted enough to perceive, she only served for a blind to her pretended friends, to execute other projects.

The Parliament was not contented with this severe Statute for the Queen's preservation. It was farther enacted, "That all Popish Priests should depart the Realm within forty days: That those who should afterwards return, should be guilty of High-Treason: That to receive or harbour them should be Felony." It was declared also, "That those who were educated in foreign Seminaries, if they returned not into England within six months [after notice,] and made not their submission on [within two days after their return] before a Bishop, or two Justices of Peace, should be guilty of High-Treason. That if any Person submitting himself, should within ten years approach the Court, or come "within ten miles thereof, his submission should be void. That those who should directly or indirectly, convey any money to students, or others in such Seminaries, should incur the penalty of a Praemunire, loss of Goods, and perpetual exile. That if any of the Peers of the Realm should offend against this Act, they should be brought to their trial by their Peers. That if any person should know any Popish Priest or Jesuit, lurking in the Kingdom, and should not discover him within four days, he should be fined and imprisoned at the Queen's pleasure. That if any Man should be suspected to be a Priest or Jesuit, and refuse to submit himself to examination, he should be imprisoned till he did submit. That they who should send their Children to Popish Colleges or Seminaries, should be fined in one hundred Pounds Sterling. That if those who were sent thither, did not return within a year, they should be incapable to succeed as Heirs to any estate. That if the Wardens of the Ports should suffer any besides Merchants to cross the Seas, without the Queen's licence, signed by six Privy-Councillors, they should be turned out of their places. That the Masters of Ships who received any Passengers without such licence, should forfeit their Ships and Goods, suffer a year's imprisonment, and be incapable of exercising Navigation for the future."

This is the severest Act against the Catholicks in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. But they could blame only themselves, or rather the indirect zeal of some amongst them, who never ceased plotting against the Queen, and endeavoring to set the Queen of Scots on the throne of England. Even this Statute was not capable of stopping them, till at last they carried their zeal to such a height, that the destruction of one of the Queens became necessary for the preservation of the other (6).

Philip Earl of Arundel, eldest Son of the Duke of Norfolk, had, through the Queen's grace and favor, been restored in blood (7) and to his Father's estate three years before. But afterwards he embraced the Catholick Religion, and being twice cited before the Council to answer to certain accusations entered against him, was confined to his own House. Six months after he was released, and came to the House of Lords, but withdrew the very first day, not to be obliged to be present at the Sermon. As he was extremely addicted to his Religion, he resolved to leave the Kingdom to enjoy the free exercise of it, and before his departure writ a Letter to the Queen, which was not to be delivered till after he was gone. The Letter was full of complaints, that his innocence was oppressed. He said, "that to avoid the misfortune befallen his Grandfather, and Father, and to serve God with freedom, according to his conscience, he had resolved to quit the Kingdom, but not his Allegiance to his Sovereign." But being betrayed by his own Servants, he was apprehended, as he was going to embark, and sent to the Tower.

Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, brother to him that was beheaded, was in the same Tower, having been charged with being concerned in Throckmorton's Conspiracy, and with holding correspondence with the Lord Paget and the Duke of Guise. June 21st this year he was found dead in his bed, shot with three bullets under his left pap. As he was alone in his room, which was bolted on the inside, it was easy to see he had killed himself.

The calm Elizabeth had enjoyed for some years, began to be turned into Storms which threatened her from all quarters. This change must be ascribed to three principal causes. The first was the Duke of Guise's power, which was almost equal to that of the French King himself, Phillip II.'s flourishing condition may be reckoned a second, who, after acquiring the Kingdom of Portugal, was upon the point of reducing to his obedience the revolted Provinces of the Netherlands. The third was the hopes Queen Elizabeth's Enemies flattered themselves with, of gaining the King of Scotland, and making use of him to invade England. I mention not the Court of Rome, or the English Catholicks, who always continued in the same disposition, so there was nothing new in that respect. The Queen of Scots was ever the stumbling-block. It was that gave birth to all the contrivances. Her deliverance from captivity was desired, in order to set on her head the 1585. Crown of England and Scotland, and refore by her means the Catholick Religion in both Kingdoms. Such was the scheme of Elizabeth's enemies. She could not be ignorant of it, since they had purified it from the beginning of her Reign; as, on her part, she had made it her whole business to break their measures. But some advantages, she had hitherto enjoyed, began to fail her. These were first, the jealousy between the Crowns of France and Spain, which had restrained both from attacking her openly. Secondly, the French Huguenots had been sufficiently strong to support themselves, and disable the Court from attempting any thing against England. Thirdly, whilst the affairs of the Confederates in the Netherlands were prosperous, they had so employed the Spanish Forces, that it was not possible for Philip II. to think seriously of foreign affairs. But at the time I am speaking of, the scene was entirely altered. France was in such way, as Elizabeth could no longer build her safety upon the jealousy between the French and Spanish Crowns, that foundation being grown too weak. The Duke of Guise, her mortal enemy, was more powerful in France than the King himself, and besides, was supported by the King of Spain. Very probably the Huguenots would be entirely oppressed, and the Low-Countries soon brought under the Spanish yoke, after which, there was no doubt, England would be invaded. Elizabeth therefore was to think betimes of preventing the impending danger, or resolve to sustain alone the efforts of her enemies. Prudence required, that she should in the first place try to avoid the assaults which were preparing against her, without neglecting however the means of withstanding them, if she should be forced to it. The scheme she laid was this, as will plainly appear in the sequel. First, she resolved to make Alliances, if possible, with the two Northern Crowns and the German Protestants, though it were only to raise the jealousy of her enemies. Secondly, to send a strong aid to the Confederates of the Low-Countries, to keep the King of Spain employed there. Thirdly, to assist the French Huguenots, to prevent their being too easily oppressed, knowing the Duke of Guise would be unable to attempt any thing against her, so long as the civil Wars held him employed in France. Lastly, she thought there was no better way to break her Enemies measures, than to endeavour, if possible, to have the King of Scotland in her power, or, if that failed, to raise troubles in Scotland, which should hinder that young Prince from framing projects detrimental to England. It is also very likely, that at this time the death of the Queen of Scots was determined, since her Life was the foundation of all the Plots against Elizabeth both at home and abroad. At least, if this resolution was not absolutely taken, very probably, Elizabeth and her Council were determined not to spare Mary, when the necessity of affairs required her to be sacrificed to the public safety. I own this is only a conjecture, but it is built upon the situation of Elizabeth's affairs at that time.

To execute the first part of her scheme, she sent Sir Thomas Badley into Germany and Denmark, to endeavour to persuade the Protestant Princes to make a League defensive with England (1). He had orders, among other things, to acquaint the King of Denmark, that the Duke of Lorain, when he courted Elizabeth, pretended a right to the Crown of Denmark, as Grandson to Christian II. by his Daughter. I do not know the success of Badley's negotiations, but as Elizabeth was extremely afraid of her money, it is likely, she used not the properest means to gain the German Princes to her interest. I shall speak presently of the second and third Articles of Elizabeth's scheme, relating to France and the Netherlands. As to the fourth concerning Scotland, we find it explained in Melvil's Memoirs, if we may however give entire credit to this Author, who seems extremely prejudiced against Elizabeth.

The King of Scotland, being determined to marry, cast his eyes on the King of Denmark's eldest Daughter, who, having some notice of it, resolved to send an Embassy into Scotland, under colour of proposing an Alliance between the two Kingdoms, and withal to give King James an opportunity to propose his Marriage. Melvil pretends, Elizabeth having intelligence of the project, resolved to use her endeavours to render it abortive (2). Not that this Marriage was unsuitable for the King of Scotland, but it was requisite for Elizabeth that he should not marry, unless he would take an English Wife of her choosing, or rather, she wished to have him in her power before he was married. She writ to him therefore, that, to preserve with him always a good understanding, she intended to send an Ambassador, who should reside in his Court, not to trouble his Majesty with business, but entertain him with merry discourse, and bear him company in his recreation. That she had chosen for that purpose Edward Hutton, a man of wit and a great Traveller, imagining he would be very proper to divert him agreeably, and hoped he would take great delight in his conversation. Melvil, who was ordered to receive this Ambassador, remembered to have seen him formerly at Paris, at his Uncle Dr. Wotton's, the English Ambassador, and that, young as he was, he had insinuated that able Minister, the old Confiable Montmorency (3). He wanted the King of it, who regarded it not. On the contrary, he made this Ambassador partner of all his pleasures, and one of his greatest Favorites.

The Danish Ambassadors being arrived in Scotland, Affairs of Wotton and some of the King's Ministers caused them to receive so many mortifications, that they were going to return in very great discontent (4). But Melvil informing them of the state of Affairs, persuaded them to have patience, and indeed, the King being undeceived of some notions instilled into him against the King of Denmark, sent them back better satisfied. Shortly after he dispatched Peter Young (5) his Almoner to the same Prince, to thank him for his Embassy, and to acquaint him that he would very soon send Ambassadors to him. The real motive of Young's voyage was to see the King of Denmark's two Daughters, and inform the King his master of their qualifications.

In the mean while, the Earl of Arran's credit sensibly decreased, by the address of the master of Gray his Rival, who knew better how to manage the King. Moreover, Wotton helped with all his power to ruin the Favorite; for, besides that Elizabeth had no farther need of him, since she had won Gray, he was a man on whom she could not much rely. An accident also on the borders did the Earl of Arran great injury. Thomas Carr the Laird of Ferniburgh, who had married his Niece, holding a conference with Sir Francis Russell (6) the Earl of Bedford's Son, upon affairs relating to both Kingdoms, an Englishman being taken pilfering, raised a quarrel between the two Guards (7), wherein Russell was slain. The English Ambassador made great noise about this affair, pretending the Earl of Arran had stirred up this quarrel by his Nephew, to breed a rupture between the two Kingdoms. Upon his complaints, the Earl of Arran was confined to his own house, and Ferniburgh sent to prison, where he died quickly after.

Elizabeth having notice of this fact, demanded a solemn reparation. James did not refuse it; but pretended he could do nothing before he had proofs. This was not easy, by reason of the custom mentioned elsewhere, which allowed not the evidence of the English against the Scots, or of the Scots against the English, concerning what passed on the borders. This difficulty causing the affair to be prolonged, and the Earl of Arran having his liberty, Elizabeth took occasion to permit the Scotch fugitives, who had fled into England, to return home. Wotton being informed of the Queen's design, laboured to corrupt several Scotch Courtiers (8), and gain them to Elizabeth's interest. If Melvil is to be credited, the King's greatest confidants were of this number. Wherefore Wotton, finding himself so well supported, formed the project to surprise the King in Sterling Park and carry him into England. But being disappointed, he resolved to force the Guard of the Castle, and had now prepared every thing necessary to execute his design, when the King having some intelligence of it, broke his measures, by a sudden departure from Sterling. Then Hutton perceiving he was discovered, privately retired without taking leave. This was the Men sent by Elizabeth to King James, to entertain and divert him.

But all the danger was not over. James was surrounded with persons who corresponded with the fugitives, and hindered him from providing for his safety. The fugitive Lords were now entered Scotland, where they had drawn together three thousand Men, and were marching directly to Sterling, where the King was returned, without any precaution taken at Court to stop their proceedings. This negligence, caused by the Traitors about the King's person, afforded the Male contents an opportunity to come to the Gates of Sterling, where the King was so surpris'd, that he was forced to put himself into their hands: but the Earl of Arran had time to escape. The Male-contents having the King in their power, treated him with such respect and submission, that they perswaded him at length they were not his enemies, as he had been made to believe. He owned, he had been misled by Arran's pernicious Counsellors, and confessed that the exiles should be restored to their Estates. By this revolution, Elizabeth had the satisfaction to see the King of Scotland guided by Counsellors from whom she had nothing to fear, whereas before, she was under continual apprehensions with respect to the affairs of that Kingdom. Shortly after, Colonel Stewart going to Copenhagen, began there a Treaty about the King's Marriage with one of the Princesses of Denmark.

In the mean time, the affairs of the United Provinces were in so dangerous a situation, that the States could no longer hope to withstand the King of Spain, unless they were frongly assisted. Henry III. having refused the Sovereignty offered him by the States, they applied to Elizabeth, who also refused it, for fear of engaging in a very troublesome affair. She perceived, the War, she should be obliged to wage with Spain, for the preservation of this Sovereignty, would draw her into extraordinary charges, which she should not be at liberty to lessen as she pleased. She chose, rather, in pursuance of her Scheme, to give the States a powerful aid, and the King of Spain a diversion, so that this aid might be increased or lessened, according to the situation of her affairs. She made therefore a Treaty with them, promising to find them five thousand Foot (1), and a thousand Horse, under the Command of an English General. It was agreed, she should pay these Troops during the war, on condition of being repaid at the end of the war, namely, in the first year of the peace, the expences advanced in the first year of the war, and the rest in four years: That for security of payment, Flushing, and Rommesbeeke, in Zeeland, and the Briel in Holland, should be delivered into her hands: That the Governors, should place there (2), should exercise no Authority over the Inhabitants: That the money being repaid, these places should be restored, not to the King of Spain, but to the States: That the English General, and two others, whom she should name, should have a place in the Council of State, and no Peace or Truce be made, without a mutual consent: That if the Queen should send a Fleet to Sea, the States should be obliged to join it with an equal number of Ships, under the Command of the English Admiral. Lastly, That the Ports should be open and free to both Nations (3).

This Treaty being concluded, the Queen appointed for General of her auxiliary Forces, the Earl of Leicester, for whom she had ever a great affection; but he came not into Flanders till about the end of the year. Some time after, he published a Manifesto, wherein he alledged as reason for his aiding the confederate Provinces, that the Alliance between the Kings of England, and the Princes of the Netherlands, was not so much between their persons, as between their respective States. Whence he inferred, that without breach of this Alliance, he might assist the Inhabitants of the Low-Countries, oppressed by the Spaniards.

Mean while, as she judged this reason would not be satisfactory to the King of Spain, and that he would, doubtless, consider this extraordinary aid given his rebellious Subjects, as a declaration of war, she resolved to prevent him. To that purpose, she equipped a Fleet of one and twenty sail, wherein were embarked, two thousand three hundred Soldiers, besides Mariners, to carry war into America, where the Spaniards little expected any such thing. The Fleet was commanded by the Earl of Carlisle, who had under him the famous Sir Francis Drake (4). The English immediately took St. Jago, one of the Isles of Cape Verde. After that, they sailed to St. Domingo, or Hispaniola, and became masters of the Capital. Having spent there all January, of the year 1585, they went and took Caribagena. Then they burnt the Towns of St. Antonio, and St. Helena in Florida. A violent Storm dispersing the Fleet, as they were going upon new Expeditions, they joined not again till they came into England (5), where they brought a booty valued at sixty thousand pounds Sterling; but in this Expedition seven hundred Men perished.

At the same time, John Davis, an Englishman went (6) Davis's in search of a shorter passage, through the North of America, to the East-Indies. The Ice preventing his sailing, he long roved on the northern Seas, and accidentally discovered a Streight, under the polar Circle, which still bears his name, but was not what he sought (7).

Before I leave the year 1585, it will be necessary to relate what passed in France. After the Duke of Guise had concluded his Treaty with the King of Spain, he tried all ways to corrupt the French, and gain them to his party. His aim was to seize the Crown, either before or after Henry III's death. He could not expect, that the King, who hated him mortally, would countenance his design; and on the other hand, he had no manner of doubt to aspire to the Crown, except his pretended defect from the House of Charles the Great. And even in that case, the Duke of Lorraine, head of that House, would have been before him. To assert therefore his extraordinary Title, the people's affection, and a religious zeal, were to supply all defects, otherwise there was not the least appearance, that, in cold blood, the Duke should sit on the Throne, after the King's death, a foreign Prince, in prejudice of the King of Navarre, who was descended from St. Lewis. To accomplish his project, the Duke of Guise began, by means of his Emisaries, to disparage the King, as a favourer of Heretics, and to rouse the zeal of the Catholics against the Huguenots, and particularly against the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde, who professed the Reformed Religion, after a public abjuration. Mean while, as the Duke of Guise did not think proper to discover his designs, he published a Manifesto in the Cardinal de Bourbon's name, wherein he pretended to demonstrate, that the Crown belonged to the Cardinal after the King's death. Not that he desired to place him on the Throne; but it was sufficient, first, to set aside the King of Navarre. That done, under colour of hindering the Throne from being filled with a Heretic, he possessed himself of several places, pretending however, it was for the King's service, and the good of the Realm.

The life led by the King for some time, caused him to forfeit the esteem of most of his Subjects. The Duke of Guise's intrigues, who represented him as a favourer of Heretics, because he supported the House of Bourbon's title, helped also to alienate the people from him. In short, the Court of Rome, the Clergy, the Priests, were for the Duke of Guise, and served him to the utmost of their power. So, the King, being unable to resist, was forced to forsake the King of Navarre, publish an Edict against the Huguenots, and join with the Duke in their extirpation. Nay, he had the vexation to be obliged to give him the Command of the Army.

The King of Navarre, and the Huguenots, finding Elizabeth themselves thus attacked, assembled all their Forces in their defence. But these Forces were so inconsiderable, in comparison of their Enemies, that there was no likelihood of their withstanding them long. The Prince of Conde, attempting to relieve the Castle of Angers, which was besieged, was suddenly surrounded by enemies, and forced to steal away from his army, and fly into England. Elizabeth received him very civilly, and as she knew the enemies of the Huguenots were also hers, promised to assist him (8). It was not without reason that the concerned herself with the affairs of the Huguenots, since the League was not limited to their destruction, but aimed at the ruin of the Protestant Religion throughout Europe, and especially in England. Of this had been seen a very sensible proof this same year. Gregory XIII. dying in April, Sixtus V. his Successor, thundered immediately the Censures of the Church against the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde, calling them not only Heretics and Relapies, but also a bastard Progeny. Hence it was easy to see, how much the Pope countenanced the Duke of Guise's designs, and the Queen of England might infer, how great reason she had to fear, if this Duke should one 1586. The Earl of Leicester being arrived in Holland the beginning of the year 1586, was received as a Guardian Angel (1). The States, under colour of expressing their gratitude to Elizabeth, declared him (2) Governor, and Captain-General of Holland, Zealand, and the United Provinces, and invested him with almost an absolute power (3). Very probably, their aim was to engage the Queen farther than the intended. She had refused the offered Sovereignty, and it was designed to give it her in some measure, whether she would or no, by investing her General with almost a Sovereign Authority. But Elizabeth was too wise to be ensnared by this artifice. She sharply complained to the States, of this sort of deceit, and gave withal the Earl of Leicester a severe reprimand, for accepting the honour, without having first consulted her. She told him, he had acted directly contrary to her intention, since she had publicly declared in her Manifesto, that she was very ready to relieve her distressed neighbours, but never meant to assume any power over them (4). The States excused themselves, by saying, the necessity of their affairs had obliged them to confer such an Authority on the Earl of Leicester, that he might be the better able to heal their divisions, which put them in continual danger of perishing: That they could not revoke the Authority granted to her General, without great inconveniences, and had not however divested themselves of the supreme power. The Earl of Leicester appealed the Queen by his submissions. In fine, she consented the Patent should subsist; but intimated to the States, they vainly hoped to induce her to accept of the Sovereignty of their Country, and that her intention was to keep within the bounds she had prescribed to herself, that is, not to be obliged to assist them any farther than her affairs would permit.

The Earl of Leicester, a Man of great pride and ambition, was no sooner clothed with this exorbitant power, than he began secretly to form projects, destructive of the Liberties of the Country he was come to defend. At least, this is what all the Dutch Historians tax him with. They pretend, his design was to render himself Sovereign or perpetual Dictator of the Provinces, with whose Government he had been entrusted. He made use of such means, as bred an universal discontent against him. In short, after a Campaign, wherein he performed no great exploits, he returned to England, to take proper measures to facilitate the execution of his projects, and probably, to persuade the Queen to support him (5).

Whilst France and the Netherlands were in commotion, Elizabeth wisely provided for her own and her People's Security. This she did not only by assisting the Huguenots and the confederate Provinces, but also by preventing the dangers which might come from Scotland, in case the King of Spain and Duke of Guise should be ever able to invade her (6). The present juncture was very favorable. The King of Scotland had about him only men well-affected to the Reformed Religion, and the interest of England. This opportunity therefore was not to be neglected, of strictly uniting the two Kingdoms; this union being of the utmost consequence to Elizabeth. Accordingly, she dispatched Randolph to King James, to represent to him, that the enemies of the Protestant Religion openly joining together for its destruction, it was the interest of the Protestant States to unite also for their common defence. That England and Scotland were the bulwarks of the true Religion, and the union of their Forces the only possible means to preserve it. That therefore, she thought it their common interest to join in a league for the defence of their Religion, against all who should attempt to destroy it, at least in England and Scotland. The better to persuade the King to do what the Queen desired, Randolph told him, that as his Revenues were extremely diminished, by reason of the Troubles which had so long afflicted his Kingdom, the Queen was willing to grant him a Pension to assist him in supporting his Dignity (7). James readily consented to what was proposed to him, but on condition, nothing should be done in England in prejudice to his right to the Crown of that Kingdom, and this article, with that of the Pension, be inserted in the Treaty. Randolph answered, he did not believe that would be possible. As to the Pension, he said, if it was put into the Treaty, the Queen would seem to be tributary to Scotland, to which she would never agree. As to the article of the Succession, the Queen could not settle it by a publick Treaty, without the concurrence of the Parliament, and the discussion of such an affair might retard the Treaty too long, and perhaps give birth to great Difficulties, because of the Queen's Mother's Religion: but he did not question, Elizabeth would be very willing to satisfy him in those two points, by means of two secret articles. James being contented with this expedient, Desneval the French Ambassador did all that lay in his power to dissuade him from this League. He told him, that Elizabeth's aim was only to secure herself from the attacks of those who were combined for the deliverance of Queen Mary. That it was a strange thing he should think of uniting with a Queen, who kept his Mother in prison, against those who were labouring to free her from captivity. He added, the King his Master could not but consider this league as an express breach of the ancient Alliance between France and Scotland. James answered, that the Queen his Mother's misfortunes proceeded wholly from her own Friends, who, under colour of serving her, only aimed at executing their own Projects. That, as to the alliance between France and Scotland, he did not see wherein he should violate it, since France pretended not to break it, when, without signifying it to him, she made a league defensive with England.

James having resolved upon what the Queen desired, the Plenipotentiaries of the two Kingdoms met at Berwick, and signed a Treaty of Alliance and stricter Amity between the two Crowns (8).

The motive of the Treaty was, that whereas the Princess, who called themselves Catholics, were entered into leagues for extirpating the Protestant Religion, not only in their own Dominions, but also in foreign Countries, it was necessary, the Protestants should unite for its defence. That therefore the Queen of England and King of Scotland did agree upon the following articles.

I. By this Treaty, they shall be obliged to defend the Evangelical Religion against all those who shall attack it in either Kingdom.

II. This league shall be offensive and defensive against those who shall hinder the free exercise of the said Religion in either of the two Kingdoms, all other Treaties and Alliances to the contrary notwithstanding.

III. If one of the two Parties be invaded, the other shall not directly or indirectly assist the invader, notwithstanding any Alliance or Treaty formerly entered into.

IV. If England be invaded in any parts remote from Scotland, the King of Scotland shall find the Queen of England two thousand Horse and five thousand Foot, at the Queen's charges, from the day of their entering England; and in the like case, the Queen shall send the King of Scotland six thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse.

V. If England be invaded in any place within sixty miles of Scotland, the King of Scotland shall draw together all his forces, and join the same with the Queen's, in order to pursue the invaders for the space of thirty days together, or if necessity require, for so long time as the Vassals of Scotland are bound to furnish the King with Troops for the defence of the Kingdom.

VI. If Ireland be invaded, the King of Scotland shall hinder the inhabitants of the County of Argyle from entering in a hostile manner into that Kingdom.

VII. The King and Queen shall mutually deliver all Rebels, who shall have attempted any thing against either of the two Kingdoms, or at least, they shall compel them to retire from their Dominions.

VIII. Within six months, Commissioners shall be sent to compound and adjust all differences, which have happened on the borders between the two Nations.

1886. several blank papers, made up like Letters, were sent at first, and as it was known by the answers, that they were delivered, he was employed without scruple. Some time after, Gifford, whether struck with remorse, or allured with the hopes of reward, came to Walsingham, and informed him of all he knew. The Secretary received him very kindly, and promised to use his Interest for him with the Queen, and procure him a good reward. Then instructing him how to behave, he sent him to the place where the Queen of Scots was kept, with a Letter to Sir Amias Poulet, desiring him to connive at the Bearer's corrupting one of his Servants to deliver Letters to the Queen of Scotland, and bring back her answers. But Poulet would not suffer any of his Domesticks to be concerned in such an Intrigue. He only hinted at a certain Brewer, whom he thought fit for the purpose, and who indeed suffered himself to be corrupted. By this means, Gifford conveyed to the captive Queen, Letters, whereof Walsingham had taken copies (1), and received her answers, which were served in the same manner. At length when the Court was sufficiently instructed, Ballard was apprehended, under colour, that being a popish Priest, he had entered the Kingdom without a license. At this news, Babington was in the utmost consternation. He recovered however out of his fright, as it did not appear, that Ballard was arrested for the Conspiracy, and nothing was said at Court, intimating the discovery of the plot. He resolved therefore to try to save Ballard, and to that end, repented to Walsingham, that he would be of great service to him in France, to discover the secret practices of the Queen of Scots, and intreated him for his release. Walsingham laid the blame of Ballard's being arrested, upon the wantfulness of the Spies, employed to discover the popish Priests and Jesuits. He promised to endeavour to procure his release, and ted him with hopes that the Pais-ports would be ready very soon. Mean while, he so managed, that Babington was narrowly watched. In short, Babington, and all the rest of the Conspirators were seized at the same time, and being severally examined, impeached one another, and discovered the whole plot (2).

It is very likely, as I said, that Queen Elizabeth's Council had resolved, on the first pretence, to put the Queen of Scots to death. Her life continually endangered Elizabeth's, and of this there was too much reason to be convinced, by the late discoveries. So this opportunity was embraced. Great care was taken to hinder her being informed of the taking of the Conspirators, and Sir Thomas Gorges an Officer, was sent to acquaint her with it, who surprized her with the news, just as she had taken horse to ride a hunting. She would have returned to her apartment, but was not permitted (3) till such time as all her papers were seized and sent to Court. Naue and Curlie her Secretaries, the one a Frenchman, the other a Scot, were apprehended at the same time, and without being suffered to speak with her, conducted to London. But to have still more convincing proofs against her, a method was used, which succeeded according to expectation. Gifford having revealed, that he had delivered to the French Ambassador, several papers of moment concerning the Queen of Scots, a false Action, no way relating to the Conspiracy, was brought against him, for which he was banished the Realm. Before his departure, he waited on the Ambassador, and acquainting him with the Sentence passed upon him, left a paper cut after a certain manner, and charged him to deliver the Queen of Scots papers, to him only, that should produce the counter-part. Which counter-part he gave to Walsingham, who by that means came at every thing the Ambassador had in his hands (4).

The Court being thus sufficiently informed of all the circumstances of the plot, fourteen of the Conspirators were arraigned, who received Sentence of death, and confessed all (5). Care was taken before their execution, to record all their Confessions. Naue and Curle, Mary's Secretaries, being examined, confessed they had writ in cypher, the Letters found in the Queen their Mistress's Cabinet (6), or intercepted by Gifford's means. Camden p. 581. insinuates here, that Curle was bribed by Wolfgangham with the promise of a reward, which he afterwards refused to perform. However this be, Sir Edward Wotton was sent to the Court of France, with authentick copies, attested by several Lords, of the Queen of Scots Letters, that he might show them to the King. Probably, these Letters discovered how far Mary was concerned in the plot, and her correspondence with the King of Spain, and the Duke of Guise.

At last, the resolution being taken of trying and condemning Queen Mary (7), as the prime cause of the dangers to which Elizabeth was continually exposed, it was debated, on what Statute she should be proceeded against. But there was only one that could serve for that purpose, namely, the Act passed the last year, which concerned her in particular. It was so uncommon a case, to try a foreign Queen, who was come not armed into the Kingdom, but to seek for refuge as a Supplicant, that it would have been in vain to search, in all the antient Statutes; after any thing to serve for ground to such a proceeding. This gives occasion to presume, when this Act was made the last year, the Queen of Scots death was already determined, and this Statute was to serve for foundation to her Sentence. Some however pretend, the intent of this Act was only to keep her in awe, and let her see what she was to expect, if she continued her practices, and that it was her own fault if she did not make a good use of this warning. Wherefore in virtue of this Act, Elizabeth, by Letters Patents under the Great Seal, appointed forty two Commissioners, with whom she joined five Judges of the Realm, to try the Queen of Scots. Some days before, certain Lords, and few Privy-Councillors as others, fell on their knees, and besought her to take pity on herself, the whole Nation, and all their Posterity, by punishing the Queen of Scots. It must be observed, that throughout this whole affair, Elizabeth always pretended to act with regret, and from the necessity she was under of saving her people, whom she beheld in extreme danger. So, the proceeding of these Lords agreed with her designs. The Queen's Commission ran in this manner :

Elizabeth, by the grace of God, of England, France and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c. To the most Reverend Father in Christ, John Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitan of all England, and one of our Privy-Council; and to our trusty and well-beloved Sir Thomas Bromley Knight, Chancellor of England, and &c. Greeting (8).

To you, and the greater part of you, we do give full and absolute Power, Faculty, and Authority, according to the tenour of the said Act, to examine all and singular matters compassed and imagined, tending to the hurt of our Royal Person, as well by the aforesaid Mary, as by any other Person or Persons whatsoever, with the privy of the same Mary, and all circumstances of the same and all other Offences aforesaid, in the Act aforesaid, as aforesaid, mentioned, and all circumstances of the same, and of every of them; and thereupon, according to the tenor of the Act aforesaid, to give Sentence or Judgment, as upon good proof of the matter shall appear to you. And therefore we do command you, that you at certain Days and Places, which you, or the greater part of you, shall thereunto fore-appoint, diligently proceed upon the Premises in form aforesaid, &c. (1).*

Remark on the Judges.

It must be observed, that among the Commissioners were the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, and Secretary Walsingham, both Elizabeth's most trusty Ministers, known Enemies of the Queen of Scots, and probably, authors and promoters of the resolution to bring her to a trial. As it was hard to believe, that Elizabeth had taken such a resolution without imparting it to her Ministers and Council, and without her Council's approbation, it should seem she ought not to have appointed her Ministers and Privy-Counsellors for Mary's Judges. But on the other hand, as she was willing to be sure of the success of the trial, she had a mind doubts, that Persons of so great weight as Ministers and Privy-Counsellors, should be ready to turn the scale, in case of opposition from the other Judges.

The Commission is not read to Mary.

Thirty-six of the Commissioners meeting the 11th (2) of October at Fotheringhay-Castle in the County of Northampton, where the Queen of Scots was then in custody, sent her Queen Elizabeth's Letter (3), which when she had read, she answered, "she was sorry the Queen her Sister was misinformed of her. That she had ever thought, the Association, and the subsequent Act of Parliament, aimed wholly at her, and that she should bear the blame of whatever was contrived in foreign Countries. That it was very strange, the Queen of England should consider her as a subject, and command her to submit to a trial. That she was a sovereign Queen, and would do nothing prejudicial to Royal Majesty, to herself, or the King her Son. That besides, the Laws and Statutes of England were unknown to her, and who were her Peers she could not tell. That she was destitute of Counsellors, and all her Papers were taken from her. That she had stirred up no Man against Elizabeth, nor committed any crime. That she was not to be charged but upon her own words or writings, and she was sure nothing criminal could be produced against her, except the recommending her cause to foreign Princes, which she did not pretend to deny."

She refuses to answer.

On the morrow, the Commissioners sent her (4) a copy of her answer, and after it was read to her, she said, "it was rightly taken, but she had forgot one very material thing, namely, that it was said in Elizabeth's Letters (5), she was subject to the Laws of England, because she had long lived under their Protection, but all the world knew, she came into England to crave the assistance of the Queen her Sister, and had been ever since detained in prison; and therefore had not enjoyed the protection of the Laws, nay, had not been able to understand what manner of Laws they were."

Hutton permitts her to plead, amended.

To be short, the disputed two whole days the authority of the Judges, and would not own, that in any case Elizabeth had other jurisdiction over her, than what was usurped by force. Nay, she persisted in it, after she was threatened to be sentenced for non-appearance, as an absent person. But at last, Hutton, one of the Commissioners, made a speech to her which shook her resolution. He told her, "that indeed she was accused, but not condemned: That if she were innocent, she injured her reputation extremely in avoiding a Trial: That the Queen would "be very glad nothing could be proved against her, as he heard her say himself when he took his leave of her (6)."

Had Mary been provided with Council, she would doubts have been told that Hutton's speech tended only to inflame her, and engage her to answer that she might be condemned by a peremptory Sentence. If she had persisted in her refusal, Elizabeth would have been perhaps greatly embarrassed. Though she was resolved to put her to death, she wished however that the publick was convinced of the justice of the thing, in order to avoid part of the blame of so rigorous a proceeding. But a sentence given upon non-appearance would not have produced this effect, since it could not be denied, that the refusing to plead was founded upon very good reasons. Mary stood out however till the 14th of October, when sending for some of the Commissioners, she told them, Hutton's argument had convinced her of the necessity to make her innocence appear. Adding, she consented therefore to answer before them, provided her protestation were admitted; to which the Commissioners agreed, without approving however the reasons on which it was grounded.

Presently after, the Judges met in the Hall of the Castle, to the number of Thirty-six, and the Queen came to the same place (7). When they were seated, the Chancellor turning to Mary, said, "She was accused of conspiring the destruction of the Queen, the realm of England, and the Protestant Religion, and they were commissioned to examine the truth of the Accusation, and to hear her answer." The Chancellor having done this, the Queen rose up and said, "That she came into England to crave the aid which had been promised her. That she was a Queen, and no subject. And if she appeared before them, it was only to secure her honour and reputation." The Chancellor would not own that any aid had been promised her. As to the Protestation, he answered, "it was in vain, since the Law upon which the accusation was grounded, allowed of no distinction in the persons of the transgressors, and therefore it was not to be admitted." The Court ordered however that the Protestation should be recorded, with the Chancellor's answer.

This done, the Attorney-General read to her aloud [the Commission with] the Act of Parliament (8), and after an account of Babington's plot, concluded, that Mary had broken the Act, because she knew of the conspiracy, and even showed the ways and means to effect it. She answered, "she knew not Babington, or ever saw him; nor any Letters from him, or wrote any to him. She never plotted the Queen's destruction, and to prove any such thing, Letters under her own hand ought to be produced, which was impossible. She knew not Ballard, nor ever heard of him, and in a word, being a Prisoner, she could not hinder the Plots of others."

Whereupon the Copies of Babington's Letters to her were read, containing all the circumstances of the conspiracy (9). It should seem, since her Papers were seized, Babington's original Letters might have been produced. But as probably she had burnt them, only the Copies could be used, which Walsingham took when he had the Originals in his hands. To this Mary answered, "Babington might possibly write these Letters, and therefore the point was not to know whether he wrote them or not, but whether she received them." To prove this, there was read Babington's confession, before his execution, wherein he said, he had sent several Letters to the Queen of Scots, and received several from her. After that, were read the copies of certain Letters in cypher from Mary to Babington, which he had received, where mention was made of the Earls of Arundel and Northumberland. Then the Queen with tears in her eyes, said aloud, Alas! what has the noble House of the Howards endured for my sake! She added, that Babington might write what he pleased: That as for her own Letters in cypher, which were produced, she knew nothing of them, and it was very easy for her enemies to get her cyphers, and write forged Letters in

(3) Rapin says, by mistake, the Commission was sent to her. The Letters were sent next day to Mary, by Sir Walter Mildmay, Poulet, and Edward Boleyn, Publick Notary, who were deputed by the Commissioners. Canden, p. 520.

(5) To this the Queen replied, That she refused not to answer in full Parliament, provided she might be declared the next in Succession; yea, before the Queen and her Council, so as her Protestation was admitted, and she was acknowledged the next of kin to the Queen; but to the judgment of her adversaries she would never submit. Canden, p. 521.

(6) At the upper end of the room was placed a Chair of State for the Queen of England, under a Canopy of State. Over against it, below, at some distance, near the Beam that ran across the room, stood a Chair for the Queen of Scots. By the Walls on both sides were placed Benches, on which sat the Commissioners. Canden, p. 522. — Thuanus observes, that some of these Commissioners were Papists, — in quo tuere nonnulli Majorum reli-

(7) She read the Commission to her in which the Act was specified. Whereupon she boldly and resolutely offered her Protestation against the said Act, as made unjustly and unjustly against her. But upon the Lord Treasurer's saying, every Person in the Kingdom was bound by the Laws, though never to be liable made; and that the Commissioners were resolved to proceed according to that Law, what Protestations soever she interposed, she answered at length, That she was ready to bear and answer touching any Fault whatsoever committed against the Queen of England. Canden, p. 522.

(8) What she said to this, was, That there had passed Letters betwixt her and many Men, yet it could not thence be inferred, that she was privy to all or all wicked designs. Ibid.

"her name: That in short, the Letters were not her hand-writing; and besides, it was not likely, that to execute the design she was charged with, she should employ the Earl of Arundel, who was Prisoner in the Tower, or the Earl of Northumberland, who was very young, and to her entirely unknown."

There were also read Savage's and Ballard's Confessions, which ran, That Babington communicated to them several Letters, which he had received from the Queen of Scots. To this she answered, with a protestation, that Babington never received any from her.

Before I proceed, I shall here make two or three short remarks. First, it is surprising that Babington, Savage, and Ballard should be executed before the Queen of Scots Trial, since their testimony was used against her. In the next place, hitherto the whole evidence consisted only in Babington's Confession, that he had received Letters from the Queen of Scots: but as he was dead, it could not be proved that these were the same Letters that were read, which too were only copies of Letters decyphered. My third remark is, that though Mary protested, she never received any Letters from Babington, nor writ any to him, Camden must have been satisfied of the contrary, since in his account of the Conspiracy, he speaks of a correspondence by Letters between Mary and Babington as a thing certain. This is farther confirmed by a little Book, entitled, The History of the Martyrdom of the Queen of Scots, printed at Paris in 1589, where the Author, though a great friend of Queen Mary, does not deny that she held a correspondence with Babington (1).

After this were produced several Letters in cypher from the Queen of Scots, wherein she approved of the Conspiracy. These were probably the Letters, Walsingham intercepted by Gifford's means, or those he artfully drew out of the hands of the French Ambassador. The Queen answered, she writ not those Letters, and probably they were forged by her alphabet of cyphers in France, and accused Walsingham of doing it, who so cleared himself, as the seemed satisfied with his answer (2). But to prove that she writ them, the Confessions of Nave and Curle, her Secretaries were produced, who owned they writ them by her order.

This is all that passed in the first Session, the 14th of October. In the afternoon were read the copies of the Letters received by Mary, concerning the Conference at Paris between Ballard, Paget, and Mendoza, for invading England, and it was proved by the testimony of Curle her Secretary, that she had received them. She answered, This did not prove her intention to kill the Queen. It is proper to observe here, she was accused of three things; of conspiring the Queen's death; of procuring England to be invaded; and of contriving the destruction of the Protestant Religion. She considered the first, as the principal, to which she was very ready to answer, well knowing she could not, without great injustice, be condemned for the other two. In answer to the proof taken from the testimony of her Secretaries, she said, "She believed Curle the Scot to be an honest Man (3), but had not the same opinion of Nave the Frenchman, who might possibly be corrupted: besides, he abused Curle's easiness in such a manner, that he made him write what he pleased. In a word, her Secretaries might insert in her Letters things which she never dictated; and therefore, she ought to be convicted only by her own hand-writing, and not by that of her Secretaries, who would assuredly clear her if they were present."

It cannot be denied that this proceeding was very irregular; first, because three men had been put to death, on whose evidence it was pretended to convict the Queen: Secondly, as her Secretaries, who were alive, were never brought face to face, tho' their testimony was used. This was the more strange, as by an Act of Parliament passed in the 13th year of this very Reign, it was expressly ordained, that the witnesses should be confronted with the parties accused.

Upon this account, doubtless, it was, that the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, perceiving the embarrassment occasioned by the Queen's answer, grounded on the Laws of England, thought proper to proceed to other matters. He charged her therefore with having intentions to send the King her Son into Spain, and resign to Philip II. her Right to the Kingdom of England. It is easy to perceive, the first of these accusations was very foreign to the purpose, since the affairs of Scotland were not in dispute. Accordingly she made no answer to it. As to the second, the only said, "That by her birth she was presumptive Heir to Queen Elizabeth, and it was lawful to convey her Right to whom she pleased; but that all this amounted not to any proof of her having consented to the project of killing the Queen."

It being objected to her, that she sent her alphabet of cyphers to some Roman Catholics, as Curle had testified, she denied it not, and briefly answered, "It was not unlawful to hold correspondence, and negotiate her concerns with Men of her Religion." But these objections served only to divert them from the main point, since none of these things were contained in the accusation. At last, she was again urged with the testimonies of her Secretaries, to which she made the same answer as before, protesting she knew neither Babington nor Ballard. But, said the Lord Treasurer, you knew Morgan very well, who sent Parry over to kill the Queen, and have assigned him a pension. To this she answered, "She was ignorant of what Morgan had done, but knew that he had lost all for her sake, and she might as well give him a pension, as Elizabeth give one to Patrick Gray, and the King himself."

Then they proceeded to the other two Articles of the Impeachment, concerning the Invasion of the Kingdom, and the destruction of the Protestant Religion; and to prove that Mary was concerned in these plots, the Letters were read which she writ to Mendoza, Inglesfield, and the Lord Paget. She answered, "That these things did not prove, she had any hand in the Conspiracy against the Queen's life: That she had nothing to say to the rest, and had often declared to the Queen herself, she would try all things to procure her own liberty." In this manner passed the second Session.

The next day, the Court being met, Mary repeated her Protestation against the authority of her Judges, and required it to be recorded, and a copy delivered to her. She complained, "That all her offers for an accommodation were rejected (4), and herself most unworthily dealt with, whilst all her Letters were publicly read, in which were many things no way relating to the Impeachment." To this the Lord Treasurer replied, "That he was going to answer her in a double capacity, as Commissioner, and as Privy-Counsellor. As Commissioner, he told her, her Protestation was recorded, and a copy thereof should be delivered her. As to their authority, it was grounded on the power conferred on them by Letters Patents under the Queen's own hand, and the Great Seal. That for the perusing her Letters, which she complained of, it was necessary to read them whole and entire, because they contained things, which by their circumstances were so interwoven, that there was no separating them." Here she interrupted him, and said, "Though the circumstances were proved, it would signify nothing, if the principal fact was not. That her Integrity depended not upon the credit of her Secretaries, since they might very possibly be corrupted: That these Letters having no superscription, might be directed to others, and many things inserted without her knowledge; but if she had her papers, she could the more easily vindicate herself." The Lord Treasurer answered, "Nothing should be objected but what passed since the 19th of June last, concerning which her memory could furnish her, with what she thought requisite for her defence: That her papers would be of no service to her, since Babington, and her Secretaries, without putting to the rack, had owned, these Letters came from her: That it was left to the Commissioners to judge, whether more credit were to be given to her bare negation, than to their affirmation." He added, as a Privy-Counsellor, "that it was true, She had made several essays to procure her liberty, and if they proved fruitless, it was owing to herself and the Scots: That

ings.

(1) Ibanus also affirms, that Babington and Ballard confessed, and their intercepted Letters confirmed the same, that Mary was informed of the Conspiracy, and the design of detroying Queen Elizabeth was undertaken for her sake, and upon her account. — Qui testem interrogati, se post confessiones suas se commissum, sique ex ipsius interceptis postremo convicti, in eo conveniunt, ut Mariam facti in signum, atque ejus causa conjurationem susceptam ad Elizabethum & melius tollendam dicerent, l. 86. And the Continuator of Hollingshead says, that the Conspirators owned, the Scottish Queen to be the principal confessor, director, and imbracer of their Treasons, p. 1578.

(2) Upon her charging Walsingham with forging the Letters, he rose up, and protesting that his Heart was free from all malice, said, I call God to witness, that, as a private Person, I have done nothing unworthy an honest Man; neither in my publick Condition and Quality have I done any thing unworthy of my Place. I confess that, out of my great care for the safety of the Queen and Realm, I have diligently endeavored to search and sift out all Plots and Designs against the same. If Ballard had offered me his assistance, I should not have refused it, nor I should have rewarded him for his pains and services. If I have compassed any thing against him, why did he not discover it to save his life? With this answer (the fact) was satisfied; and prayed him not to be angry that she had spoken so freely what she had heard reported, and that he would give no more credit to those that insinuated her, than she did to such as accused him. Spies, (he said) were Men of little credit, and desired he would not in the least believe, that ever she had consented to Queen Elizabeth's destruction. Camden, p. 323.

1580. "the Lords of Scotland had refused to give the King in "hottage, and when the last Treaty was holden concern"ing her release, Morgan her Vassal, sent Parry into "England to kill the Queen." Mary easily perceived the venom of these words, whereby, under colour of justifying the Council, the Lord Treasurer would have intimated to the other Commissioners, that she was concerned in Parry's plot. Wherefore, upon hearing him say this, Ab!
(said he) you are my adversary. Yes, (said he) I am adversary to all Queen Elizabeth's enemies.

Now were read again her Letters to Charles Paget, wherein she told him, there was no other way for the King of Spain to reduce the rebellious Netherlanders, but by setting a Catholick on the Throne of England. There was read likewise, the copy of Cardinal Allen's Letter to her, wherein he called her his most dread Sovereign Lady, and told her, the business was recommended to the Prince of Parma's care. She answered, still adhering to the first Article of the Impeachment, "That Babington, and her "Secretaries, had accused her to save themselves: That "she had never heard of the six murderers, and all the "rest was of no service to prove the principal crime for "which she was accused of: That she held Allen for a reverend "Prelate, and acknowledge the Pope for the true Head of "the Church; neither could she hinder Foreigners from "giving her what Titles they pleased: That as for her
"Secretaries, she was willing to add to what she had al"ready said of them, that they deserved no credit, for as "they had sworn secrecy to her, they could be deemed
"no other than perjured persons, when they gave in their "evidence against her: That Naue had often writ other"wise than she dictated, and Curle, whatever Naue bid
"him: That they had possibly confessed several falsehoods "to save their lives, imagining, that her Royalty would "screen her from punishment: That she had never "heard of any such Man as Ballard, but of one Hallard, "who had offered her his service, which however she "refused, because she knew him to be one of Walsing- "ham's Spies." It must be confessed, Mary was afforded great advantage, in not confronting the witnesses, though it be a necessary formality in criminal Trials.

Lastly, were read some particular passages out of Mary's Letters to Mendoza, wherein mention was made of her desire to convey to the Spaniards, her Right to the Crown of England. To this she answered, "That she being "close prisoner, and in a declining condition, it seemed "good to her friends, that the Succession to the Crown of "England should be settled upon the King of Spain, or "some English Catholick; and that a Book was sent her "to justify the Spaniard's Title, which she would not "read; but desiring to recover her liberty by any "other means, she had resolved not to refuse foreign as"sistance." When she had done speaking, the Lord Treasurer asked her if she had any more to say in her defence (1). To which she answered, "That she re"quired to be heard in full Parliament, or before the "Queen and Council (2)." Then the Court adjourned till the 25th of October to the Star-Chamber at West- minster.

Remark on Camden's Recital.

This is Camden's account of the Queen of Scots Trial at Fotheringhay. As there are no better Memoirs, we are forced as it were to suppose what he says to be true.
There is however too much cause to suspect, he has curtailed or altered in several places, what he pretends to take from the Register's Memoirs. For instance, it may easily be remarked in this Narrative, that whatever is objected to the Queen of Scots, is indeterminate and general, without descending to particulars. Of all the Letters that were read for her conviction, he cites not one extract; so that she seems to have been accused of holding a correspondence by Letters with Babington, and other of Elizabeth's enemies, rather than of ingaging in a settled plot to kill the Queen, though this was the principal point.
In a word, this Historian's partiality for the Queen of Scots on other occasions, gives reason to think, he did not forget himself in this capital Article, but used all his Art to render doubtful the fact she was accused of. However, as this is only a conjecture, I do not pretend to insist upon it (3). I shall content my self, in order to clear this affair, with making some observations on this famous Trial.

It is hardly to be questioned, that Mary's death was determined, when Elizabeth, and her Council, resolved to have her tried by Commissioners. But it must not be imagined, their intention was to punish her for attempting the Life of Elizabeth. If that had been all, they would never have proceeded to extremities, but would, doubtless, have been satisfied with putting it out of her power to contrive any such plots for the future, which would have been easy, by confining her more closely. But it was so easy to hinder the Queen, the King, the Spaniards, the of Guise, the English Catholicks, the Hijis, the Scots Male contents, from considering her as a Princess to whom of Right belonged the two Crowns of England and Scotland, and from using their continual endeavours to restore her to the Throne of Scotland, and place her on that of England, even in Elizabeth's Life-time. Though she had been so closely confined, that she could not herself have been concerned in these plots, it would not have prevented her friends from acting in her favour. Nothing therefore but her death could break their measures, and put an end to the plots which were daily framing on her account. So, it might with truth be said, that as Eliza- beth's death was Mary's life, so Mary's death alone could preserve Elizabeth, and with her, Liberty, and the Protestant Religion in England. But as it was not likely, Mary, who was the younger, should depart first out of this world by a natural death, recourse was to be had to violence, that the Queen, and the Realm, might be freed from their imminent danger. The share, Mary had in Babington's Conspiracy, and which, probably, was greater than what Camden intimates, was not therefore the cause of her condemnation, but the pretence used to be rid of a Queen, on whose life Elizabeth's adversaries built all their hopes. It was therefore Mary's own friends that occasioned her misfortune, by serving her too zealously, or rather, by making her their Instrument to execute their grand projects against the Protestant Religion. The Pope flattered himself with restoring, by her means, the Catholick Religion in England; and the English Catholicks looked upon her, as the only person that could free them from the intolerable yoke of a Protestant Government.

Philip II. saw no other way to subdue the Netherlanders.
In short, the House of Guise, whose ambitious projects are well known, thought to find in her, an infallible means to crush the Huguenots of France, who supported the title of the lawful Heir to the Crown of that Kingdom. Mary herself gave too much countenance to all these plots. She was so imprudent, as, being a prisoner, insolently to censure two things, which could well be distinguished and separated; I mean, her Liberty, and her title to the Crown of England. She thereby gave Elizabeth occasion to confound them too, and to ruin her, in order to preserve her own Life and Crown.

These were the real motives of Mary's condemnation.
If we consider them politically, they may be said to be good and necessary; but it happens very frequently that Policy is repugnant to Justice and Equity. Upon this condemnation it is that Elizabeth's enemies have triumphed, and indeed, it is a very fit subject for Rhetoric. But if it is considered who they were that exclaimed the loudest against Elizabeth, they will be found to be the very persons, who would have murdered her to set Mary on the throne of England. Had they succeeded in their design, would their Deed have been more just, or more agreeable to the precepts of the Christian Religion? Doubtless, it would have been the thing to be tried by the principles of the adversaries to Elizabeth and her Religion. But if it were allowed by the laws of Religion, Justice and Equity, to take away the life of Elizabeth, in order to set Mary on the throne, and restore the Catholick Religion in England, was it less allowable for the English to put Mary to death, in order to preserve their Queen and Religion from the destruction they were continually threatened with? Let us say rather, these maxims are equally blameable and repugnant to the Rules of the Gospel, to whatever Party they are applied.

Having seen the real motives of Queen Mary's condemnation, there is no great cause to wonder at the irregularities to be observed in her Trial. The point was not so much to punish her for her part in the Plot, as to satisfy the publick she was concerned in it, that her condemnation might be thought the less strange, or rather absolutely necessary for the safety of England. The Queen and Council believed to have sufficient evidence, that Mary was acquainted with the Conspiracy, had consented to it, and promoted the execution to the utmost of her power.
This subject was then discussed in the House of Commons, would easily excuse some irregularities, in an affair where their own preservation was concerned.

Since therefore Mary's condemnation can be considered only as the effect of Elizabeth's Policy, it is in vain that

(1) Before Burling asked her this, the Solicitor put the Commissioners in mind, what would become of them, their Honours, Estates and Privileges, if the Kingdom were assigned to the Spaniards. But the Lord Treasurer shewed, the Kingdom of England could not be conveyed at all, but was to descend by right of succession, according to the Laws; and then asked the Queen if she had any more to say. Camden, p. 525.

(2) Upon which she rose up, and had some Conference with the Lord Treasurer, Hatton, Walsingham, and the Earl of Warwick, apart by themselves. Camden, p. 525.

(3) This is however grounded upon the difference between Camden's account, and that of Heaume, Lib. 86. Tom. 3. p. 136 and 161. Republ.

"ning the nice points of the Law, and following of Precedents and Form, rather than expounding the Laws themselves that by exact observing of your form, she must have been indicted in Stajordshire, and have holden up her hand at the bar, and have been tried by a Jury of twelve Men. A proper course, forsooth, of Tryal against a Princess! To avoid therefore such absurdities, I thought it better to refer the examination of so weighty a cause to a good number of the noblest personages of the Land, and the Judges of the Realm: and all little enough. For we Princes are set as it were upon Stages in the sight and view of all the World: the least spot is soon spied in our garments, a blemish quickly noted in our doings. It behoveth us therefore to be careful that our Proceedings be just and honourable. But I must tell you one thing, that by this last Act of Parliament, you have brought me to a narrow strait, that I must give order for her death, which is a Princess most nearly allied unto me in blood, and whose practices against me have stricken me into so great grief, that I have been glad to absent my self from this Parliament (1), lest I should increase my sorrow, by hearing it spoken of; and not out of fear of any danger, as some think. But yet I will now tell you a secret, (though it is well known that I have the property to keep counsel;) it is not long since those eyes of mine saw and read an Oath wherein some bound themselves to kill me within a month. Hereby I see your danger in me, which I will be very careful to avoid.

"Your Association for my safety I have not forgotten, which I never so much as thought of, till a great number of hands, with many obligations, were shewed me. Which as I do acknowledge as a strong argument of your true hearts, and great zeal to my safety, so shall my bond be stronger tied to a great care for your good. But forasmuch as this matter now in hand is very rare, and of greatest consequence, I hope you do not look for any present resolution; for my manner is, in matters of less moment than this, to deliberate long upon that which is once to be resolved. In the mean time, I beseech Almighty God to illuminate my mind, that I may foresee that which may serve for the good of his Church, the prosperity of the Commonwealth, and your safety. And that delay may not breed danger we will signify our resolution with all conveniency. And whatever the best Subjects may expect at the hands of the best Princess, that expect from me to be performed to the full."

Amb.

It is not very difficult to perceive in this Speech, notwithstanding her affected obscurity, the double view Elizabeth proposed to herself. One was to make the publick believe, she could not, without extreme concern, resolve to put the Queen of Scots to death: The other, to insinuate to the Parliament, that there was a necessity of dispatching Queen Mary, or resolving to lose the best of Queens, who was very ready to lay down her life for the good of her Subjects. She dwelt chiefly upon her tenderness for her People, that they might fear to be deprived of so gracious a Queen, and earnestly require the death of her adversary. But lest the Parliament's affection for her should not be sufficiently strong, she took care to hint several times, that their own safety depended on her preservation. She said, if her welfare only were at stake, she would readily pardon, since she was not fond of life; but that it was solely the danger of the State which made her uneasy. Was not this very plainly saying, the death of the Queen of Scots was necessary for the safety of the Realm? She would have it believed, she was inclined to favour Mary, but alleged no reason for her. On the contrary, she made use of the Arguments of Sex and Kindred to aggravate her crime, and clearly set forth the reasons which might determine her to consent to her death. She magnified the care she had taken, not to suffer her dignity to be debated, by trying her like a common person. This was all the favour she showed her. But what favour was it to give her Judges, among whom were her greatest enemies, Persons who had before voted against her in the Council, and had been for bringing her to a trial? Hutton, one of the Judges, drew her into a snare, by persuading her to answer for herself, and the Lord Treasurer acted in some measure the part of an Accuser. On the other hand, we see in several of Walsingham's Letters sent from France when he was Ambassador, that it was his opinion, Elizabeth could never be safe so long as the Queen of Scots was alive. Was it not a great favour to give her such Judges. In short, with what intent did Elizabeth tell the Parliament, she knew for certain some had bound themselves by an oath to kill her within a month? Was it not to incite the two Houses to prevent this misfortune by the speedy execution of the sentence given against Mary? All this shows, that her aim was to engage the Parliament to pre her upon that head, that she might in some measure be justified to the World, by ascribing the execution of the Sentence to the instances of the Parliament. But the Sequel will still more plainly show it.

On the 12th day after, the Queen sent the Lord Celler to the Upper-House, and Puckering (2) to the Lower, to desire them to find some expedient, whereby the Queen of Scots life might be saved, and her own safety provided for. The two Houses, after a serious debate, answered her, that her safety could not possibly be secured so long as the Queen of Scots lived. That there were but four ways to be devised to that end, which were all insufficient. The first was, that the Queen of Scots should seriously repent: but such a Repentance was not to be expected, since she would not so much as acknowledge her fault. The second, that she should be kept with a cloister guard, and bound to her good demeanour by bond and oath. The third, that she should give Hostages. But that these two ways were insufficient, since if the Queen's life were once taken away, all these precautions would vanish. The fourth, that she should depart the Kingdom. But this was the most dangerous: for if, whilst a Prisoner, she stirred up so many in her favour, what would she do if she were at liberty? In a word, the two Houses in their answer represented to the Queen, that if it were injustice to deny execution of the Law to the meanest of her Subjects, how much more to the whole body of the People, unanimously and with one voice suing for the same. They who have the least knowledge what influence the Court-Party usually have upon the two Houses, will very easily judge, that the Parliament would never have expressed themselves in this manner, if they had not known it to be grateful to the Queen. But to discover more fully Elizabeth's character, it will be necessary to insert her answer, which will evidently show, not her perplexity and uncertainty, as she pretended, but her extreme dissimulation, on this Article.

"FULL grievous is the way, whose going on, and end, yield nothing but cumber for the hire of a notorious journey. I have this day been in greater conflict with my self, than ever in all my life, whether I should speak, or hold my peace. If I speak, and not comply, I shall dissemble; and if I should be silent, your labour taken were all in vain. If I should complain, it might seem strange and rare. Yet I confess, that my most hearty desire was, that some other means might have been devised to work your security, and my safety, than this which is now propounded. So I cannot but complain, though not of you, yet unto you, that I perceive by your petitions, that my safety dependeth wholly upon the death of another. If there be any that think, I have prolonged the time of purpose to make a counterfeit shew of Clemency, they do me the most undeserved wrong, as he knoweth which is the searcher of the most secret thoughts of the heart. Or if there be any that be persuaded, that the Commissioners durst not pronounce other Sentence, as fearing thereby to displease me, or to seem to fail of their care for my safety, they do but heap upon me most injurious conceits. For either those whom I have put in trust have failed of their duties; or else they signified unto the Commissioners in my name, that my Will and Pleasure was, that every one should deal freely, according to his Conscience; and what they would not openly declare, that they should reveal unto me in private. It was of my most favorable mind towards her, that I desired some other means might be found out to prevent this mischief. But since now it is resolved, that my surety is most desperate without her death, I have a most inward feeling of sorrow, that I, which have in my time pardoned so many Rebels, winked at so many Treasons, or neglected them with silence, must now seem to shew cruelty upon so great a Princess.

"I have, since I came to the Crown of this Realm, seen many defamatory Books and Pamphlets against me, accusing me to be a Tyrant. Well fare the writers' hearts; I believe their meaning was to tell me news. And news indeed it was to be, to me branded with the note of Tyranny. I would it were as great news to hear of their Impiety. But what is it which they will

(1) The Queen came not to the Parliament the first day of the Session, but granted a Commission to John Archbishop of Canterbury, William Lord Burleigh, and Henry Earl of Derby, to supply her place. See D'Eves, p. 375, 377.

"not write now, when they shall hear that I have given consent, that the Executioner's hands should be imbrued in the blood of my nearest Kinswoman? But so far am I from cruelty, that, to save mine own life, I would not offer her violence; neither have I been so careful how to preserve mine own life, as how to preserve both: which that it is now impossible, I grieve exceedingly. I am not so void of Judgment, as not to see mine own perils before mine eyes; nor so mad to sharpen a sword to cut mine own throat; nor so careless, as not to provide for the safety of mine own life. But this I confide with my self, that many a Man would put his own life in danger, to save a Princess's life: I do not say so will I. Yet have I many times thought upon it.

"But seeing so many have both written and spoken against me, give me leave, I pray you, to say somewhat in my own defence, that ye may see what manner of Woman I am, for whose safety you have passed such careful thoughts. Wherein as I do with most thankful heart consider your vigilant care; so am I sure I shall never requite it, had I as many lives as you all.

"When first I took the Sceptre, I was not unmindful of God the giver, and therefore began my Reign with his Service, and the Religion I have been both born in, bred in, and I trust shall die in. And though I was not ignorant how many perils I should be set withal at home for altering Religion, and how many great Princes abroad of a contrary profession, would attempt all hostility against me: yet was I no whit dismayed, knowing that God, whom only I respected, would defend both me and my cause. Hence it is, that so many Treacheries and Conspiracies have been attempted against me, that I rather marvel that I am, than muse that I should not be alive at this day, were it not that God's holy hand hath protected me, beyond all expectation. Then, to the end I might make the better progress in the art of swaying the Sceptre, I entered into long and serious cogitations, what things were worthy and fitting for Kings to do; and I found it most necessary that they should be abundantly furnished with those special Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Prudence, and Magnanimity. As for the two latter, I will not boast my self, my Sex doth not permit it. But for the two former, I dare say, (and that without ostentation) I never made a difference of persons, where Right was one. I never preferred for favour, whom I thought not fit for worth: I never bent my ear to credit a tale that was first told: nor was so rash to corrupt my Judgment with prejudice, before I heard the cause. I will not say but many reports might haply be brought me into much favour of the one side or the other: For we Princes cannot hear all our selves. Yet this I dare say boldly, my Judgment ever went with the truth, according to my understanding. And as full well Alcibiades wished his friend, not to give any answer till he had run over the Letters of the Alphabet; so have I not used rash and sudden resolutions in any thing.

"And therefore as touching your Counsels and Consultations, I acknowledge them to be so careful, provident, and profitable, for the preservation of my life, and to proceed from minds so sincere, and to me most devoted, that I shall endeavour my self, all I can, to give you cause to think your pains not ill bestowed, and strive to make my self worthy of such Subjects.

"And now for your Petition, I pray you for this present to content yourselves with an answer without answer. Your Judgment I condemn not, neither do I mistake your reasons; but pray to accept my thankfulness, excuse my doubtfulness, and take in good part my answer, answer-less. If I should say, I would not do what you request, I might say perhaps more than I think; and if I should say I would do it, I might plunge myself into peril, whom you labour to preserve; which in your wisdoms and discretions, ye would not that I should, if ye consider the circumstances of place, time, and the manners and conditions of Men."

This Speech, which was of the same nature and spirit with the former, was not an answer to the Petition of the two Houses, as the Queen herself owned, but only an intimation to the English, how imprudent it would be to hazard the Life of so good a Queen, in order to save Mary's. She seemed in a great perplexity, and yet gave to understand, she was fully determined. And indeed, since she preferred the good of her Subjects before all other things, and Mary's death was necessary to them, what could be the occasion of her doubts? In comparing the reasons which inclined her to mercy, with those which concerned her own safety, there was need of no great penetration, to see to which side she would turn, however irresolute she seemed. So, in this, as in the former speech, her sole aim was to make the publick believe, she yielded with reluctancy to the Solicitations of the Parliament, though she took care not to object any strong reasons to these Solicitations. But her actions were still plainer indications than her Speeches, of what passed in her thoughts.

Immediately after this answer without answer, the Parliament was prorogued (1), for fear, doubtless, her leigned perplexities should be taken literally, and some expedient found to save the Queen of Scots. After what had been done, Elizabeth had no farther occasion for the Parliament, and in causing the Sentence to be executed, could say, she only yielded to the pressing instances of the two Houses. It will perhaps be thought strange, that I am thus peremptory in a thing so hard to be known, as Elizabeth's inmost thoughts. But in my opinion, very evident proofs may be drawn both from her actions and words, that throughout this whole affair, she acted with great dissimulation.

A few days after the prorogation of the Parliament, the Lord Blackburne and Beal were sent to the Queen of Scots. They had orders to tell her, that her Judges had condemned her to die, that the Parliament had confirmed the Sentence, and desired the execution thereof, believing, if she remained alive, the Religion established in England could not subsist. She received the news with great resolution, and even seemed to triumph, that Religion was the cause of her death (2). Then she said, with some emotion, It is no wonder if the English, who have often put their own Sovereigns to death, should treat in the same manner, a Princess sprung from the blood of their King.

L'Autopsie the French Ambassador, who was entirely devoted to the House of Guise, stopped, for some days, the publication of the Sentence by his solicitations. But at last, it was proclaimed all over London (3) by the Queen's express order, who forgot not to declare to the People that her consent was extorted by the pressing intreaties of the Parliament. In the proclamation the Queen said, that being informed of the Queen of Scots devices, the Lords of the Council, with many others, earnestly besought her to bring her to justice, and try her in the most honorable manner. That upon these instances she granted a Commission to forty-two Lords, thirty-six of whom met at Fotheringhay, and after a very strict examination, gave Sentence to this effect: That Mary had broken the Statute made the last year: That the Parliament having examined the Sentence, and the proofs on which it was founded, required the execution thereof, notwithstanding her frequent instances, that some other expedient might be found: That therefore, moved with her own and the Nation's welfare, she had ordered the Sentence to be notified to her good Subjects.

Mary, when she received the news of this publication, plainly saw there was no mercy to be expected. She writ a long Letter to Elizabeth, desiring certain Favours concerning her death, burial, and servants (4). But it is uncertain, whether this Letter was ever delivered. The King of Scotland writ also to Queen Elizabeth, and sent Patrick Gray and Robert Melvil to implore her mercy for the Queen his mother; but it was to no purpose. Nay, it is said, Gray, who had been many years attached to Elizabeth's interest, after having publicly solicited her to favour Mary, advised her in private to make her away, saying, A dead Woman bites not.

Henry III. sent also the President de Bellievre into England to intreat Elizabeth in behalf of the condemned Queen. The Ambassador discharged his commission like a Man who seemed very desirous to succeed. He presented a long Memorial, which was published, containing the strongest Reasons, he could devise, to persuade Elizabeth to spare the unfortunate Queen; to which Memorial the Queen returned an answer in the margin of each article. The substance of the answers was, "That things were come to that point, that one or other of the two Queens must perish, and Elizabeth flattered herself that the King of France had her interest no less at heart than Mary's." But if du Maurier is to be credited, in his preface to his Father's Memoirs, the Ambassador acted the counterpart, and imposed upon the world and Mary's Friends. He seems to have heard his Father say, that Bellicore, who he feigned to have Instructions to the contrary, had private Orders to solicit the death of the Queen of Scots (1). This is not unlikely, considering the situation of the affairs of France at that time, and the King's just Apprehensions of the Duke of Guise's ambitious Designs (2).

Whilst all the World was in expectation of the effects of this extraordinary sentence, the Court discovered, that L'Aubespine the French Ambassador, had bribed two assassins (3) to murder the Queen. One of the Villains repenting and informing the Ministers of the Plot, the Ambassador was desired to come to the Lord Treasurer's House where the Council was assembled, and the two witnesses were brought face to face. If Camden is to be credited, he made but an ill defence, contenting himself with pleading the privilege of Ambassadors, who were accountable only to their own masters. The Lord Treasurer, without allowing or disputing this privilege, gravely reproved him, and advised him to beware for the future how he provoked a Queen, who was too much injured already, and had it in her power to be revenged. It must be observed, the French Translator of Camden's Annals, thought fit to pass over in silence this whole Conspiracy.

It was no proper season to inquire any farther into the circumstances of this Plot, which probably was entirely owing to the Ambassador's furious zeal for the House of Lorain. Nay, who knows whether it were not a snare laid for him, to make him instrumental, contrary to his intention, in hastening the Queen of Scots execution? When this affair became publick, it was every where said, there was no safety for the Queen so long as Mary was alive. This was precisely what the Court wished, that the people being fatigued of the necessity of executing the sentence, might be less attentive to the irregularities. Camden says, Elizabeth was still in suspense and distracted in her thoughts, not being able to resolve to put to death a Queen her near Relation, over whom she had no jurisdiction. He adds, means were found however to determine her, by spreading a report that England was going to be invaded: That the Spanish Fleet was already arrived at Milford Haven: That the Duke of Guise was landed in Suffex with an army: That the Queen of Scots was escaped out of prison, and was raising Troops in the North: That several Plots were on foot to kill the Queen, and set the City of London on fire: Yea, that the Queen was dead. By these artifices, according to that Historian, Elizabeth was prevailed with to sign a Warrant for Mary's execution. For my part, who verily believe, Mary's death was resolved, even before her trial, I rather think all these reports were spread by the emissaries of the Court, to terrify the people, and to let them see how necessary Mary's death was. There is not the least probability, that the Queen and her Ministers should suffer themselves to be deceived by such reports, the falsehood whereof it was so easy for them to discover. But Camden's aim is to insinuate, that Elizabeth was convinced of Mary's innocence, and therefore distracted in her thoughts.

We are now come to the last act of the Tragedy, for so it may well be called with respect to the Queen of Scots, though with regard to Elizabeth it was a real Comedy, or at least a continued scene of dissimulation, acted so artfully, that it can hardly be conceived how it could be carried farther. Before Elizabeth ordered the Commission to try Mary to be drawn, several Lords, as I said, cast themselves at her feet, and begged her to take pity of them, and their posterity, and to provide, by Mary's death, for the security of the Church and State. Afterwards, when sentence was given, the waited till she was twice solicited by the Parliament, with the sharp reproach that she denied her people justice. To carry on the farce, some formalities were likewise to be acted after the publication of the sentence, before the Warrant was signed for execution. All this was done: but there was still something more. Elizabeth undertook to make the publick believe, the execution was done against her will, and without her knowledge, and the method she used to accomplish it was this.

Davison, without his knowing it, was her instrument to act this sort of Comedy. A little before the Queen of Scots Trial, he was made Secretary of State, and very likely, was put into that office on purpose to be informed, and made accountable for Mary's death. All the forementioned rumours being spread, and the Queen feigning to be terrified, delivered to Davison a Writing signed with her own hand, and sealed with her Signet, commanding him to draw a Warrant under the Great Seal for the Queen of Scots execution, but enjoined him withal to keep the Warrant by him (4), and acquaint no man therewith (5). The Lord Chancellor however must have been informed of it, unless she had taken the Great Seal from him and given it to Davison, of which there has been instances. Be this as it will, the next day she ordered Davison by Killegrew not to draw the Warrant (6). Whereupon Davison came to the Queen, and told her, it was drawn and under Seal already; at which she was angry, and blamed him for making such haste. The Warrant was dated the 1st of February, and directed to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Derby, Kent, Chumberland, [and Penbrake] to see the Queen of Scots executed in their presence. Mean while, though the Queen seemed displeased with the Secretary for making too much haste, she left the Warrant in his hands, without telling him what he was to do with it. This puzzled him extremely, since by her contrary proceedings with respect to the Warrant, she had not disclosed to him her intention. In this uncertainty he chose to impart the transaction to a Privy-Counsellor, who was of opinion that the rest of the Counsellors should be informed, that nothing might be done rashly, and Davison fell into the snare. Whereupon the Council being met, it was unanimously resolved to execute the Warrant, though nothing was easier than to advertise the Queen of their Embarrassment. To that end, the Warrant was given to Beal, who took care to acquaint the four Lords, to whom it was addressed, and departed for Falberinghay with two executioners. Certainly, it is very hard to believe, that a score of Privy-Counsellors (among whom were the Queen's Ministers, and her intimate Confidants) would have undertaken to order the Warrant to be executed, unknown to her (7), had they not been persuaded it was agreeable to her will. Especially as Davison had communicated the secret to them, only because of his uncertainty concerning the Queen's intention (8).

After Beal's departure, the Queen told Davison, she had changed her mind. This ought to have astonished the Council, who had ordered execution by their own authority, and yet no care was taken to recall Beal, though there was seven days space between his departure, and Mary's execution. But what is still more strange, is, that during these seven days, though the Queen had declared that her mind was altered, not one of her Counsellors or Ministers, thought of informing her of what was transacting. This is a clear evidence, that it was very well known, she did not desire to be informed.

However this be, the four Lords, appointed to see execution done, being come to Falberinghay, admonished the Queen of Scots to prepare for her death (9), and on the morrow, being the 8th of February, they saw her beheaded. I shall not relate here all the circumstances of this Tragedy: It suffices to say in a word, that she died with great resolution, and in an inviolable attachment to her Religion. The Earl of Kent telling her, that her Life would be the death of the Protestant Religion in England, she rejoiced, and said, she was condemned as guilty of plotting against the Queen of England's life, and yet the Earl of Kent had just told her, she was to die for her Religion, wherein she gloried. If Camden is to be credited, she protested, she knew nothing of Behington's

The news of Mary's execution being brought to Elizabeth, she appeared extremely displeased. Sighs, tears, lamentation, and mournings, were the signs she gave of her grief, which seemed immoderate. She drove the Privy-Counsellors from her presence (2), and commanded them to be examined in the Star-Chamber, and Davison to be tried for his disobedience. A few days after, she sent the following Letter to the King of Scotland by Robert Carey.

My dear BROTHER,

I Would you knew, though not felt, the extreme dolour that overwhelmeth my mind, for that miserable accident which farre contrary to my meaning hath befallen. I have sent this kinsman of mine (3), whom ere now it hath pleased you to favour, to instruct you truly of that, which is too irksome for my pen to tell you. I beseech you, that as God, and many more know, how innocent I am in this case, so you will believe me, that if I had done it, I would have abode by it; I am not so base minded, that the fear of any living creature, should make me afraid to do what is just; or done, to deny the same: I am so not degenerate, nor carry so vile a mind. But as not to disguise, fits most a King, so I will never dissemble my actions, but cause them shew as I mean them. This assure your self for me, that as I know it was deserved, if I had meant it, I would never over another's shoulders, and to impute to my self that, which I did not so much as think of: I will not. The circumstances you will be pleased to hear of this bearer: And for my part, think you have not in the world a more loving kinswoman, and more dear friend, nor any that will watch more carefully to preserve you and your state. And if any would otherwise persuade you, think they bear more good will to others, than to you. Thus in haste, I leave to trouble you, beseeching God to send you a long Reign.

Whilst Carey was upon the road, Davison was cited into the Star-Chamber, to answer to the accusation of contempt and disobedience entered against him. The accusation ran, "That he had contemned the Queen's orders," "broke his oath of allegiance, and neglected his duty: "That the Queen never intending, (for reasons best known to herself) that the Queen of Scots, though condemned, should have been put to death, had however, for preventing of dangers, commanded a Warrant for her execution to be drawn, and committed it to his trust and secrecy: But that he forgetting his duty, had acquainted the Council therewith, and put the Warrant in execution unknown to the Queen."

Davison answered, "That he was extremely sorry to find himself accused of contempt to the Queen, who had loaded him with favours: That he chose rather to confess himself guilty of the Crimes he was charged with, than contest with her Majesty, since he could not vindicate himself without failing in the respect and duty he owed her. He protested however, he had offended wholly out of ignorance, being perwaded he had done nothing contrary to the Queen's will and pleasure. He affirmed, that when the Queen blamed him for making such haste to get the Warrant ready, she gave some intimation, but no express command, that he should keep it by him, neither did he believe himself guilty of breach of trust, by communicating it only to the Council. As to his being accused of not recalling the Warrant, after she had told him she had changed her mind, he protested, it was the opinion of the whole

"Council, that it should be presently executed, left the Queen or State should receive any hurt by too long a delay."

After he had done speaking, the Queen's Council pressed him with his own confession, and with what the Lord Treasurer had testified. That, doubting whether the Queen had absolutely consented to have execution done, Davison affirmed, it was her intention. Then Davison, with tears in his eyes, prayed the Queen's Council not to urge him any farther, but remember that he would not contest with the Queen, to whose conscience, and his Judges censure, he entirely submitted himself. After that, were made several Speeches, some tending to aggravate his offence, and others, to show he had only acted imprudently (4). In short, he was condemned to be fined in ten thousand pounds, and imprisoned during the Queen's pleasure. The Lord Lumley, in his Speech on this occasion, was not satisfied with blaming Davison; but, accusing chiefly the whole Council, said, "Never was there such a contempt against a Prince heard or read of, that Privy-Counsellors, in the Queen's Palace, and when they had free access to her, should attempt such a thing without her advice or knowledge; protesting, that if his own Son were guilty of the like fault, he would be the first to condemn him." But it was not the Queen's intention to punish the Counsellors, who, probably, had acted only by her private orders. And therefore to screen them from the like reproaches, the Lord Privy-Seal told the Assembly, that though the Queen, being justly offended with her Council, had left them to a strict examination; yet now being sensible, they had transgressed out of an excess of zeal for her and the State, she forgave them. Thus Davison was the only sacrifice, though the Council was still more guilty than he, supposing he had acted contrary to the Queen's intention. Davison remained long in prison, without obtaining any other favour, than some presents of Money from the Queen, to relieve his wants.

Camden, whose aim was not to vindicate Elizabeth in any thing relating to the Queen of Scots, has inserted in his Annals, an Apology, which Davison, being in prison, sent himself to Secretary Walsingham, and leaves his Readers to give their Judgment of it, without making himself any remark. The Apology was worded in the following manner.

"The Queen, after the departure of the French and Scotch Ambassadors, of her own accord, commanded me to deliver her the Warrant for executing the Sentence against the Queen of Scots: When I had delivered it, she readily signed it with her own hand: When she had so done, she commanded it to be sealed with the Great-Seal of England; and in jesting manner said, Go tell all this to Walsingham, who is now sick; though I fear he will dye for sorrow when he hears it. She added also the reasons of her deferring it so long; namely, lest the might seem to have been violently or maliciously drawn thereto, whereas in the mean time she was not ignorant how necessary it was. Moreover she blamed Poulet and Drury, that they had not eased her of this care, and wished that Walsingham would see their pulses touching this matter.

"The next day after the Warrant was under the Great-Seal, she commanded me by Killegrew, that it should be done, and when I had informed her that it was done already, she found fault with such great haste, telling me that in the judgment of some wise men, another course might be taken: I answered, that the course which was just, was always best and safest. But fearing lest she would lay the fault upon me, (as

(1) When the Earls had told her to prepare for death, she desired that she might have a Conference with her Almicer, Counsellor, and Andrew Melvil the Master of her Household. But they would not allow her Counsellor to come near her, but recommending her to the Bishop or Dean of Peterburgh, whom she refused, she desired that she might have the more time to dispose of her Concerns. She supped temperately, as she used to do. Towards the end of supper she drank to all her Servants, who pledged her in their Knees, begging pardon for their neglect of Duty, as the alms did of them. After supper she passed her Will, and wrote down the names of those to whom she bequeathed her Goods and Jewels. At her wonted time she went to bed, slept some hours, and Servants together, commanded her Will to be read, and then retired into her Oratory, where she stayed till Thomas Andrews the Sheriff arrived her. In the Porch she was received by the Earls, and other Noblemen, where speaking a short speech well; and turning to the Earls, desired that her Servants might stand by her at her death. Then the Earls of Kent and Shrewsbury, and Thomas Andrews the Sheriff of Northamptonshire, going before her, she came to the Scaffold, at the upper end of the Hall, on which was placed a Chair, a Cushion, and Countenance; which done, Dr. Fletcher Dean of Peterburgh began a long Speech to her, concerning her life past, present, and to come. She interrupted him, praying him not to trouble himself, for she was resolved to die in the Catholick Religion. Then they appointed the Dean to pray: After which, the Black, which it was used in her Body at two drunks. He chiefly pleaded ignorance, and offered to resign his Places. If there was any precipitation used in this affair, the death of the Queen of Scots, the Lord Burleigh, Secretary Walsingham, and a few others, may reasonably be supposed the Authors of it, in order to secure themselves for they had acted so openly against Mary, that had she ever mounted the Throne of England, they must have been utterly undone.

(4) The Commissioners, being thirteen in number, made each a Speech, wherein they owned, that Sentence was justly pronounced against the Queen of Scots, but that Davison deserves to be punished, for acting without the Queen's advice and consent. Camden, p. 537.

"she had laid the putting of the Duke of Norfolk to death upon the Lord Burleigh, I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, protesting that I would not plume myself any deeper in so great a business. He presently imparted it to the Lord Burleigh, and the Lord Burleigh to the rest of the Council; who all consented to have the execution hastened, and every one of them vowed to bear an equal share in the blame, and sent Bent away with the Warrant and Letters. The third day after, when, by a dream which she told of the Queen of Scots death, I perceived that she wavered in her resolution, I asked her whether she had changed her mind? She answered, No; but another course (said she,) might have been devised: and withal she asked me, whether I had received any answer from Poulet? Whose Letter when I had showed her, wherein he flatly refused to undertake that which stood not with honour and justice; the waxing angry, accused him and others (who had bound themselves by the Association) of perjury and breach of their vow, as those that had promised great matters for their Prince's safety, but would perform nothing. Yet there are (said she,) who will do it for my sake. But I showed her how dishonourable and unjust a thing this would be; and withal into how great danger the world would bring Poulet and Drury by it. For if she approved the fact, she would draw upon herself both danger and dishonour, not without censure of Injustice; and if she disallowed it, she would utterly undo men of great desert, and their whole posterity. And afterwards she gave me a light check the same day that the Queen of Scots was executed, because she was not yet put to death."

If this Apology be true, one cannot desire a more convincing proof of Elizabeth's Disimulation. The point was, not Mary's death, for that was fully determined, but the manner. It appears in this Writing, that Elizabeth would have been glad, the Queen of Scots two Keepers had dispatched her, that she might have been able to clear herself, which she would not have failed to do, by putting them both to death. There remains but one scruple, which is, that we have this from Camden only, whose testimony cannot be reckoned very certain (1).

The King of Scotland having received the news of the Queen his Mother's tragical end, expressed a very lively resentment at the same. His first thoughts prompted him to revenge. The States of Scotland, then assembled, promised him their assistance, and there were not wanting some about him, who persuaded him to join with the Pope, France and Spain, to revenge so great an affront. Others advised him not to break with England, for fear of hazarding upon the uncertain chance of War, his undoubted Title to the Crown of that Kingdom; especially as the English only wanted perhaps a pretence, to hinder a Scotch Prince from ascending the throne of England, which therefore he ought to take care not to furnish them with. Some were of opinion, he should declare openly for neither of the two Religions, but keep himself always ready to improve the Events, time should produce. Carey arriving shortly after, the King refused him audience, and it was not without great difficulty, that he was persuaded to receive Elizabeth's Letter. We find however in Melvil's Memoirs, that some Lords of the Court of Scotland had writ to England, that whenever Queen Mary should be put to death, the King her Son would not highly resent it; and accordingly, Melvil affirms, he quickly forgot it. When Elizabeth heard that King James's grief began to abate, she caused some of those whom she most trusted (2), to represent to him, "That in the present situation of Scotland, there was no room to expect that a War with England could be successful: If he pretended to rely on foreign aid, his Mother's sad experience might teach him how uncertain that was. The King of France would be so far from countenancing him, that it was his interest to hinder the two Kingdoms of Great Britain from being united under the same dominion. Nay, he would oppose to the utmost of his power, the success of his Arms, for fear he should afterwards assist the Duke of Guise, who aspired to the Crown. The King of Spain in pretending to aid him, would only serve himself, on account of his groundless claim to the Crown of England, as defended from the House of Lancaster. Even the Queen his Mother had made a Will the night before her death, whereby she excluded him from the succession, in case he persevered in the Protestant Religion, and nominated Philip II. for her heir, which Will was sent into Spain. He was therefore to expect no assistance from Philip, but rather to consider him as an enemy. In a word, if he made war upon Elizabeth, and the Parliament passed an Act against him, he ran the hazard of being excluded for ever from a noble succession, which he could not fail to enjoy, provided he would but remain in peace." To all these Arguments it was also added, "That Elizabeth had an affection for him, and besides, would think herself bound in honour and duty to repair the Mother's wrongs, by leaving her Crown to the Son, in case he gave her no occasion to do otherwise." These representations had their effect. James saw it to be his interest to keep fair with Elizabeth, and that, added to the Sentence given against Davison, which was sent him, so stifled his resentment, that he showed no farther marks of it (3).

Mean while, Elizabeth hearing the Spaniards was making great preparations to invade England (4), sent Drake with a good fleet (5) upon the coast of Spain, with orders to burn all the Spanish Ships he should meet. This Admiral's first expedition was to the Port of Cadix, where he burnt above a hundred Vessels laden with victuals and ammunition, and a large Galeon of the Marquis of Santa Cruz, with another of Ragujia, full of rich merchandise. Then returning to Cape St. Vincent, he did great damage to the inhabitants along the coast; after which, he came to the mouth of the Tagus, where he vainly provoked the Marquis of Santa Cruz, by plundering and burning the Ships he found there. From thence he sailed to the Azores, and meeting in the way with a rich Carack called the St. Philip, returning from the East-Indies, easily took her (6). The Provisions and Stores which the Spaniards lost at Cadix, the taking of the Galeons and Carack, and the rest of the damages they sustained, obliged Philip to defer till the next year the Expedition, he had projected against England (7). While Drake was acting in Europe against Spain, Cavendish was doing the same in America, having entered the South-Sea by the straits of Magellan. He plundered without opposition the Coasts of Chili and Peru, and did the Spaniards great damage in those parts.

I left, about the end of the last year, the Earl of Leicester returning into England, after having set on foot his project to become Sovereign of the United Provinces, by cherishing confusion and discord. Before his departure, the States began to perceive his designs, and the orders he left when he went away, and which the Officers, his creatures, punctually executed, fully confirmed their suspicions. For this reason they sent Ambassadors to Elizabeth to complain of him: but his credit, and the Queen of Scots affair, which then held the Court employed, hindered the Ambassadors from being so speedily dispatched as they desired. It even happened in this interval, that Stanley and York, who held of the Earl of Leicester the Governments of Devon, and a Fort near Zutphen, delivered these two places to the Duke of Parma. So, the States no longer trusting that General, gave the command of their Army

(1) This matter is also undeniably confirmed by two Letters, inserted by Mackenzie, in his Life of Queen Mary. (If they are genuine) In the first, written on Feb. 1. 1580-7. by Walsingham and Davison, to Sir Amias Poulet, and Sir Dru Drury, it is said—"Her Majesty's death was as first, you, both a lack of that care and zeal for her service, that she looked for at your hands, in that you have not in all this time, (of your leave,) which other propositions) found out some way to shorten the life of the Scots Queen, considering the great peril she is hourly subject to, to long as the said Queen shall live."—She taketh it most unkindly, that Men professing that love towards her that you do, should in a kind of fear, for lack of the discharge of your Duties, cast the burden upon her, knowing, as you do, her inclination to shed blood."—Sir Amias Poulet, in his answer, dated Feb. 2. has the words, "My answer—"I shall deliver unto you with great grief and bitterness of mind, in that I am so unhappy, as living to see this unhappy day, in which I am required by direction from my most gracious Sovereign, to do an Act, which God and the Law forbid."—God forbid I should make to foul a Shipwreck of my Confidence, or leave so great a blot to my poor Posterity, and shed Blood without Law or Warrant!" p. 273-274. O'Brien also observes, that "our Queen may be found in many of her Letters, intimating so much [as the making her away] to such as kept her, who were so wise, as not to understand what was meant." Mem. § 4.

(2) Some of her Friends in Scotland, and the Lord Hunsdon Governor of Berwick. Camden, p. 539. (3) He assigns himself these Reasons for not revenging his Mother's death. 1. Tom. 3. p. 482.

(4) Their preparations were so extraordinary great, that Sir Francis Drake says, in a Letter, the Spaniards had Provision of Bread and Wine, sufficient to maintain forty thousand Men a whole year. See Strype's Ann. Tom. 3. p. 451.—"That these great preparations were aimed at England, was discovered by Walsingham in the following remarkable manner. He had intelligence in Madrid, that Philip had told his Council, he had dispatched an Express to Rome, with a Letter well with his own hand, to the Pope, acquainting him with the true design of his preparations, and asking his blessing upon it; which for some reason he would not yet disclose to them, till the return of the Currier. The Secret being thus lodged with the Pope, Walsingham, by the means of a French Priest, retained at Rome as his Spy, got a Copy of the original Letter, which was stolen out of the Pope's Cabinet by a Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, who took the Keys out of the Pope's Pocket while he slept. (7) There was another remarkable thing, which retarded this Expedition, and was the contrivance of the great Statesman Walsingham; namely, he got all the Spanish Bills, that were to supply the King with Money to carry on his preparations, protested at Genoa. Walsingham's Mem. p. 1.

1587, to Count Maurice of Nassau, the late Prince of Orange's second Son. They did likewise some other things which plainly showed that, having discovered the Earl of Leicester's designs, they would not suffer him to put them in practice. In the mean while, the Duke of Parma besieging Shys, the Earl returned from England to raise the Siege, but had not the good fortune to succeed (1). At last, finding he was every where mistrusted, he resolved to execute by force the Project he had formed. To that end, he would have made himself master of several places at once, in the heart of the Country, to keep the rest in awe. But his design to surprize Leyden being discovered in season, all correspondence between him and the States entirely ceased. Whereupon the Queen was obliged to recall him, and send in his room [Peregrine Barty] Lord Willoughby [of Eresby] but with no other authority than the command of the English Forces. Then the States appointed Count Maurice their Captain General.

Mean time the King of Spain, ever intent upon the project of invading England, continued to make extraordinary preparations. This project was formed ever since the Queen of Scots had been perfwaded to convey to him her Right to England, as being the only means to restore there the Catholick Religion. According to the received maxim in the Church of Rome, that a Heretick is unworthy and incapable of enjoying a Crown, Philip II. thought he might justly claim that of England, as being the next Catholick Prince descended from the House of Lancaster. But that the Reader may the better know the ground of his Pretensions, it will be proper to cast an eye upon his Genealogy, which shows him sprung from the two Daughters of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, fourth Son of Edward III. Upon this descent therefore, and the Queen of Scots Conveyance and Will, he had projected the Conquest of England. Elizabeth, not being ignorant of it, took all possible care to be in a posture of defence, and both coloured their preparations with divers pretences. To amuse Elizabeth, Philip sent and propoed her mediation for a Peace between him and the revolted Provinces of the Netherlands. Elizabeth perfectly knew Philip's aim, and to amuse him in her turn, accepted the mediation, in hopes, the negotiation would give her more time to be prepared. She propoed therefore to the States a Peace with Spain, intimating, they could not refuse to enter into Treaty, without incurring the blame of continuing the War out of obstinacy. She promised them moreover to have their interest as much at heart as her own. But the States absolutely refused to treat, knowing, by frequent experience, that such negotiations were ever fatal to them.

Nevertheless the sent Plenipotentiaries (2) into Flanders, imagining the States would be forced, as he hinted, to agree to her decisions with Spain. Three months passed before the place of Congress could be settled. Elizabeth required as Preliminaries, a general pardon for the Confederates; that the Towns of the Netherlands should enjoy all their ancient privileges, and the old Alliance between England and Spain be renewed; that some good fund should be assigned her for the payment of what was due from the States, and the forces on both sides be disbanded. As to Religion, the Spaniards demanded, that it should be entirely as the King pleased, since he did not hinder Elizabeth from settling it in her Dominions according to her pleasure. Elizabeth did not insist much upon this article, whether she believed every Sovereign to have a right to impose a Religion upon his People, or to amuse the Spaniards, feigned to relax that he might not obstruct a negotiation, the continuance whereof could not but be advantageous to her. Be this as it will, she went so far, as to be satisfied that the exercise of the Reformed Religion should be tolerated two years only in the United Provinces. As for the Places in her possession, she refused not to restore them, provided she were re-imburshed. Upon these mutual demands, the Spaniards took care to delay the conclusion of the Preliminaries, imagining that the hopes of a speedy Peace would prevent Elizabeth's preparations against their attacks. They refused to come to any agreement with respect to Religion; and as for Elizabeth's charges in supporting the Confederates, they pretended they were to be balanced by the expenses he had put their King to. At length, the preparations which were making against England in all the Spanish Ports, became so publick, that this feigned negotiation broke off without any success, after lasting till March the next year.

I have already mentioned Philip's pretensions to England and Ireland. Ferdinand the Catholick his Great-Grandfather had not so plausible a claim to the Kingdom of Naples and Navarre which he seized, and which still are part of the Spanish Monarchy. But besides these pretensions, Philip made use of another thing, very proper to impose upon the world, namely, a great zeal for the Restoration of the Catholick Religion in the three Kingdoms of Great-Britain. By that he had perfwaded Pope Sixtus V. to come into the project, the execution whereof would be as well glorious as advantageous to both, but of which Philip was to bear the whole charge. As for Sixtus, he had nothing to contribute, but what the Popes were wont to supply on such occasions, namely, Vows, Prayers, and Anathemas. To countenance therefore the King of Spain's undertaking, the Pope thundered against Elizabeth a Bull, absolving her Subjects from their oath of allegiance, and giving her Kingdoms to the first that should seize them (3). This was the King of Spain, who was now ready to embrace the Pope's offer.

He had prepared in Portugal, at Naples, and in Sicily, a Fleet, called the Invincible Armada. It consisted of one hundred and fifty great Ships, in which were embarked nineteen thousand Men, and two thousand six hundred and thirty Pieces of Cannon (4). It was to be commanded by the Marquis De Santa Cruz, but that Admiral dying whilst the Fleet was equipping, the Duke of Medina-celi was appointed in his room. On the other hand, the Duke of Parma had caused an Army of thirty thousand Men (5) to advance towards the Coasts of the Low-Countries, and prepared a great number of Vessels to transport them, in order to join the Spanish Fleet, and land in England (6). The project was to station the Fleet at the mouth of the Thames to assist the Troops who were to march directly to London. Elizabeth, who wanted not good Spies, having timely notice of these great preparations, provided for the defence of her Kingdom with great care and diligence. She fitted out a considerable Fleet, which however was inferior to that of Spain, both in the number and largeness of the Ships, and gave the command to Charles Lord Howard of Effingham [High-Admiral of England, and] very expert in Sea-Affairs. He had for Vice-Admirals, Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher, three of the best Sea-Officers then in the World (7). On the other hand, Henry Seymour [second] Son of the late Duke of Somerset, lay upon the Coast of Flanders, with forty sail English and Dutch, to hinder the Prince of Parma from joining the Spanish Fleet. Moreover, Elizabeth had in England an Army of forty thousand Men, whereof three thousand, under the command of the Earl of Leicester, were posted near the Thames mouth. The rest were near the Queen's person, ready to march where it should be deemed necessary (8). Besides this, there was in each County a body of Militia well armed, under Leaders who had orders to join one another as occasion should require. It is certain, there are no Trained-bands in the World more proper for a bold action than those of England. So in case the Spaniards had landed, they would have met with their match. The Sea-Ports were fortified (9) as much as the time would permit, and Signals were every where appoint-

(4) The Spaniard, the more to advance his Glory, and terrify his Enemies, published an account of this Fleet in Spanish, Latin, French, and Dutch. The Spanish Book soon came into the hands of the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, in divers places whereof Strype saw Notes added by that Lord soon after the defeat. From this Book he has inserted a brief account of the Spanish Armada, in his Appendix of Original Papers, Ann. Vol. 3. p. 51. The sum whereof is this. That there were in all 130 Ships of 17,868 Tons, 19,995 Soldiers, and 8,450 Mariners, 2088 Slaves, and 2630 great Brass Pieces of all sizes, besides 20 Caravels for the service of the Army, and 10 Selves with six Oars a-piece. (8) For the Land-service there were disposed along the southern Coast twenty thousand Men. Besides which, two Armies were raised of choice well disciplined Men, the one under the command of the Earl of Leicester, consisting of a thousand Horse, and twenty two thousand Foot, which encamped at Tilbury, where the Queen was pleased to come and review them; and made a very kind Speech to them, which see in Cabala, p. 373; the other was under the leading of the Lord Hunsdon, consisting of thirty four thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, to guard the Queen's Person. Upon this Emergency the City of London lent the Queen great sums of Money. And being desired to furnish five thousand Men, and fifteen Ships, they granted ten thousand Men, and thirty Ships. No words, says Slew, can express the great forwardness of the People, in their zealous love and duty towards their Sovereign, at this juncture. See Slew, p. 744, 759. Camden, p. 543, 548. 1587. ed to show the Places where the Troops were to march. In short, it was resolved, that if the Spaniards made a descent, the Country about them should be laid waste, that they might have nothing to subsist upon but what they brought from the Fleet (1). This was the course taken by Francis I. in Provence against Charles V. with success that beyond his expectations. These measures being taken, the enemy was expected with uncommon alacrity, though it should seem that on such an occasion every one should have been in the utmost consternation (2).

1588. Mean while, Elizabeth was not without uneasiness. The hour she had ever dreaded was at length come. Her Crown lay at stake, and she was to defend it, without the assistance of any Ally. This she had always endeavoured to prevent, from the beginning of her reign, by all the artifices her policy could suggest, by fomenting the troubles of Scotland, by making an Alliance with France, by feigning to marry the Duke of Anjou, by assisting the Huguenots of France, and the Male-contents of the Netherlands, and finally, by beheading the Queen of Scots. She had succeeded hitherto, and though surrounded with enemies, had found means to employ them at home, and prevent them from directly invading England. But the time was now come that her Right must be exposed to the chance of war. Though she was generally beloved by her Subjects, she was not ignorant, that there were many disaffected persons in the Kingdom, and especially among the Catholics. Nay, she had reason to fear, they corresponded with the King of Spain, and favoured his Invasion. On the other hand, she was not easy with respect to Ireland, because of the Religion of the Irish, and the Correspondents the Pope and Philip II. had there. But she was under a still greater concern on account of Scotland. She had just put King James's Mother to death by the hand of the Executioner, and if that Prince should be transported with the desire of revenge, he could never have a fairer opportunity, since it was in his power to favour the descent of the Spaniards, in one extremity of the Kingdom, by making a diversion in the other. In a word, if she could not hinder the Spaniards from landing in England, she must necessarily resolve to hazard a Battle, the Country not being proper to prolong the war. All this was more than sufficient to inspire her with a just dread, which however she very carefully concealed. If ever she discovered ability, it was on this important occasion. Far from showing the least faint-heartedness, she encouraged her people by her looks, her resolution, her affability, which made them think she was troubled only for their sakes; and on her own account, regardless of the danger. Mean while, she looked to every thing with a wonderful prudence, and a presence of mind, rarely to be found in the greatest Men, and which gained her the admiration and praises of all the world. Some advised her to put to death, or send beyond Sea, the leading Catholics. But she thought, it would be discovering too much fear, besides that it would have been great injustice to punish Men upon bare suspicions. She contented herself with causing some to be arrested, and put into custody, telling them however, it was only by way of precaution, which instead of injuring, would screen them from the violence of their enemies.

Camden. As for Ireland, she sent orders to Sir William Fitz-Williams, who was then Lord Deputy; distinctly pointing out to him what precautions he should use to hinder the Irish from rising. But above all things, she took care to cause the King of Scotland, and put him in hopes of an ample acknowledgment, if on this occasion he inviolably adhered to the Protestant Religion, and the interest of Great-Britain. She represented to him, that, in respect to England, he was to consider the King of Spain, as a dangerous Competitor, and that the loss of one of the Realms of Great-Britain, would not fail of being attended with the loss of the other. But her uneasiness with regard to Scotland was not long-lived, since she had quickly the satisfaction to hear, that James knowing perfectly his own Interest, had no correspondence with the King of Spain, but even stood upon his guard for fear of being invaded himself.

Expedition of the Spanish Fleet. Camden-Stowe. The Duke of Medina-Celi sailed out of the Tagus with the Invincible Armada, the 3d of June (3), and steered his course towards the North. Within a few days, a 1588. storm arising, so dispersed the Ships, that they could not re-join till they came to the Groyne. This accident occasioned a report over Europe, that the Spanish Fleet was entirely destroyed. Walsingham himself, Secretary of State, thought his Intelligence to be certain, that he writ to the Lord-Admiral Howard, to send home four of the largest Ships, there being no farther danger this year. But the Admiral answered, he could not think of parting with the four Ships, though he should be obliged to keep them at his own charge, till he had more certain advice. The better to know the truth, the Wind turning to the North, he sailed with all his Fleet towards Spain, with design to complete the destruction of the enemy's Armada, which was represented to him as disabled. But when he approached Spain, he heard the Fleet had not suffered so much damage as was reported. At the same time, the Wind changing to the South, he sailed back to his station at the mouth of the Channel, for fear with the same Wind the enemies Fleet should advance towards England.

But it was the 12th of July before the Spaniards departed from the Groyne, and two days after, the Duke of Medina-Celi sent a Yacht to notify the same to the Duke of Parma, that he might be ready to join him. The 19th, the Spanish Fleet entered the Channel, and the 20th, appeared in sight of the English, who let it pass in order to follow it before the Wind. Camden has inserted in his Annals, a Journal of what passed in the Channel till the Spaniards retired to the North. I don't think it very necessary to copy this Journal, which besides is something obscure, and gives but an imperfect Idea of the bravery and conduct of the English. It will suffice to say, that whilst the Spaniards were in the Channel, the English kept close to them, and even took some of their Ships. Of this number were a Galeon, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdivia, which was sent to Dartmouth, and a Ship of Biscay, in which was the King's Treasure; but the Spaniards had taken out the money, because the Ship had been fired.

The 23d of July, the Wind being in the North, the Duke of Medina-Celi stood towards the English Fleet. There was that day a sharp engagement, wherein the Spaniards, though much superior in number of Ships, obtained no advantage. The unwieldiness of their Ships, and the agility of the English, made it easy for these last to stand off or on, as they saw fit, and so to balance the superiority of their enemies. The trial the Spaniards made on this occasion of the English valour and skill in Sea-engagements, began, doubtless, to give them quite another notion of their enterprize, than they had hitherto conceived.

Mean while, the Duke of Medina-Celi sent daily Messengers to press the Duke of Parma to put to Sea with his Army. But that was not practicable, by reason of the English and Dutch Ships, posted advantageously to hinder the junction. It was necessary for the Spaniards to approach the Coast of Flanders, to compel them to retire (4). But the 27th in the evening, they were no farther than off Calais, where they came to an Anchor, being still followed by the English, who lay within shot. Here the English Fleet was joined by a good number of Ships, not only of the Queen's, but of divers private persons, who had fitted out several at their own expense (5). And now the Fleet consisted of one hundred and forty Ships of war, small indeed in comparison of the Spanish, but however, with the advantage of moving more easily, and retiring into the Ports of England in case of necessity. The Duke of Parma, who was to sail from Dunkirk and Newport, was still earnestly solicited by the Duke of Medina-Celi to put to Sea, and make a descent in England, as it had been resolved. But, besides that the Ships which expected him, were not yet withdrawn, notwithstanding the neighbourhood of the Spanish Armada, many of his Mariners had deserted, and his Fleet was ill-provided with victuals. In short, he could not, or would not embark.

Whilst the Spaniards lay before Calais, the English Admiral sent [in the night] eight Fire-ships among their Fleet (6). This fight struck them with such a terror, that instantly cutting their Cables, they put to Sea to avoid the impending danger. In this confusion the Admiral-Galeass, commanded by Hugo de Moncada, having lost her Rudder, floated up and down till the next day, when 1588. she was taken by the English after a sharp engagement, wherein Moneada was slain. Though the Spanish Admiral had ordered every Ship to return to her station as soon as the danger was passed, and made a signal for that purpose, there were but few that endeavoured to obey. So, the Fleet remained dispersed, some of the Ships being driven to the North, and others upon the shallows of Flanders, where they were in great danger. They had not only to guard against the sands, but also against the English, who so played upon them with their Cannon, that several Spanish Ships were that day disabled, and the Galeons, called [St. Philip, and] St. Matthew, fell into the hands of the Zealanders. At last, a North-West Wind driving the Fleet upon the Coast of Zealand, where they were very like to be lost, the English gave over the chase, for fear of being exposed to the same danger. Happily for the Spaniards, the Wind turned to the South-West very seasonably, and freed them from their distress. But now, perceiving the impossibility of executing their project, they resolved to return home, by sailing round Scotland and Ireland, and the rather, as some of their Ships had already steered that course. The English Admiral seeing them stand to the Northward, left part of his Fleet to have an eye upon the coast of Flanders, and gave them chase, though at a little distance, till they were past Edinburgh-Frith. The course they steered gave some suspicion, that they were sure of a retreat in the Ports of Scotland. Whereupon the English Ambassador at King James's Court, made him large offers, and even some promises, which he had not power to make, and which were never performed (1).

Mean while, the Spanish Fleet continuing their course, sustained some farther damage by contrary Winds, which caused several of their Ships to be lost on the Coast of Scotland and Ireland. Seven hundred Soldiers and Mariners, who had escaped to land in the King of Scotland's Dominions, were sent to the Duke of Parma with Elizabeth's consent. But those who were shipwrecked in Ireland, and cast ashore, were all put to the sword, or perished by the hands of the executioner; and the Lord-Deputy, by whose orders it was done, fearing they would join with the Rebels. At least this was his pretence to excuse this barbarity (2).

Philip II. received the news of the ill success of his Fleet, with a heroic patience. He had spent three years in preparing this Armada, with incredible expence, and, when he heard of the defeat, so contrary to his expectation, thanked God it was no greater (3).

Upon the retreat of this so formidable a Fleet, England was filled with an universal joy. Elizabeth ordered a publick Thanksgiving for this deliverance, to be made in all the Churches of the Kingdom, and went herself to St. Paul's (4) in great solemnity to perform the same duty. After that, she conferred on the Lord-Admiral a yearly Revenue, in recompence of his great service to his Country, and bestowed pensions on the wounded. For the rest, their rewards consisted more in words than in deeds.

Sir Robert Sidney, who had been sent into Scotland before the arrival of the Spanish Fleet, at the time, the Queen was afraid King James would think of being revenged, returned home when the danger was over. He reported, that the King of Scotland had testified his sincere attachment to the Interest of England, and the Protestant Religion, and had told him, That he looked for no other favour from the Spaniards, than what Polyphemus promised Ulysses, namely, that he should be devoured the last.

On the 4th of September (5), died the Earl of Leicester, a Man little deserving his greatness, if most of the Historians are to be credited. His death drew tears from the Queen, who nevertheless ordered his Goods to be sold at a publick sale, for payment of the Sums he had lent him (6).

After the Spanish Fleet had left the Coast of Flanders, the Duke of Parma seeing the enterprise blasted, besieged Bergen-op-joon, where was an English Governor with a Garrison all of the same Nation. This Siege acquired the Governor great reputation, who by a gallant defence, obliged the Duke at length to raise the Siege (7).

The same year, so memorable for England, was no less so for France. The Duke of Guise, grown more powerful than the King, came to Paris in May, and by the favour of the people, whose Idol he was, obliged the King to depart, having first seen the furious populace chaining the streets, and preparing to attack his person in the Loivre. This is what was called, The Barricades of Paris (8). This insolent action was followed by an agreement, which the King was forced to make with the heads of the League, whereby he put several places into their hands. But in December following, Henry perceiving himself ruined, if he did not make away with the Duke of Guise, and his Brother the Cardinal, caused them both to be assassinated at Blois, where the States of the Kingdom were assembled. Thus he freed himself from a present danger, but it was only to fall into another, for this action made the League, and the City of Paris openly declare against him.

As for Scotland, all was quiet there during the whole year 1588. So long as the King had about him Ministers and Counsellors attached to the interest of England, he generally led an easy and peaceable life. So, the only thing that troubled him this year was his marriage, which he could not accomplish, though he passionately wished it himself. Melvil insinuates, that Chancellor Maitland, who then managed that Prince's affairs, was bribed by Elizabeth: That the gave pensions to most of the Counsellors of Scotland, and that her aim was to hinder the King from marrying. He had sent Ambassadors (9) to Copenhagen, to treat of his marriage with the eldest Daughter of Frederic II., but by the artifice of his Ministers, the Ambassadors power was so limited, that it was impossible for them to conclude. On the other hand, whilst this marriage was negotiating, one Dubartus (10), a French Priest, Servant of the King of Navarre, came to Edinburgh, under colour of paying his respects to the King, who had expressed some esteem for his Works, and proposed, as of himself, the King's marriage with Catherine his master's Sister. He said to many fine things of this Lady, that the King, by the advice of his Council, sent the Lord Tungland, Melvil's Brother, into France to see her, on a pretence of negotiating some affair with the King her Brother. The King of Denmark hearing of it, and seeing moreover the limited power of the Scotch Ambassadors, believed he was mocked, and gave his Daughter to the Duke of Brunswick. Melvil ascribes, not without great likelihood, this whole intrigue to Elizabeth, and affirms, it was she that informed the King of Denmark of the Lord Tungland's being sent to the Court of Navarre.

Shortly after, in the beginning of the year 1589, was discovered in Scotland a Conspiracy against the King, contrived by the Earls of Huntley and Bathwell, [Son of John Prior of Coldingham,] natural Son of James V (11). Their design was to seize the King's person, and compel him to reitore the Catholick Religion in Scotland (12). It is said, they were excited by emissaries from Spain (13). The 1589. King prevented the execution of the plot by his diligence. He pursued the Earl of Huntley, who had taken arms, till at last he constrained him to yield at discretion. As for Bothwell, he withdrew to his own House, where he meditated new projects, which I shall speak of hereafter. I return to the affairs of England.

Philip Howard Earl of Arundel, eldest Son of the late Duke of Norfolk, who had been three years prisoner in the Tower, was at last brought to his Trial before his Peers, being accused of conspiring against the Queen and State. Camden shews, he was convicted at most, of being disaffected to the Government, and too much attached to the Catholic Religion (1). He was however condemned to die; but the Queen gave him his life (2).

Elizabeth.*

Elizabeth enjoyed now a tranquillity, to which the had been a stranger ever since the beginning of her reign. The Queen of Scotland was no longer in the world ; and the King her Son, in expectation of one day succeeding Elizabeth, stifled his resentment, or rather had entirely forgot the tragical death of his Mother. The King of Spain was disabled to make a fresh attempt upon England, since the unfortunate success of his invincible Armada. The affairs of the United Provinces began to be reformed, by the valour and prudent conduct of Count Maurice, and those of France were in such a situation, that England had nothing to fear from that quarter. The Duke of Guise, Elizabeth's great enemy, was dead, his Son in prison, and the Duke of Mayenne wholly bent upon revenging the death of his Brothers. As for Sixtus V, though very capable of forming great projects, he could not execute them without the aid of some Catholic Potentate ; and the King of Spain, on whom alone he could depend, was wholly engrossed with the thoughts of improving the troubles of France. As for the English Catholics, there was no likelihood of their stirring, at a time when they could not expect any foreign assistance.

In this prosperous state, Elizabeth having nothing to fear either at home or abroad, had a mind to show the Spaniards, the English could attack as well as defend. But as she was extremely frugal, and an undertaking against Spain could not but be very expensive, she so ordered it, that Drake and Norris took upon them to be at the charge, in hopes of making themselves amends by the booty they should meet with. So, she only found them Ships of war (3), with leave to raise Soldiers and Sailors for the expedition. Drake had already tried the Spaniards in America, and the Channel, and was convinced they were more formidable in common opinion, than in reality. Wherefore, joining with Norris, and some other private persons, they equipped a Fleet, and embarked eleven thousand Soldiers, and [fifteen hundred] Mariners. The Hollanders having also added some Ships, the Fleet consisted of four-score sail (+) of all sorts. Drake commanded at Sea, and Norris was General of the Land forces. They took with them Don Antonio, who styled himself King of Portugal, and hoped, by the assistance of the English, to be put in possession of that Kingdom, where he pretended to have many friends.

The field' from Plymouth the 18th of April, and soon after arrived at the Groyne, where landing their troops, they assaulted the Lower-Town and carried it by storm. Then, they besieged the Upper-Town. But Norris having advice that the Condi di Andrala was approaching with a body of troops to relieve the place, suddenly raised the siege to march against him, but the Spanish Cond, thinking proper to retire, he pursued him, and overtaking him flew three thousand of his men. This done, he burnt several villages, and without returning to the siege, re-embarked his Troops. The principal design of the Englsh was to exert themselves chiefly against Portreal.

16. While they were sailing towards the coasts of that Kingdom, they met the Earl of Essex, who joined the fleet with some ships he had armed at his own charge, and unknown to the Queen. Some days after, they arrived at Penicula, a little town of Portugal, and taking it, restored it to Don Antonio. From hence Norris marched by land to Lisbon, Drake promising to follow with the fleet up the Tagus. The army marched sixty miles without any opposition, and encamping before Lisbon took the suburbs of St. Catherine. But as Drake performed not his promise, and the army wanted Cannon and Ammunition, it was resolved in a Council of War, to retire. This resolution was taken, because there was no appearance that the Portuguese were inclined to revolt, as Don Antonio had expected, and also because there was no news of the succours, he had boasted of, from the King of Morocco. The army marching towards the mouth of the Tagus met Drake, who had taken the town of Calcaes, and excused himself upon the impossibility of performing his promise. Some days after, the Castle of Calcaes surrendering, it was blown up, and to make themselves amends for the charges of the expedition, the English seized sixty vessels laden with corn (5) belonging to the Hans-Towns. Then they went and took Figes, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, and firing the town returned to England. This expedition did some damage to the King of Spain, but was of no benefit to Lizbeth, and the booty was not sufficient to pay for equipping the fleet (6). Besides this, above six thousand men perished by sickness. The only advantage reaped by the English was, that they were more convinced of the weakness of the Spaniards in their own country.

The Han-Tsons made great noise on account of the seizure of their Ships in the Tagus, and sent Ambassadors to the Queen with their complaints. They were told in the first place, that in the patent granted them by Edward III. it was expressly provided, they should not import any commodities into the dominions of the professed and open Enemies of England. Secondly, that a neutrality was fo to be ordered, that in assisting one of the parties, the other should not be damaged; and that it was a thing well known, that warlike provisions carried to one of the contending parties, were contraband Goods, and liable to seizure. In the third place, they could not justly complain of the taking their vessels, since the Queen had warned them not to import any provisions to Spain and Portugal, unless they would hazard their being seized by the English.

This affair was of little moment : but what passed in France this year was much more considerable. The step Henry III. had taken, in causing the Duke of Guisse to be stabbed, served only to throw him into greater trouble. His swearing again to the League in the presence of the States before he dismissed them, signified nothing. The Leaguers, as they could no longer trust to his promises and oaths, almost entirely alienated the whole Kingdom from him. Hence he saw himself forced to call the King of Navarre and the Huguenots to his assistance, and join with them against the League. It is a thing very remarkable, that this Prince, who had sworn to extirpate the Huguenots, and solemnly declared he would never keep promise with them, scarce found any other subjects but the Huguenots in whom he could confide. The forces brought him by the King of Navarre, and ten thousand Swissers, two thousand Landknights, with some Horse, which came in season, enabled him to besiege or block up Paris with an army of thirty-eight thousand Men. But just as he saw himself upon the point of compelling the Parisians to return to their duty, James Clement a Jacolin Monk, stabbed him in the belly with a dagger, of which he died in two days. Before he expired, he nominated for his successor the King Henry IV. of Navarre, head of the house of Bourbon, who assumed the name of Henry IV.

The League refused to acknowledge the new King. Nay, he saw himself defected by several great men of the late King's party, and in order to retain some of the Catholic nobility, he was obliged to promise them, that he would within such a time be instructed in the principles of the Romish Religion; that is, would turn Catholic: for that was the meaning given to these words. Mean while he had neither men nor money, the Switzers and Germans who had served Henry III. threatening to leave him, unless he would pay them their arrears, which he was not able to do. In this extremity he had recourse to Elizabeth, who generously promised him both men and money. In expectation of these succours, he stood firm against the Duke of Moyenne, who had forced him into Normandy, and even attacked him at Arques, but without success. Henry thought himself in such danger, that he would have taken the advice given him by some, to fly into England, if the Marshall de Biran had not stopped him. At last, the English supplies arrived, consisting of four thousand men, under the command of Percegrine Lord Willoughby (?), and of twenty-two thousand pounds Sterling in gold. With this reinforcement he was able to approach Paris, and take one of the suburbs of that City. But the Duke of Moyenne having entered with his army, he was forced to retire. Mean while, the Duke of Moyenne had caused the old Cardinal de Bourbon to be proclaimed King, and himself had assumed the title of Lieutenant-

p. 179. Though the King of Denmark had given his eldest daughter to the Duke of Brunsvick, the King of Scotland perished in his design to marry into his family, and demanded his second daughter. Frederic granted his request, but on condition he should cause her to be demanded by a solemn Embassy before the first day of May. But he died in this interval, leaving his successor under age. This did not hinder James from thinking seriously of his marriage with the Princess Ann, the new King's sister. But when he moved in Council the sending of an Embassy to Copenhagen, he was told, he would hazard a rupture with the Queen of England, if he married without consulting her. The authors of this advice knew, Elizabeth would raise obstacles to the marriage. And indeed, in her answer to the King, she tried to make him sensible of sundry inconveniences if he espoused the Princess of Denmark; and to divert him from it, proposed to him Catherine, the King of Navarre's sister, who was not yet come to the Crown of France, promising to serve him to the utmost of her power. Elizabeth's answer being laid before the Council, there was not a Privy-Counsellor but what declared against the Danish match. James was so vexed to be thus contradicted, that by means of a trusty servant he caused the inhabitants of Edinburgh to rise in arms, and threaten to tear the Chancellor and Privy-Counsellors in pieces, if the King's marriage with the Princess of Denmark was not concluded. These threats terrifying the Council, Ambassadors were instantly appointed to negotiate the marriage. But withal care was taken to infer in their instructions a clause, which put them to a stand in the very beginning of their Negotiation, and obliged them to send home the Lord Dingwall to demand fuller Powers, or leave to return.

Canden. This Lord arriving at Court when the Chancellor was absent, the King himself drew the power required by his Ambassadors, whereupon the marriage was soon concluded. Presently after the new Queen was delivered to the Ambassadors to be conducted into Scotland: but a storm arising whilst she was at sea, drove her upon the coast of Norway, where she was forced to land. The wind continued so long contrary, that James, impatient to see his Bride, could not stay till it changed. So, imbarcking in a small vessel, he went to his Queen, and passed the whole winter in Norway and Denmark, from whence he returned not to Scotland till May the next year, bringing his Queen with him (1).

1590. Elizabeth keeps a posture against Spain. Camden. The tranquillity enjoyed by Elizabeth was liable to be disturbed only from Spain. France was not in condition to create her any uneasiness, and the King of Scotland thought only of living peaceably, in expectation of the noble Succession that was to come to him. Philip II. was therefore the sole enemy Elizabeth had to fear. But to secure herself from all surprize, she took the most just, though expensive, precautions. She had always a good Fleet ready to put to Sea at the first notice (2). The fortified Towns and Sea-Ports were likewise in good condition (3), and this cost her as much as if she had been in actual War with Spain. But she supplied all by her good Economy, expending no money but what was absolutely necessary. This displeased her hungry Courtiers, who would have been very glad she had been a little more liberal. But though she knew herself taxed with avarice, she thought not proper to alter her conduct. She thereby avoided being troublesome to the Parliament, and when she wanted an extraordinary aid, was sure to find a ready compliance in the House of Commons, without any murmurs among the People. This advantage outweighed the satisfaction of being called liberal by her Courtiers. Besides, she was persuaded that what was termed avarice in her, was only good Economy. The truth is, with the usual Revenues of the Crown, she found means to supply the expences of her Household, maintain a Fleet, pay the publick debts, and assist her Neighbours in their distress, which none of her Predecessors had ever done. On the contrary, most of them, by their mistaken bounties, had ruined their Subjects for the pleasure of enriching a small number of Courtiers. Besides, Elizabeth had a particular reason to spare the Purfes of her Subjects, in order to gain their affection, the strongest support of her Throne. Wherefore, one of the chief objects of her care was a due management of her Treasury, with intent to be always able to withstand the attacks of her enemies both at home and abroad. Her inspection in the year 1590 into the Customs, notwithstanding the endeavours that were used to divert her from it, occasioned her raising them from fourteen thousand Pounds a year (at which Sum they were farmed by Sir Thomas Smith) to forty two thousand, and at last to fifty thousand. But her great Economy hindered her not from parting with her money when it was necessary. Though, in the two foregoing years she had lent about two hundred thousand Crowns to the King of France, she supplied him with sixty thousand more, because she plainly saw of what consequence the ruin of that Prince might be to England. Moreover, the Garrisons of the Briel and Fleishing, besides the three thousand Men maintained by her in the Low-Countries, cost her yearly above four hundred thousand Florins (4), because she was forced to advance the money till the States should be able to repay her. In fine, she paid also considerable Penfions to several Persons of the Court of Scotland, whose business it was to acquaint her with all that passed there, and to keep the King well-affected to England, as he had been for some time.

Whilst Elizabeth enjoyed some tranquillity, France was troubled with the Wars between the King and the League. In March the King gained the Battle of Jvry against the Duke of Mayenne, after which he invested Paris, and even took the Suburbs. That great City was now reduced to extremity, when the Duke of Parma arrived from the Netherlands, and forced the King to raise the Blockade. That done, he returned without the King's being able to oblige him to fight.

On the other hand, in the Duke of Parma's absence, and of the Count Maurice, who had already taken Breda by surprize, made some farther progress, which helped to put the affairs of the United Provinces in a better situation than before.

This same year the Duke of Mercœur, of the House of Lorain, became master of Bretagne by the assistance of the Spaniards, who took Hennebont and Blavet. This affair disturbed Elizabeth, who did not care to have the Spaniards so near her, especially as Philip II. might claim Bretagne for his Daughter the Infanta Isabella, whose Mother was Daughter of Henry II.

Sir Francis Walsingham Secretary of State, who had long served the Queen with great zeal and ability, died this year, so poor, that he was buried privately to save charges (5). Thomas Randolph, whom I have frequently mentioned, and who had been employed in several Embassies, particularly in Scotland, soon followed Walsingham.

The Civil Wars of France were then the most material affair of Europe. It could no longer be doubted, that Philip II. was thinking either to dismember that Kingdom, or procure it for his Daughter Isabella, Grand-daughter to Henry II, notwithstanding the Salic Law. Sixtus V. favoured the project to the utmost of his power, under colour of hindering a Heretic from being acknowledged King of France. If this design was not executed, it must be wholly ascribed to the Duke of Mayenne's Jealousy, who did not intend to labour for others. Mean while, Henry IV. was extremely embarrassed. The forces of the Huguenots alone were not sufficient to enable him to surmount all obstacles, since he had no left to do than to conquer the whole Kingdom of France, and the Catholick Nobles in his Army served him with reluctance. Nay, they had required him, in return for their service, to be instructed, and in such manner, that this instruction should produce in him a change of Religion. In this pressing necessity, he could not be without foreign Succours, and these Succours could be had only from Germany or England. It was visibly the interest of Elizabeth and the Protestant Princes to support Henry, not to see the King of Spain's power increased by the acquisition of France. But however it was not easy to persuade them, that they ought to employ all their forces to maintain a war, of

(1) This year, on February 4, a new Parliament met at Westminster, which was dissolved March 29. The Temporality granted the Queen two Subsidies, of 2 s. 8 d. in the Pound, and four Fifteenths, and a Tenth besides, says Stow, p. 751. The Clergy gave two Subsidies of 6 s. in the Pound, to be paid yearly by two shillings in the Pound. See Statut. — In this Parliament it was enacted, 1. That no Person, except the Party grieved, shall be received to inform or sue upon any penal Statute. 2. That no Person shall build, maintain, or uphold any Cottage, unless he lays to it four Acres of ground at least. The penalty for building one is 10 l. and for upholding it 40 s. a month. He spent his whole time and estate in the service of his Queen and Country; and had the best Intelligence from all parts that any Minister ever had. He left only one Daughter, who was married, 1st, to Sir Philip Sidney; 2dly, to Robert Earl of Essex; and 3dly, to Richard, Bourke Earl of Clanrickard in Ireland. Ibid. which Henry was to reap all the benefit. They were very ready to supply him with Troops, but not to pay them. It was his business to find money. Elizabeth plainly perceived, of what consequence it was to her to that the succours she gave the King, should be employed in driving the Spaniards out of the maritime Provinces of Bretagne, Normandy, and Normandy, for that was what most nearly concerned her. It was the King's interest, on the contrary, to expel his army from the center of the Kingdom, before he thought king them on the borders, and the more, as he the day put Elizabeth under a continual necessity of assisting him. However, to receive aid from England, he was to promise what Elizabeth required. They agreed therefore upon a Treaty, whereby Elizabeth engaged to send three thousand men into Bretagne and Picardy, to hinder the Spaniards from settling in those Provinces, on condition the should be repaid within a year (1) all her charges in raising and keeping the Troops. Henry consented to every thing, not to delay the negotiation, though he was fully convinced of the impossibility to perform his promise by the time appointed. Presently after, the three thousand English sailed, part into Bretagne under the conduct of Norvis, and part into Picardy under the command of Sir Roger Williams.

At the same time, Henry had negotiated in Germany, a levy of eleven thousand Men, by means of the Elector of Brandenburgh, and Casimir Prince Palatine. But this supply not justifying, he sent and demanded a second from Elizabeth, and to obtain it more easily, gave her to understand, that with this reinforcement he should be able to undertake the Siege of Raan. Elizabeth's great desire to see the maritime Towns of France out of the power of the Leaguers, caused her to fall into this snare. She made therefore with Henry a new Treaty, whereby she engaged to supply him with four thousand Men more, and pay them two months, imagining, that time was sufficient for the Siege of Raan. When these supplies were ready, she gave the command to the Earl of Essex (2), a young Nobleman, who had much of her favour, and for whom it was believed, she felt something more than a bare esteem, though she was then fifty-eight years of age. The Earl of Essex, greedy of glory, departed from England full of hopes to signalize himself at the Siege of Raan, but at his arrival in France, found the Siege had not been so much as thought of: That the King was employed before Najon, and intended to send the English Forces into Champagne. Whereupon he returned into England, having first given the King his parole of honour, to come and join him, as soon as the Siege of Raan should be undertaken. He left his Troops however in France, under the command of Sir Roger Williams.

Elizabeth was extremely offended to be thus imposed on. She writ to Henry, that since he had broke his word, he might for the future proceed without her assistance, and that she intended to recall all her Troops, unless he immediately performed his promise. Elizabeth's Letter embarrased Henry exceedingly. He had certain advice that the Duke of Parma was preparing to return into France, and, in such a juncture, the recalling of the English Forces, would have been very unseasonable. He was forced therefore, in order to satisfy Elizabeth, to cause Raan to be invested by the Marshal de Biron. But he took a fresh occasion from thence to demand of Elizabeth, a new supply of five thousand Men, on pretence, that the Troops already sent were extremely diminished by sickness and desertion. At the same time, the Earl of Essex, knowing Raan was invested, went over to the Siege (3), contrary to the Queen's express orders; supposing, that since he had given the King his parole, nothing could free him from his engagement. Elizabeth was so displeased with the King, and the Earl, that she returned a very rough answer to the French Ambassador, who pressed her for the five thousand Men, demanded by the King his master, and left him no hopes of obtaining them. At the same time, she dispatched [Sir Thomas] Leyton, the Earl of Essex's Uncle, with an express order to him, instantly to return, if he would not be entirely disgraced. Mean while, Henry hearing the Duke of Parma was departed from Brussels about the end of November, repaired to his army before Raan, to carry on the Siege, hoping to take the City before the Duke of Parma's arrival. Shortly after, he sent Du Plessis Mornay to Elizabeth, to try to obtain the desired supply.

Du Plessis Mornay was received in ordinary, being admitted to audience, and telling the Duke of Parma his business, the plainly answered, he would not be the French King's dupe; neither would he be the future concern himself any more with his affairs, nor was he to expect any other assistance from her than her prayers: That he had demanded a speedy aid for the French, which she had accordingly sent him; but instead of executing their Treaty, he had lost his time before Najon, and suffered the English Troops to decay, whilst he was making war in Champagne: That he had given the Duke of Parma four months to prepare, and then, a speedy supply was desired of her, which would not have been wanted, had things been done in time. To this she added great threats against the Earl of Essex, saying, he would have it thought that he ruled in England, but nothing was more false, and she would make him the most pitiful fellow in the Kingdom; that, instead of sending fresh Troops into France, she was determined to recall those that were there. Then pretending to be indispensed, she desired the Ambassadors to be contented with this short audience, hardly giving Du Plessis time to return any answer to her complaints. But he had taken care before hand, and prepared a memorial which he would have presented her, but she bid him give it the Lord's restorer. In short, Essex returned, without obtaining any thing, and the Earl of Essex was forced to go back to England, where he found means to appease the Queen. Mean while, the Duke of Parma having entered France, and being joined by the Duke of Mayenne, and the young Duke of Guisse, who had escaped out of prison, raised the Siege of Raan. Henry easily perceived by Elizabeth's conduct, she would not suffer herself to be amused by his artifices, and for fear of losing so necessary an assistance, laboured so effectually to be reconciled with her, that at last she sent him two thousand fresh Men; but it was not till after the raising of the Siege.

Whilst these things were transacting, the late Duke of Norfolk's Son, was gone with six Men of war to the Azores, to wait for the Spanish Plate-Fleet, homeward bound from America. Having stayed six months in the Isle of Flores, he was himself almost surprized by Alphonso Bassano, who was sent to convoy home the Fleet, with fifty three Ships of war. He had the good fortune to escape the danger, by a timely retreat, but one of his Ships that was not speedy enough, was taken by the Spaniards, after a sharp engagement (4). The English made themselves ample amends for this loss, by several prizes, and particularly by taking a Ship richly laden, bound for the West-Indies, in which, 'tis said, they found two and twenty thousand Indulgences for the Spaniards of America (5).

This year the Queen published a first of which prohibited the carry of any warlike Stores or Provisions into the Kingdom. The second, published in October, expressly forbid the harbouring any person who should come from the English Seminaries, at Rome, or Rhein, or from a third, lately founded by the King of Spain at Valadolid (6).

The war which was continued in France, made Elizabeth ever uneasy, because the Spaniards had got footing in Bretagne, from whence they might make descents upon England. Henry perfectly knowing her extreme desire to dislodge them from that post, demanded a farther aid to carry the war into that Province. The Elizabeth had experienced, that she could not much rely on his word, because it was not always in his power to make war where he pleased, she concluded with him however a new Treaty to this effect: That she should furnish him with four thousand men, some pieces of ordnance, and a certain quantity of ammunition: That he should add to the English Troops four thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, and this army be employed to recover Bretagne: That he should within a year repay all her charges: That he should not make peace with the Leaguers till they promis'd to assist him in driving the Spaniards out of the Kingdom: That England should be expressly included in 1592. the peace he should make with Spain. Elizabeth sincerely performed her engagement, and sent four thousand men into Bretagne, under the Command of Norris (1). But Henry, instead of joining his Troops with the English, and carrying the war into Bretagne, ordered them to serve in Normandy, whether he was most prevail'd in those parts, or had made the Treaty only to amuse the Queen. However this be, Elizabeth relented it extremely to be again deceived. She often writ to the King, complaining of his proceedings, but to no purpose. In her anger, she was going to recall all her Troops; but hearing, the Duke of Parma was preparing to make a third expedition into France, sacrificed her resentment to the Good of that Kingdom, which was in some measure her own. Indeed the Duke of Parma was upon the point of re-entering France; but death, which seized him at the same time, freed Henry as well as Elizabeth from their uneasiness.

Scotland was then disturbed by Bothwell, who made this year a fresh attempt to become master of the King's person. As his design was discovered before it could be executed, he was forced to fly into England. Elizabeth being informed of it, writ to the King, that she would cause those who had harboured the Fugitive to be severely punished. And yet, when James sent and required her to deliver him up, pursuant to their Treaty, she evaded his demand, being well pleas'd to keep that Prince always in a sort of uneasiness which should oblige him to regard her.

The Riches brought by the Spanish Fleets from the East and West-Indies, were a continual allurement to the English, who attempted almost every year to take them. Sir Walter Raleigh, with that design, departing this year with fifteen sail, met near the Azores a seven-decked Car-rack, one hundred and sixty five foot long, most richly laden, which he took without much difficulty. This prize made him some amends for his charges, in fitting out his Fleet. But the contrary Winds hindered him from executing a more important enterprize projected against America (2).

There was a sort of prodigy this Summer at London: the Thames was so dried up, and the Channel so shallow, that a Man might ride over it near London Bridge (3).

The Parliament meeting in February 1593 (4), pass'd an Act which troubled not only the Catholics, but even Protestants who differed in certain points from the Church of England, and were called Puritans. By this Act, those who neglected to be present at Divine Service, established by Law, were liable to certain penalties (5), and so, not only was it no longer permitted to be a Roman Catholic with impunity, but even a Protestant without conforming to the Church of England. Thus in some measure were renewed the days of Henry VIII. when it was unlawful to swerve ever so little from the religion of the Sovereign; with this difference, that under Elizabeth the penalty was not Death, as in the Reign of her Father. Nevertheless there was in this last Act something more hard than in those of Henry VIII. That Prince, absolute as he was, contented himself with punishing such as, by some over-act, oppos'd the established Religion; but by this new Statute, the subjects were oblig'd openly to profess the religion of the Church of England. Elizabeth, exasperated against the Catholics, who had made frequent attempts upon her Crown and even her life, would have been very glad to have cleared the Kingdom of them. On the other hand, she could not endure the Puritans, looking upon them as obstinate people, who for very frivolous Causes bred a Schism in the Protestant Church. Whilst she was in danger from the Queen of Scots, France, and Spain; in a word, whilst her affairs remained in a sort of uncertainty, she left the Puritans unmolested, for fear of uniting them in the same Interest with the Catholics. But no longer was she firmly established, but she hearkened to the suggestions of the Clergy, who represented the Puritans seditious persons, who rebelled against the Laws, and by their disobedience shook the foundations of the Government. This is not the only time, nor is England the only State, where disobedience in point of Religion has been confounded with Rebellion against the Sovereign. There is scarce a Christian State, where the prevailing Sect will suffer the least division, or the least swerving from the established opinions, no, not even in private. Shall I venture to say it? 'Tis the Clergy chiefly who support this strange principle of Non-Tolerance, so little agreeable to Christian Charity. The severity which from this time began to be exercised in England upon the Non-Conformists (6), produced terrible effects in the following Reigns, and occasioned troubles and factions which remain to this day, and of which perhaps there will be no end these many years.

The same Parliament taking into consideration the Queen's great expences, both in defending the Kingdom against the Spanish Invasion, and in assisting the French King, and the United-Provinces, granted her an extraordinary aid of Money. But it was inserted in the Act, that so large and unusual a supply, granted to a most excellent Queen, who made so good use of the publick money, should not be drawn into a precedent (7). The Queen coming to the House to give the Royal Assent to this Act, made a fine Speech, wherein she forgot not to extol her love and care of her subjects, and her attachment to the Protestant-Religion. She spoke in lofty terms of the bravery of the English, and shew'd how formidable they were to all the Nations of Europe (8). No person was ever more master of the art of gaining the affection of her people, by expressing an uncommon value and tenderness for them.

Amidst all the occasions, the Queen had to congratulate herself upon her good fortune, she still felt some uneasiness with respect to the transactions of Scotland. King James began to be ruled by suspicious persons, and the Queen received advice, that the Spaniards assisted by the Catholics, were contriving some dangerous plot (9), and were countenanced by the Earls of Huntley, Argyll, and Erlol. She heard farther, that the King acted not with the vigour necessary to prevent their designs, and thereby gave cause to suspect, he was himself something inclined to innovations. She did not entirely rely on that Prince. Besides his suffering himself to be always guided by those whom he entrusted with the administration of his affairs, she was afraid, he had been inspired with the desire to revenge the Queen his Mother's death, and that his protestations of being ever attached to her Interest, were only intended to amuse her. For this reason, she sent the Lord Borough to give him advice, and desire him to inform her of what he knew concerning the plots of the Spaniards and Catholics. She wish'd moreover, he would show himself a little more severe to those who endeavour'd to raise troubles in Scotland, and would admit to his Council only persons of known loyalty. James answer'd, he would do what the Queen desired, as far as his own Interest, and the Laws of the land would allow. But withal, he told the Ambassador, that his Revenues being extremely diminished, he expected the Queen to furnish him with means to punish those who should dare to disturb the publick Peace. He also required, she should deliver up Bothwell, who had twice attempted upon his life, and even sent Robert Melvil to Elizabeth, to demand him expressly. But she refus'd to surrender him, and only banish'd him

(5) In the Preamble it is said, That this Act was made, for the preventing and avoiding of such great inconveniences and perils, as might happen and grow by the wicked and dangerous practices of seditious Sectaries, and dissuall Persons. The Act ran, That if any Person above the age of sixteen years, shall refuse to repair to some Church, or forbear to do the same for the space of a month, —shall be committed to Prison, there to remain without Bail or Mainprize, till they shall conform —and make such open submission and declaration of their Conformity, as by this Act is appointed. The Offenders against this Statute, who refus'd to make the submission, were to abjure the Realm, and not to return without her Majesty's Licence, under the Penalty of suffering as Felons, without benefit of the Clergy. This Bill met with great opposition in the House of Commons, as the Reader may see in Dewees, p. 474, &c. where the Speeches on both sides are inserted. There was an Act made also against Popish Reculants, by which they were confin'd within five miles of their respective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their Goods and Chattels, together with Lands, during life. By another Act, all the Abbeys Lands are confin'd to the Crown and Gentry.

(6) These severities were probably occasioned by the disturbances caus'd by Hacker, and some other Enthusiasts. However this be, the same Hacker, on July 23. 1593, and also Henry Barrow, John Greenwood, Daniel Studley, and two more, were executed April 6. 1593, for writing and publishing seditious Books; as was the next year John Penny, for writing a Book call'd, Martin Mar-Prelate. See Stow, p. 764 —766.

(7) The Laitie granted three Subsidies, of 2 s. 8*d.* in the Pound of Goods, and 4 s. of Lands; together with six F Friends and Tenth's, amounting in all to 250,000*l.* And the Clergy advanced two whole Subsidies, of 4 s. in the Pound, to be paid in two years. This Summ'd-Bill pass'd with great difficulty in the Lower House, being debated on Feb. 16. March 2, 3, 6, 7, 9, 10, 12, 16, and 19. See the Debates in Dewees, p. 473, 477, &c. 483. Let it be observed here, that a Fifth and a Tenth was a certain Tax on every City, Borough and Town, not upon every Man in particular, but a general fund, in proportion to the Greatness part of the wealth of the respective Places. Subsidy was impos'd on every single Person, as they are assisted by Pals, according to the value of their Goods and Lands.

(8) She made this Speech the last day of the Session, April 10. 1593.

(9) The Plot was, to raise a Subsidization for a large sum of Money in Scotland; and then an Army of thirty thousand Spaniards was to land in that Kingdom, about the end of the year 1594, which was to be join'd by Bothwell, &c. with a body of Troops: And all these were to march into England, to revenge the Queen of Scots death. See Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 16. p. 190 —194.

out of England, as he was bound by the Treaty of League, made with the King.

Bathwell not being able to stay longer in England, returned into Scotland, and withdrew to his own House. Shortly after, his party so increased, by accidents, which it is needless to mention, that he had the boldness to come into the King's presence, under colour of begging his pardon. James was surprized to see him, but was more so, when he perceived, that his whole Court, except some of his Ministers, were Bathwell's friends. He was therefore forced as it were to grant him a pardon, on condition that he should depart the Kingdom, and not return unless recalled. Bathwell accepted the condition, and concealed himself on the borders of England. But at his departure, he left so strong a party in the Court, that the King was at last obliged to dismiss the Chancellor, the Lord-Treasurer, and others whom he most trusted. Bathwell was ready to improve this change, but the King broke his measures, by declaring to the States, he was compelled to pardon him, and by desiring their aid to free him from his yoke. The States declaring for the King, he recalled his Ministers, and Bathwell's friends were driven from the Court.

In this Assembly of the States, an ordinance was made for supporting the Protestant Religion, as established in Scotland. But as the King and his Council were suspected of favouring the plots of the Catholics, this ordinance was not deemed strong enough by the people, who thought that in such a juncture, the States should have taken more vigorous measures. However this be, the King's obstinacy in keeping in the Ministry, and about his person, Men who seemed to have no zeal for the Protestant Religion, gave occasion to suspect, some dangerous plot was contriving for its destruction.

What passed in France made Elizabeth no less uneasy than the King of Scotland's Inconstancy. General Norris was still in Bretagne with the English forces. He had been promised a place in that Province for a retreat, and that the Duke d'Aumont and Espinay, should join him; but he was long left there, without being thought of. At last, Espinay being arrived, they made together some little Conquests, too inconsiderable to requite Elizabeth for the maintenance of her Troops, which cost her weekly three thousand [two hundred] pounds Sterling (1). Thus, instead of employing the English to drive the Spaniards out of Bretagne, Henry used them only to keep his Enemies in awe, and hinder them from making greater progress, whilst he was warring elsewhere. Elizabeth seeing herself thus deceived, would have recalled her Troops, but was persuaded by the Marshal d'Aumont, not only to leave them, but even to send fresh supplies, upon the hopes he gave her, that the King would very soon make a powerful effort to reduce that Province.

The Queen's vexation at Henry's proceedings was nothing in comparison of her concern, when she heard he was going to change his Religion. At the first news, she dispatched Thomas Wilks to dissuade him, if possible, from that design; but at his arrival, Wilks found the thing already done. However Henry thought proper to inform him of the reasons of his change, that he might acquaint the Queen his Mistress with the same. All he said on this occasion tended to this (2), that he had changed his Religion against his will, and after as long a delay as possible. but being at last convinced he should never be fixed in his Throne, whilst a Protestant, he had determined to embrace the Catholic Religion. That is, in other words, having put his conscience in the balance with his Crown, he had given it for the latter. After so express a declaration of the inconstancy of his Conversion, it is no wonder, Elizabeth should lose much of her esteem for him, and the Pope and Leaguers not consider him as a true Catholic, or rather it is strange they should be satisfied with an outward appearance. Morlant the French Ambassador at London, having told Elizabeth the substance of the King's discourse to Wilks, she writ the King the following Lines.

It is hardly possible to express the extreme grief and dissatisfaction which has seized me upon Morlant's Representation of things. Good God! What a miserable World do we live in? Could I ever have thought, Sir, that any secular consideration could have prevailed with you to discard a just sense of God and his fear? Or can you ever reasonably expect that Providence will grant this change of yours a happy Issue? Or could you entertain a Jealousy that the gracious

Being, who had so long supported and preserved you, would fail and abandon you at last? It is, believe me, a dangerous experiment, to do evil that good may come. But I hope you may be yet recovered to a better inclination, even the Spirit of a sound mind. In the mean time I shall not cease to recommend your case to God in my daily Prayers, and earnestly to beseech him that Elau's hands may not pollute the blessings and birth right of Jacob. The Promise you make of a sacred and friendly Alliance, I conceive my self to have desired, and even earned at a vast expence: But I had not mattered that, had you still kept your self the Son of the same Father. From henceforth I cannot look on my self as your Sister, in respect to our common Father, for I must and shall always pay a much greater regard to nature than choice in that Relation: As I may appeal to God, whom I beseech to recover you into the path of a safer and sounder Judgment.

Your Sister after the old-fashioned way. As for the new I have nothing to do with it.

ELIZABETH.

This was not the only affair Wilks was charged to mention to the King of France. He had orders to complain from the Queen, that the late Treaty was not executed, and d'Aumont's delay had been very expensive to the Queen. Henry threw all the blame on the Marshal, and positively promised to march himself into Bretagne, when the Truce for that Province was expired. He added, that in the mean time, he would advise with his Council concerning the place of retreat for the English Troops. But these were only empty words. The King's intention was not to employ his forces against Bretagne, before he had reduced the rest of France, but only to use the English Troops by way of diversion to the Duke of Alençon, for fear, when he had made himself absolute master of Bretagne, he should assist the Duke of Moyenne. Still less did he intend to give a place of retreat to the English in that Province, lest he should find it very difficult to dislodge them. These things troubled the Queen exceedingly, and certainly, had the aided Henry only from a motive of friendship and generosity, as the would have made him believe, she would never have suffered such infringements of the Treaties. But it was manifestly her interest to oppose the Spaniards' designs, who had a mind to become master of France, under pretence of maintaining the Catholic Religion. Henry perfectly knew Elizabeth's policy, and therefore gave her only good words, well knowing she was concerned to assist him. At length the King of Spain preparing to exert his utmost in support of the League, which was declining, since the King's turning Catholic, Elizabeth readily made a League offensive and defensive with Henry, whatever reason she had to complain of him. This League was concluded and signed at Milan in October, and among other Articles it was agreed, that a Peace should not be made without a mutual consent.

About this time, it was discovered in England that one Huguet had been sent by some English fugitives, to persuade Ferdinand Earl of Derby to assume the title of King, as Great-Grandson of Mary Daughter of Henry VII (3). When this was proposed to the Earl, Huguet added, he might rely on the assistance of Philip II, but if he refused to do what was proposed, or did not keep the thing secret, he might be assured, he should not live long. The Earl of Derby fearing to be informed, informed against Huguet, who was taken and hanged. But he died himself within four months, by a strange poison which made him vomit himself to death (4). His Gentleman of the horse was suspected of the deed, because he rid away the first day of his Lord's illness. The English fugitives imagined there were such numbers of Malecontents in England, that some great Man's declaring against the Queen would be sufficient to raise a general rebellion. This is not the only time, that, in the like junctures, fugitives have flattered themselves with such vain hopes (5).

The Duke of Parma's death had not entirely hindered the expedition designed by the Spaniards against France. Their Army had entered Picardy and taken Noyon, and was returned into Lambers. After Parma's death, the Count de Puentes and D. Diego d'Almeida were at the head of the Council, expecting a new Governor. While the administration of affairs rested in their hands, they inces-

(4) He died, April 16, in the very flower of his youth. There was found in his Chamber an Image of Wax, with hairs thrust through the belly of it, of the same colour with his own, which was in sight to be placed there on purpose to avoid the suspicion of his being poisoned. He was succeeded by his Brother William, who had afterwards a famous Tryal with Ferdinand's three Daughters, for the dominion of the Isle of Man. Camden, ibid. Stow, p. 767, &c.

(5) This year Queen Elizabeth ordered a Garrison to be kept in the Isles of Silly, and a Fort to be built in the Island of St. Mary. She also fortified the Isle of Jersey and Guernsey. Camden, p. 274. There was also the Siege of St. John's, &c. &c. p. 274.

1593. faintly endeavoured to excite troubles in Scotland, by assuring the Catholics of a powerful assistance from the King of Spain. Their project was to send a Spanish Army into Scotland, to assassinate or poison Queen Elizabeth, and then invade England with their Army from Scotland, which the general confusion upon her death would render less difficult. To execute the design upon Elizabeth, they had cast their eyes on Rodrigo Lopez a Jew, and two Portuguese. Lopez the Queen's Physician, had promised to poison her for fifty thousand Crowns. This Plot being discovered, the three Accomplices confessed, they had been corrupted by the Count de Fuentes, and Don Diego d'Ibarra, to undertake so execrable a design. Lopez however pleaded in his excuse, that his intention was only to draw money from the King of Spain, and that he had even presented to the Queen a rich Jewel received from that Prince. But as he had given no intimation of the Plot, his excuse was not allowed. At the Gallows he affirmed, That he loved the Queen as well as Jesus Christ. This was a plain indication that he was not unjustly condemned.

The day after these three Villains were executed, a fourth, one Patrick Cullen, an Irish fencing-master, who had been sent from the Low-Countries to kill the Queen, underwent the same fate. Edmund York and Richard Williams, who had been suborned by Ibarra to commit the same crime, were also arrested, and others were discovered who had engaged to fire the Navy. Elizabeth on this occasion writ to the Archduke Ernst, who had been appointed Governor of the Low-Countries, to demand the punishment of the Authors. She told him moreover, that to clear the King of Spain from suspicion, the most proper way would be to surrender all the fugitive English in his Dominions, or at least those who were concerned in the Conspiracies (1). But foreseeing that Antonio Perez, who had endeavoured to excite troubles in Aragon, and was then in England, might likewise be demanded, she told the Archduke, the King of France had sent him to his Ambassador at London, without her knowledge, and he had never been afflicted by her: but all this was to no purpose. On the other hand, the Earl of Essex received Perez into his house, to learn of him the secrets of the Spanish Monarchy.

It was not only in England that the Spaniards had the mortification to see their projects miscarry. In France likewise their affairs were in a very ill situation, since Henry's embracing the Catholic Religion. The Cities and great Men who had been for the League, returned in crowds to the obedience of the King, and all the People manifestly tended to shake off the Spanish Yoke. The 23rd of March, the City of Paris was surrendered to the King by Count Brissac, and the Duke of Feria, who was there, was obliged to take a safe-conduct from the King, to retire with his Spanish Troops to the Duke of Guise's Army. It was then only that Henry seriously resolved to drive the Spaniards out of Bretagne, who were in possession of many Places in that Province. The Marshal d'Aumont having been intrusted with the management of this War, made good use of the English Troops, who distinguished themselves with that bravery, that the Queen was obliged to write to Norris, not to be so lavish of the blood of her Subjects. Martin Forbisher, a famous Sea-Officer, was killed at a Siege in this War (2). Some time after, the Queen recalled Norris, to send him into Ireland.

The affairs of Scotland gave Elizabeth perpetual uneasiness. She had intimations from thence, that the Spanish Faction was powerful at Court; that something was contriving against the Protestant Religion, and that the King seemed to incline to the Popish Party. This filling the Queen with suspicions, she resolved to send the Lord Zouch into Scotland, as well to be informed of the truth, as to fortify the English party, and instruct King James in his true interest. This Ambassador represented to the King from his mistress, that the late Act of the States was not capable to restrain the insolence of the Roman Catholics, who affected publicly to exercise their religion, and held an almost open correspondence with the King of Spain. James answered, that he would proceed against the Catholics by the established Laws; and if they refused a submission to the Laws, he would prosecute them with the sword, provided the Queen, who had the same interest as himself, would contribute to the expence of the War. The Ambassador, not satisfied with this answer, earnestly pressed him to procure other laws against the Catholics more severe than the present. To this James, with some heat, replied, he was not at the Queen's command, nor did it belong to her to prescribe in what manner he should govern his Kingdom. After that, he demanded Bothwell, who was retired into England.

But Elizabeth was very far from giving him this satisfaction. On the contrary, it was probably from her that Bothwell was enabled to enter Scotland at the head of four hundred men, with whom he surprized the town of Leith. He afterwards published a Manifesto, importing, "that persons dangerous to the Church and State, having by some artifice procured admission into the Council, gave occasion by their conduct, to believe, they were forming a design against the Evangelical Religion: That for some time the Renshaw Priests had been seen running from village to village, and celebrating the Mass in the most publick manner: That they endeavoured to animate the People against the English, in order to kindle a war between the two Nations, which could not but prove fatal to Scotland: that to give check to these dangerous conspiracies, he had, with the concurrence of divers Lords and Gentlemen, taken arms to drive these pernicious Counsellors out of the Kingdom, or bring them to an account for their actions: that the thing was the more urgent, as the Spaniards were going to invade the Kingdom; and therefore he exhorted the Scots to join with him, to prevent greater mischiefs, and induce the King to favour so just a design." He writ in the same manner to the general Synod of the Kirk assembled at Dunbar, and to the English Ambassadors. When the coherence between Bothwell's manifesto, and the Lord Zouch's representation to the King is considered, Elizabeth must be suspected of being concerned in this undertaking.

Mean time the King having assembled some Forces, prepared to oppose Bothwell's designs, who declined not however to meet him. But the Rebel, having found disadvantage in the first engagement, and finding himself not supported, was seized with fear, and retired to the Borders. Whereupon Elizabeth forbid any to follow or counsel him. This was very agreeable to the Scotch King, who was afraid the world might think of supplanting him. The undertaking miscarried, it however produced a very good effect. James perceiving the danger he might incur by breach with Elizabeth, resolved at last to alter his conduct, and least his vain projects should cause him in the end to forfeit the English Crown. He therefore assembled the States, and prevailed to have the Catholic Lords, who had appeared too zealous for the Spaniard, to be banished the Kingdom. They made some efforts to resist, but were at last obliged to obey. Then the States enacted new laws against the Catholics, and even formed an association like that in England some years before. One Graham Fintry, a zealous adherent of Spain, endeavouring to excite new troubles, was punished with death (3).

The King of Scotland's change, and the vigour he exerted on this occasion, destroyed the hopes entertained by the Catholics, of engaging him in their interest. They therefore formed new projects to place the Crown of England on the head of some person devoted to their Religion, or at least, not very zealous for the Protestant. The English Catholics cast their eyes on the Earl of Essex, who, they had observed, approved not the Laws made against them (4). But the English fugitives in the Low-Countries were for the Infanta Isabella, daughter of Philip II. They even published a Genealogy, to show, that the King of Scotland being a Heretic, the Crown was devolved to the King of Spain, whence they inferred, he had power to dispose of it in favour of his daughter. Nor was this a bare project founded on the passion of the English Catholics. It is certain, Philip, though he wanted not employment, since the King of France had declared war against him, intended to make extraordinary efforts to procure his daughter the Crown offered her by the English fugitives. The fame of his preparations was now blown over Europe, and produced mischievous effects in Ireland, where [Hugh O'Neal] Earl of Tir-conn had rebelled, in expectation of the assistance promised by the Spaniard. This obliged Elizabeth to prepare for the defence of her dominions, and to send a strong reinforcement to Norris now in Ireland.

Henry IV, had, as I said, declared war against Spain, though unadvisedly, if it could have been avoided, considering the miserable situation of France. But Philip II, by his continual and powerful support of the League, had sufficiently declared war against Henry, though we pretended to make war not upon, but for France. However this be, Henry was indispensably obliged to maintain a war against Spain, and therefore believed, it would be better to attack Philip directly, than to stand upon the defensive. But as France was drained both of men and money, it was not easy for him to support the war alone, and come off with honour. He had therefore recourse to Elizabeth, as to his last refuge in his pressing necessities. And, perhaps he was encouraged to break openly with Spain, by the hopes of a powerful assistance from England. To that end, he writ to the Queen, that the recalling of Norris, and his Forces, had broke all his measures, and he had rather expected the would send greater succours, since he had declared war against Spain. Elizabeth answered, "That she commended his resolution to attack the King of Spain's Dominions: That this was a good expedient to prevent an Invasion, as she had experienced: That as to the recalling of her Troops out of Bretagne, he could not justly complain of it, since they had not only remained there longer than their Treaty required, but even, notwithstanding the manifest breach of that Treaty, and the violation of his promise: That he had positively engaged to surrender to the English, the Town of Harfleur when taken, for a place of retreat: But that this very place, conquered at the expense of English blood, had been denied to the just expectation of the English, by a fraudulent capitulation of the Marshal d'Amurat, to have none but Catholics admitted into it: That he ought not to be surprised, if she was unwilling to be his dupe any longer, since she could rely neither on his promises nor his treaties: That besides, she wanted her Forces in Ireland, where there was danger of a general revolt." It is certain, Henry's behaviour to Elizabeth was no encouragement to her to grant him any great assistance. And therefore, it was only her fear of the Spaniards taking advantage of the weakness of France, which still kept her attached to Henry's Interest, for whom she had no longer her former esteem and regard. It may also be said, that since his accession to the Throne of France, he had done nothing tending to preserve Elizabeth's friendship.

The Queen, in the present situation of her affairs, not being able to rely much on the King of France, and looking upon all her expense, on his account, as entirely fruitless, resolved to keep her Forces and Treasure for the defence of her own Dominions, in case they should be attacked by the Spaniard. England was properly in danger only from Scotland; but the news she received of the change in King James, freed her from all uneasiness. That Prince perceiving, Philip's aims were levelled as much against Scotland as England, saw at last, that the best way to break his measures, was to live in union with Elizabeth. So, to show that he meant to preserve this union, he published a Proclamation, forbidding, under severe penalties, his Subjects on the borders to injure the English, and the Queen put forth another to the same purpose. From this time he lived with Elizabeth in a good understanding, which nothing was capable to disturb, being sensible this was the surest way to ascend one day the Throne of England.

Edmund York and Richard Williams, who had been arrested the last year, being tried and convicted of a design to murder the Queen, were executed in February. They confessed, that Barba had promised them forty thousand Florins, if they accomplished their enterprise.

Henry IV, after his declaration of war with Spain, formed a design of penetrating into the Low-Countries, and making considerable Conquests; but he was soon sensible, his measures were not just. In April 1595, Ferdinand de Velasco, Count of Castile, came into France with the head of eighteen thousand Men, and threatened the Duchy of Burgundy. This obliged Henry to lead thither in person the best part of his army. Whilst he was thus employed in Burgundy, the Count de Fuentes, who commanded in the Netherlands, after the death of the Archduke Ernst, entered Picardy, and became master of Caudebec. Then, he besieged Doullens, beat the French, who came to his relief, and took the Town by storm. Henry, upon this mortifying news, sent Chevalier immediately into England to demand a supply of Forces, for the defence of Picardy, according to his Treaty with the Queen. In the Instructions given to his Envoy, he ordered him to take care, that this supply should be ready in a fortnight after the date: but Chevalier spent twelve days in his voyage. The Queen answered, she would not fail to send a body of Troops into Picardy, as soon as they could be ready, to defend Calais, Dieppe, and Boulogne. Indeed the sole motive of her Treaty with Henry, was to prevent the Spaniards from becoming masters of those maritime places; but she had never pretended to defend the inland Towns of that Province, for which she was little concerned. This was not what the King wanted, having no desire to put the English into these places. He pretended, that without any distinction, the Queen should send him a body of Troops, to assist him in driving the Spaniards out of all Picardy. At the same time, the Deputies of the Province of Bretagne arrived at London, to demand supplies of the Queen, without specifying either the number or service, and without offering a place of retreat; but this demand of Troops was rejected by the Queen.

The Spaniards, after the taking of Doullens, besieged Cambray, and became masters of that important place. Henry seeing himself thus pressed, sent Lomenie, Secretary of State, to Elizabeth, to demand of her a speedy and powerful aid. He expected, by entering into a League with Elizabeth, to engage her to make war with Spain, in the Kingdom of France, so that it should seem, he was obliged to send him forces and money, whenever he had occasion, though the Treaty contained nothing like it. But Elizabeth had no such intention, being unwilling to send her forces into France, when her own Dominions were in danger, or to make war with Spain, that all the profit should be Henry's, and the loss hers (1). Therefore she told the Ambassador, she could not comply with his demand. Lomenie, vexed with it, and with the success of his Negotiation, spoke to her very haughtily, and charged her with being the cause of the loss of Cambray, by her having not sent the desired supplies into Picardy. He added, that she seemed to rejoice at the misfortunes of France, but she might soon repent, and by her conduct, be forced to make a disadvantageous Peace with Spain (2). These menaces, and the haughtiness wherewith they were spoken by Lomenie, entirely offended Elizabeth. Nevertheless, as Henry's affairs were in a very ill situation, she thought it not proper to deprive him of all hopes of her future assistance. She answered Lomenie however suitably to her dignity, but less sharply than she would have done at another juncture. Afterwards, when he demanded a second audience, her answer was, that she would acquaint the King of France, by her Ambassador (3), with her reasons for keeping her Troops and Money.

Elizabeth's refusal offended Henry's Council, in which the Leaguers had now too great an influence. Several advised him to make a separate Peace with Spain, since he could hope for no assistance from Elizabeth. They seemed to talk as if he had been obliged to send Forces to Henry, whenever they were demanded, and had violated her engagements. This was, doubtless, what was intended by the League: the French had reckoned to manage her as they pleased, but being disappointed, were very angry with her. Besides, Henry's Council being mostly composed of the declared enemies of the Protestant Religion, and of whom some had been the most zealous Leaguers, considered Elizabeth not as a friend, whom they were hereafter to regard, but as a temporary friend, from whom they were to draw all possible advantages. It was not without reason, that Elizabeth mistrusted the King of France, who, to obtain his absolution from the Pope, had submitted to Terms unbecoming a King, and tending to the ruin of the Protestants (4), thereby showing, he no longer considered them as his friends. It was not therefore proper for her to assist powerfully, a friend, who was only so in name. Wherefore she left him to manage his affairs as he pleased, without giving herself any concern. Besides, she could expect from him only a bare diversion to the arms of Spain, which, probably, would last no longer than required by the Interest of France. Henry's conduct gave her no room to expect any thing farther, since he had left the Spaniards unmolested in Bretagne, though her greatest danger was from thence. And indeed, in July this year, the Spaniards, who were settled in Bretagne, made a descent in Cornwall, and burnt some villages (5). Though this Expedition was inconsiderable, it however obliged Elizabeth to be upon her guard, and demonstrated the necessity of dilodging the common enemy from that Province. But the Interest of England was not the motive of Henry's actions.

It was not of Elizabeth only, that the King of France complained after the loss of Cambray. He accused also the States of the United Provinces of violating their Alliance with him, in suffering a Town of that importance to be 1595. taken, and threatened to make a separate peace. The States, seeing the advantage of a war between France and Spain, appealed the King with a round sum of money, two Regiments, and a considerable quantity of Corn.

This proceeding of the States caused Elizabeth to tell them (1), since they had money enough to lend the King of France, they were, doubtless, able to pay their debts, and therefore the demanded to be reimbursed of what she had advanced for them. Adding, that unless speedy satisfaction was given her, by a discharge of part of the debt, and an assurance of the remainder within such a time, she would take proper measures to do herself Justice. The States being thus pressed, had recourse to prayers and submissions to appease her. They represented, that the state of their affairs did not permit them to satisfy her. But as excuses signified little, they urged their Treaty with her, by which they were not obliged to repay her, till the end of the war. She replied, that when she assisted them, they were reduced to a deplorable state, and she showed her bounty and generosity, in not requiring a reimbursement till after the peace, because it was not likely, they should be able to pay her before. But since they were rich enough to lend the King of France money, it was evidently in their power to reimburse her. That therefore the Article of the Treaty on which they insisted, ought naturally to be thus interpreted, That they should not be in a condition to repay her before the conclusion of the war. There were great and even warm contents upon this subject. But at last the affair was admitted for a time, on these conditions: That the States should promise for the future, to keep the English Forces in their service (2), and join the Queen's Fleet, with a certain number of Ships, in case the should be attacked by the Spaniards.

Elizabeth had also a contest to maintain with the Hanse Towns, who complained to the Diet of the Empire, that their Corn was seized by the English in Portugal, and their privileges infringed, formerly granted them by Edward III. As this affair was more warmly pushed some years after, I shall have occasion to speak of it elsewhere.

This year, Sir Walter Raleigh made, at his own charge, a second expedition into America, from which he reaped no great advantage. The Queen likewise fitted out twenty six Ships to carry the war into that Country, under the command of Sir Francis Drake, and Sir John Hawkins (3). But as the Spaniards had taken great precautions, the English Admirals performed nothing memorable. Nay, they both died in this expedition.

Norris, as I said, was dispatched into Ireland to command the forces against the Rebels, at the head of which was the Earl of Tyrone. The Jealousy which arose between that General and the Lord Russell Lieutenant of Ireland, was the reason, the English made no greater progress in that Kingdom. The Earl of Tyrone even obtained a Truce, upon giving hopes he would lay down his Arms, and submit to the Queen. But this was only a feint to gain time till the arrival of the Succours promised him from Spain. The War was continued for some years; but my design is not to relate the Irish affairs, which would require a separate History. Besides, the manner in which Historians deliver them is so confused, and the Irish names as well of Persons as Places are so barbarous and hard to remember, that it is difficult to form a clear idea of this War (4).

Whatever resolution had been made by Elizabeth to concern herself no more with the affairs of France, she was however forced to take other measures, by reason of the great success of the Spanish arms in that Kingdom. Cardinal Albert of Austria, who had succeeded his Brother Ernest in the Government of the Low-Countries, arrived there the beginning of the year 1596. He immediately made great preparations as if he intended to relieve La Fere, which had been for some time blockaded by the French King, and at last besieged in form. But suddenly, after throwing Succours into the Town, the Archduke marched of great reputation, but whether from the change in the method of besieging Towns, or from being neglected since it was recovered by France, it was now of little note. Henry alarmed at this Siege, dispatched Sancy into England to demand Succours. The Marshal de Basillon quickly followed him, and so pressed the Queen, that she ordered eight thousand Men to be ready under the command of the Earl of Essex. But she required, in case the Siege was raised by the English, to have the Town delivered to them, since it was in effect lost to France. The Marshal and Sancy evaded this demand, by saying, they had no instructions upon that subject, knowing, at the worst, the King had rather see the Place in the hands of the Spaniards than restored to the English. So, under pretence that the relief of Calais was too pressing to allow time to discuss that proposal, they managed, that the Queen gave orders for the embarkation of the Troops. But at the same time, news came that the Place was taken, after a resistance but of twelve days. Then, the Archduke also took Ardres with the same ease. This was the sixth place taken from France by the Spaniards, within a year. The Succours designed for Calais, not having been ready in time, the new levied Troops were dismissed; but the Queen lent money to Henry on the security of his two Ambassadors.

Mean time, the Queen having advice that the King of Spain was preparing to invade England and Ireland, resolved to prevent him. For this purpose, she fitted out a Fleet of one hundred and fifty Sail, with two and twenty Dutch Ships, and seven thousand Soldiers. Charles Howard, appointed Admiral, and the Earl of Essex was appointed General of the Land forces (5).

The Fleet sailed from Plymouth the beginning of June, and kept at a distance from the Coasts of France and Spain, for fear of alarming the Spaniards, the Commanders intending to surprize Cadix. It was with great joy that they learned from the master of an Irish vessel returning from that Port, that every thing there was in the greatest security: That the Garrison was full of Ships of War, Galeons, Gallies, and Merchant-men freighted for the Indies. This news filling them with hopes, they arrived the 20th of June on the West side of the Isle of Cadix, and at their approach, the Spanish Ships retired to the Puntales. The next day, the English attacked them with great resolution (6), but met with so warm a reception, that the fight lasted from break of day till noon. At last, the Spaniards despairing to make a longer defence, resolved to sink their Ships, and escape to land. Their Admiral Ship called the St. Philip was burnt to ashes, with two others near her, the Spaniards themselves setting it on fire to prevent its falling into the hands of the English. The St. Matthew and St. Andrew were taken, and most of the others ran ashore.

During the engagement at Sea, the Earl of Essex with eight hundred Men landed at the Puntales, and marched directly to Cadix. Three or four hundred paces from the City, he met with five hundred Spaniards, who, when they saw him, retired into the Town, and were so closely pursued, that the English had like to have entered with them. The consternation was so great in the Town, that before any measures could be taken for its defence, the English had time to force the Gate (7) and throw themselves into the Town. Though they found some resistance in the Streets, yet in half an hour they made themselves masters of the Market-place. Then the Garrison and Inhabitants retired into the Castle and Town-house, but the same or the following day, were obliged to surrender. By the capitulation, they were to have their lives on payment of seventy thousand Ducats, for which four principal Citizens were given in Hostage (8). The Town being thus in the power of the English, the Earl of Essex turned out all the Inhabitants, and then ordered to be carried on board a great quantity of Silver, Ammunition, and other valuable things, besides what the Soldiers had plundered.

On the other hand, Admiral Howard sent Sir Walter Raleigh to burn the Merchant-Ships at Port-Real. The Admiral was offered two millions of Ducats for their ransom, but rejected the offer, saying, he came to burn and not to ransom the Ships. Mean time, the Duke of Medina found means to unload some of these Ships and fire others to deprive the English of their riches. Besides the Merchant-men, the King of Spain lost two Galeons, taken by the English, with above a hundred brass Guns (9), thirteen men of war, eleven Ships freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others, 1597. the Peers of equal degree (1). But the Queen to allwage his resentment, created him Earl-Marshal of England, which preferred to him the precedence of the Lord High-Admiral.

The Hans-Towns, as I said, had made great complaints to the Diet of the Empire, concerning the corn taken from them in Portugal, and their privileges lost in England. Elizabeth sent an Ambassador to the Diet, to answer these accusations. He represented, that the Hans-Towns by the abuse of their privileges, had caused them to be annulled by an Act of Parliament in the reign of Edward VI. That afterwards Mary had for a time suspended the execution of that Act; but at last, even in her reign, those privileges had been entirely abolished, for which he alleged several reasons mentioned in Edward's reign. That as to the seizure of their Ships in Portugal, they were freighted with provisions for the Spaniards, and by the law of nations the English could seize provisions which were carrying to their enemies, and even confiscate the Ships which however were restored to the owners. This affair seemed suppressed, and it had not been mentioned for two years, when suddenly the Emperor, at the sollicitation of the Hans-Towns, prohibited the Commerce of the English Merchants, called the Adventurers, with the Empire. This obliged the Queen to prohibit the Commerce of the Hans-Towns in England.

Mean time, the King of France was greatly embarrassed, since the Spaniards were become masters of Amiens, from whence they could make incursions to the gates of Paris. He resolved therefore, at any rate, to recover this place, and formed the Siege about the end of May. At the same time, he summoned Queen Elizabeth to send him four thousand Men, according to their Treaty. The Queen answered, she was ready to send the Forces, provided he would pay them, because her expenses in equipping a Fleet, and maintaining an army in Ireland, rendered her unable. Troops without money did not suit with Henry, whose Exchequer was exhausted. Wherefore to induce Elizabeth to comply with his demand, he ordered her to be told, that offers of Peace had been made him, with the restitution of all his places, except Calais, and Ardes, if he would abandon England. He meant to insinuate, that it was solely on her account, he had refused a separate Peace, though in truth, the surprize of Amiens was the real cause of the discontinuance of the Treaty, which he would not have begun, without her participation, if he had retained the least regard for her. However this be, the Queen, yet ignorant of the secret, told him, by her Ambassador, she could never believe, that so great a Prince would violate a solemn Treaty so lately made, and confirmed with reciprocal oaths. She prayed him to look into the Treaty, where he would find this Article in express terms: The Queen of England shall send this year, four thousand Foot to serve the King for the space of six months: They shall likewise serve him as long in the following years, if the Queen of England's affairs will conveniently permit, in which point the King of France is to take her Honour and Conscience for security. That therefore it was manifest, the Treaty was not violated by her, as she offered to send Forces, provided he would promise to pay them. All this ended at last, in what, probably, Henry proposed, which was, that Elizabeth instead of Forces, should supply him with money. For security, Henry offered her Calais, provided she would recover it within such a time with her own forces. This was engaging her to make a diversion more advantageous to France, than the four thousand Men he demanded. It was even uncertain, whether the Town could be taken within the limited time, which probably, would have been very short. But Elizabeth was not to be thus insinuated, especially as she knew, the King of France had rather see Calais in the hands of the Spaniards, than of the English. But the retaking of Amiens, which surrendered in September, finished this dispute.

The surrender of Amiens renewed the Negotiations between France and Spain, which had been interrupted. Henry's conduct on this occasion did not correspond with the services he had received from Elizabeth in his most pressing necessities. He deferred to acquaint her, that a Peace was absolutely necessary for him, till he had privately settled the principal Articles. He thought, probably, as Elizabeth had only consulted her own Interest in their League, he might likewise consider only his own advantage. Such a principle allows the breach of any Alliance without scruple. He could not however so secretly transact this affair, but Elizabeth had notice of his proceedings and designs. For this reason she called a Parliament (2) to demand an aid in such a juncture, intimating, she was going to be abandoned by her Ally, though he still pretended not to treat without her. The Parliament perceiving the danger of an immediate Invasion, voted an extraordinary supply, on condition, it should not be drawn into a precedent (3).

Elizabeth knew Henry was treating with Spain, but was ignorant the Peace was now almost concluded, and the more, as he had desired her to send Ambassadors to settle the points on which they were to treat. She sent therefore, [Thomas] Wilke, [Sir Robert] Cecil, and [John] Herbert, [master of Requests.] The first died presently after his arrival at Paris. The two others waited on the King at Angers, to know upon what terms the Negotiations stood with Spain. Henry gave a general answer, declaring, he wanted a peace, and that the welfare of his people, which he preferred to all other considerations, absolutely required it. Cecil answered, the Queen his mistress desired it no less, but wanted to know upon what conditions it was proposed by the King of Spain, and whether the States of the United Provinces were to be included. Henry replied, the King of Spain offered to restore all the places taken in France, Calais not excepted; that this offer could not be rejected, without exposing his Kingdom to utter ruin. Adding, he would soon cause the King of Spain to grant honorable conditions to the Queen, and the United Provinces.

This was sufficient to show the Ambassadors, that the peace between France and Spain was already concluded, and no care taken of Henry's Allies. Elizabeth, having some intelligence of it, ordered her Ambassadors to complain to the King; and the Ambassadors of the States received also the same orders from their masters. But Henry not to hear himself reproached, which must have been very mortifying to him, appointed Commissioners to treat with the Ambassadors, instead of granting the audience they demanded. These Commissioners and the Ambassadors being met, Oldenbarnevelt, one of the States Ambassadors, spoke boldly of the insincerity wherewith the King had treated his masters. He adjured the King, though absent, to declare in his conscience, if he thought it becoming a Prince, to separate from his Allies without any provocation. Then, to confound the French Commissioners, he read aloud the Treaty of League, concluding with these words: That some Kings preferred their private Interests to their Alliances; but that this often proved fatal to them; for when Princes have parted with their faith and honour, it is in vain to think of supporting themselves by mere power (4). The Chancellor, who was one of the Commissioners, answered the Ambassador, that what he said deserved great regard, and should be reported to the King, protesting however, that France could not subsist without peace.

Cecil spoke next, and said, That being empowered only to treat of a general Peace, since the States of the United Provinces were not to be included in the King's Treaty with Spain, he could proceed no farther. Then, after a justification of Elizabeth's conduct, and a bold censure of the French King's, he demanded time to inform the Queen of what passed. But his demand being eluded, he prayed the Commissioners to remind the King of the oath, he had taken before God and Man. He concluded with saying, that the Queen expected to be repaid, the sums lent the King in his pressing necessities. But whatever the Ambassadors alleged signified nothing, since the Peace between France and Spain was concluded, and nothing was wanting, but the formality of having it publicly signed by Plenipotentiaries, who were to meet at Verovins.

Elizabeth was extremely provoked with the French King's proceedings, and the more, as she saw no other cause which could oblige him to negotiate a Peace without

(2) This Parliament met at Westminster October 24. 1597, and was dissolved Febr. 9. 1598. D'ewer, p. 522. The Acts made in this Parliament were these: 1. An Act for the punishment of Rogues, Vagabonds, and sturdy Beggars. By this Statute, all the following Persons are to be adjudged Rogues and Vagabonds. People that go about begging, as poor Scholars; or on pretence of losses by fire or shipwreck; Collectors for Galls; or persons delivered out of Gaol, and begging for their Fees; such as use any juggle Clatt, or unlawful Games; Fortune-tellers; Cyphers; Kencers; Bear-walks; common Players, and Minstrels; Juglers; Thieves; Pedlars; and any Chimney; Fellows not working for reasonable wages, when they are able, and the like. Their punishment is to be whipped, and sent from Parish to Parish, by the Officer in each, the next straight way to the Parish where they were born, or last dwelt for the space of a while year. 2. An Act for erecting of Hospitals, Houses of Correction, and Work-houses for the Poor. 3. One for the increase of Mariners, and maintenance of the Navigation. 4. An Act against idle and wandering Persons, pretending to be Soldiers or Mariners, and travelling without Testimonials from Justices of Peace.

(3) The Lords granted three Subsidies of 2 s. 8 d. in the Pound of Goods, and 4 s. of Lands, with six Fifteenths and Tenths. The Clergy gave three Subsidies to be paid on fix several days. These several Subsidies were granted without any opposition or difficulty. See D'ewer, p. 569.

(4) Then he proposed, that if the King of France would lay aside the thoughts of Peace, and besiege Calais, the States would advance pay for seven thousand men to assist in it, and furnish twenty five Men of War; and at the same time lay Siege to other place, to divide the Spaniards Forces. Camden, p. 605.

1493. giving her notice, than compliance to the Pope and the King of Spain. It is certain, Henry might have disingaged himself, with some appearance of good faith, if he had but pretended an unwillingness to treat without his Allies, and afterwards, upon the difficulties which should arise, had urged the necessity he was under of making a Peace. But concluding it without their knowledge, he clearly discovered, that he preferred the King of Spain's Interest before that of his ancient Allies. This was indeed his Character. He was so impatient to see himself in peaceable possession of the Crown of France, that to compass his ends, he never scrupled to sacrifice his old friends, who were unable to hurt him, to his most mortal enemies, who might still create him disturbance. He had no person about him who dared to censure such a conduct; but in Elizabeth he found one of an equal rank, who used him with less ceremony. She sent him a Letter, in which, after other severe expressions, she told him, That if in temporal concerns, there was such a thing as a Sin against the Holy Ghost, it was, doubtless, Ingratitude: That if he had obtained advantageous Terms from Spain, he ought to thank England for them: and that solemn oaths, and mutual compacts, were never intended for snares, unless by the worst of Men. Henry was stung with these reproaches, but as they admitted of no reply, chose to take no notice of them. He excused himself upon the urgent necessity which forced him to make Peace, and endeavoured to persuade Elizabeth, that whereas he had hitherto been only a burden to her, he would for the future, give her marks of his acknowledgments, in procuring her a safe and honorable Peace, and in never forsaking her Interests. But this was only words, which were not much regarded by the Queen.

During these transactions, some Articles of little moment which had remained undecided, were finished at Vervain. Mercator owns, the Peace might have been concluded and signed in less than three Weeks, if Henry had not affected to persuade the publick, he would not abandon his Allies. But all this tended only, to obtain for the Ambassadors of England and of the States, an admission to the Conferences without any Declaration of what he would do in their favour. But Philip, who knew how far he should be solicited, remained inflexible, and would never grant a power to his Plenipotentiaries to treat either with England or the States. At last, after Henry had made all the necessary excuses to clear himself to the publick, he gave orders to his Plenipotentiaries to sign the Treaty, promising however his Allies, that he would not ratify it till forty days after, as if that time had been sufficient to make their Peace with the Spaniards, who even refused to treat with them. Mean while, he exhorted them, whether seriously or jestingly, to embrace the opportunity he was procuring them. This Peace was signed at Vervain the 2d of May, and ratified by Henry the 12th of June.

It was now incumbent upon the Queen and the States to take proper measures to sustain the War against all the forces of Spain, and in order to this, Elizabeth sent Francis Vere to the States to know their resolution. Mean while, it was debated in Council, whether it was proper to make peace, or continue the War. The Council being divided upon this question, several reasons were alledged on both sides. But the Queen, who knew perfectly her interest, readily declared for War. She perceived, that in making a separate Peace, as it would have been very easy, she should oblige the States to put themselves again under the Spanish Yoke. In that case, the foresaw, she should stand single without any Ally, and exposed to the insults of Philip, who would never want pretences to quarrel with her, and resume his former projects against England. Nay, it was to be feared, the King of France incited by the Pope and a Catholic Council, where the ancient Leaguers had great influence, would suffer himself to be engaged in a Plot to dethrone her. She was also apprehensive, the King of Scots, in order to ascend sooner the Throne of England, would be tempted by promises to abandon the interest of the Protestant Religion. In a word, by forsaking the States, she exposed herself to the danger of seeing the storm falling upon her own head, which she had all her life been labouring to turn upon her Neighbours. On the contrary, in supporting them the employed the Spaniards, and hindered him from making any considerable attempts upon England. Moreover, if by a vigorous War she could oblige Philip to a Peace without any danger to the liberty of the States, she would thereby secure friends, who might be very serviceable on occasion.

These were the reasons which determined the Queen to continue the War. But she was very careful to conceal her intentions from the States, and rather showed a great inclination to Peace, pretending she was unable to carry on so burdensome a War. She intimated to them, that her interest was not concerned, and that Philip's efforts against England, plainly showed, she was in no danger from him. The States, not being able to dissemble like her, because their all was at stake, she brought them to acknowledge, that if the War was continued, it was solely for the preservation of their liberty, and therefore it was necessary to treat anew upon that foundation. In short, she so artfully managed, that they came to a new agreement with her, entirely to her advantage. The States chose rather to submit to her terms than be forced to make a Peace, by which, in that juncture, they must have lost their liberty, their Religion, and the fruits of thirty years labour. The Articles of this new Treaty were (1):

That the States should give security to Elizabeth for eight hundred thousand Pounds Sterling, to which all her claims were limited.

That the half of this Sum should be discharged by yearly payments of thirty thousand Pounds Sterling, as long as the War should continue; and if, at the end of the War, any thing remained of this half, the annual payments should be but twenty thousand Pounds.

That as to the other half, and the restitution of the Places which were in the Queen's hands, there should be an amicable agreement, when the Peace was concluded.

That for the Garrisons of Flushing, the Briel, and other Forts, the Queen should furnish eleven hundred and fifty Men, to be paid by the States, at the rate of one hundred and seventy Pounds Sterling a Month, besides utensils and other usual necessaries for Soldiers in Garrison.

That for the future the Queen should be discharged of her engagement to furnish the States with Auxiliaries, and that the English, who now served, or should hereafter serve in the Low-Countries, should be paid by the States, take an oath to them, and obey the orders of their Generals.

That by this means, the Authority of the English Deputy, stipulated in the former Treaty, would be abolished, the Queen nevertheless reserving a power to put one Person into the Council of State.

That if, during the War, the common enemy, or his adherents should let out a Fleet to invade England, or the Isles belonging to it, namely, those of Wight, Silley, Guernsey, and Jersey, the States should be obliged to assist her Majesty with a Fleet of thirty or forty Ships of War; and, in case of an invasion, with five thousand Foot and five hundred Horse: That if her Majesty should equip a Fleet of fifty or sixty Ships, to act offensively, either in Spain, Portugal, or the West-Indies, the States should join her with the same number of Ships. And if any English forces, as ten thousand Foot and two thousand Horse at the least, were sent over into Flanders or Brabant, the States should furnish out half the same number of Men.

It is easy to observe from this Treaty, how well the Queen knew to improve the present circumstances of the States, and their fear of being forced to make a disadvantageous Peace with Spain, though for reasons before mentioned, it was her interest to continue the War. Besides, when this Treaty was negotiating, the Earl of Tirconnell was very formidable in Ireland. In fine, the King of Scotland almost openly demanded to be declared the Queen's presumptive Heir. He dispersed written or printed Books, in which he pretended to prove that no person whatever could deprive him of his right. A Letter was even shown to Elizabeth subscribed with his own hand, and addressed to the Pope (2). Camden says, he had been surprized into this Letter, but that Author is too partial in every thing concerning King James, to deserve entire credit. Shortly after, one Edward Squire was apprehended in London, for having undertaken to kill the Queen by poisoning the pommel of his Saddle. All this shows, he had no less reason to fear for herself than for the States, and that it was her interest to support them, and procure them a Peace which should secure their liberty.

The death of Philip of Spain, which happened in September this year, something allayed Elizabeth's uneasiness. That Prince was seventy two years old, and had reigned forty two, in continual troubles to enlarge the bounds of his Monarchy. He cast his ambitious views upon France, England, and Portugal, and of all these grand projects, the last only succeeded. But he lost seven Provinces in the Netherlands, which were well worth the Kingdom he acquired. He died a dreadful death, being devoured by lice swarming from Ulcers with which he had been some time afflicted: But he bore his calamity with admirable constancy. Some time before his death, he had assigned the Sovergency of the Low-Countries in dower to the Infanta Isabella his Daughter, when he married her to Archduke Albert. But the conditions annexed to this grant show he had no intention to dismember those Provinces from the Spanish Monarchy. Besides the reservation of Homage, and a power to keep Garrisons in the Citadels of Antwerp and Cambray, he had stipulated the reversion of these Provinces to the Crown of Spain, in default of Heirs descending from the Princess his Daughter, and it is even pretended he had rendered her incapable of ever having any. He was succeeded by his Son Philip III.

This year a troublesome affair happened at the English Court. The Queen consulting the Earl of Essex and the Admiral (1), concerning a fit person to be sent into Ireland, discovered an inclination for Sir William Knolles; but the Earl of Essex, though his Nephew, strenuously opposed it, contending for Sir George Carew, in order to remove him from Court, as being jealous of him. He supported his opinion with great haughtiness and obduracy, and perceiving the Queen immovable, turned his back upon her with such an air of contempt, that provoked at his insolence the gave him a box on the ear (2). He immediately laid his hand on his sword, and being prevented from drawing it by the Admiral, swore that he neither could nor would put up so great an indignity; nor would he have taken it from Henry VIII. himself were he alive, and instantly retired from Court. The Lord Privy-Seal representing to him, in a Letter, the folly of his menaces, and advising him to ask the Queen's pardon, he sent a long and passionate answer, wherein he spoke very disrespectfully of the Queen (3). But at last being brought to himself, by the advice of his friends, he was re-admitted to favour. Few believed this reconciliation sincere, and the Earl's friends were in great fear for him.

William Cecil, Baron Burleigh, Lord Treasurer, and for many years prime Minister and Confident of the Queen, died this year, in extreme old age (4). The Lord Buckhurst succeeded him in his office of Treasurer.

The affairs of Ireland were in so ill a situation, that a speedy remedy was to be applied, or the Kingdom exposed to the hazard of being entirely lost. Since the advantages gained by the Earl of Tir-oen over the English, the whole Province of Munster had revolted. The Natives in every other part of the Isle were in the same disposition, flattering themselves that with the assistance of the Pope and the Spaniards (5), the Earl of Tir-oen would free them entirely from the English yoke. The Queen, informed of the state of affairs, believed, no time was to be lost to reduce the Irish to their duty, and ordered her Council to consider in her presence, how to execute her resolution. The Earl of Essex spoke long upon this subject, blaming the conduct of the former Lord Deputies, who, he said, amused themselves with trifles instead of acting directly against the Earl of Tir-oen, without giving him any respite: That by Truces granted him from time to time he had restored his affairs; and withal, the Queen had been put to needless expence, since her Troops were as well paid in a Truce as during the War. This opinion was grateful to the Queen, who loved not to be lavish of her money without occasion. When a Deputy came to be named, most of the Council were for the Lord Montjoy. This was opposed by the Earl of Essex, because that Lord had never commanded in chief, and was too much addicted to Books; whereas the affairs of Ireland required an active and a warlike General. He added, that to put a speedy end to the War in Ireland, the management of it ought to be given to a General of reputation, and who was acceptable to the People. In a word, he so plainly pointed out himself, that he was chosen to the employ. His friends thought to oblige him, and his enemies hoped that this post, and his absence from the Court, would afford them means to ruin him.

What this Lord's designs were, is not known, but for some time he had made himself so popular, and gained so far upon the people by his affable behaviour, that he was almost adored (6). He only wanted to gain the affection of the Soldiery and probably, this was his aim in desiring to command in Ireland. But as he had enemies, intent upon his ruin, it was on this employment they founded their hopes of success. On the other hand, his friends in serving him too zealously did him a diskindness. They affected to publish his descent from the Royal House of Scotland, and from that of England by his Great-Grandmother, who numbered amongst her Ancestors Edmond de Langley Duke of York, and Thomas of Woodstock, both Sons of Edward III. Hence it was intended to insinuate, that after the Queen's death it would be better to place him on the throne than a foreign Prince. A book was also dedicated to him in which the author overthrew the Titles of all the Pretenders to the Crown, except the Spanish Infanta's (7). His enemies, perceiving he was forming some dangerous conspiracy, took care not to divert him from it. On the contrary, they every where, and on all occasions, extolled his valour, his prudence, and his attachment to the Protestant interest, in order to engage him in measures which would more clearly discover his designs. He had a lively wit, and many amiable qualities, but was too much intoxicated with his own merit, and regarded the rest of the nobility as very much his inferiors. He was made Lord Deputy with a very extensive commission, to continue or end the war as he pleased; and even to pardon the Earl of Tir-oen, and the other rebels, which was an authority never before granted to any of his predecessors. But it was inserted in his Commission, that laying aside all other affairs he should apply himself wholly to pursue and ruin the Earl of Tir-oen, chief of the Rebels. He could not complain of this clause, because it was only what was proposed by himself in the Council.

About the end of March the Earl of Essex sailed for Ireland with an army of 20000 Foot, and 1300 Horse (8). The English had never before seen so formidable an army in that island. The Queen had made this great effort pursuant to the Earl's advice, in order to put a speedy end to the Rebellion, and terminate the war in one Campaign. On his arrival he affected, whether of himself, or by the advice of his pretended friends, to act directly contrary to his Instructions. He immediately gave the command of the Horse to his intimate friend the Earl of Southampton, contrary to the Queen's express orders, who was offended with that Lord for marrying without her permission (9). Then, instead of marching against Tir-oen, he turned his arms against some Rebels in Munster, whom he drove indeed into the woods and mountains, but with the loss of many of his men (10). This expedition, of little importance, detained him in those parts till the end of July. Mean time, the Queen informed of his proceedings, writ to him in an angry style, and reproached him with acting contrary to orders founded upon his own advice, commanding him withal to march into Ulster against Tir-oen himself. He excused himself, by saying, that the Council of Ireland, which knew best the affairs of that Kingdom, had advised him first to clear Munster, and promised positively to march the first opportunity against the chief Rebel. But shortly after, he writ to the Court, that he was obliged to return to Dublin (11), to chastise some Irish who infested the Country, and indeed, he suppressed them. But after this second expedition his army was so diminished, that he writ for a reinforcement, without which, he said, he could not perform any great exploits in Ulster. He began however to march thither, but his vanguard consisting of 1500 men, under the command of Sir Cornelius Cliford, fell into an ambush and was entirely defeated.

Though it was astonishing that with so fine an army he had done nothing considerable, but on the contrary was forced to demand a reinforcement, the Queen immediately sent him some fresh Troops. But soon after, he let the Court know, that all he could do this campaign was to post himself on the frontiers of Ulster with thirteen hundred Foot and three hundred Horse. On his arrival in that province, the Earl of Tir-oen desired a parley, which he refused. The next day, when the armies were near one another, Tir-oen sent Hagan, an officer, to tell him he was

The Earl of Essex consented, and they talked together about an hour, without any witness. Two hours after, Tir-oen demanded a second conference, in presence of some of the chief Officers of the two armies (2). The Earl of Essex granted his request, and in this second conference it was agreed, that Commissioners should be appointed to treat of a Peace the next day. This negotiation ended in a treaty of Truce which was speedily concluded. The Truce was to continue [from six weeks to six weeks] till May the next year, with this condition, that either party should be at liberty to break it upon giving fourteen days notice.

Mean time, the Queen having received the Earl of Essex's last letter, was extremely provoked. She could not forbear saying, she suspected him of ill designs. She was advised to recall him immediately: but she feared to incense him too much, whilst he had the sword in his hand. Nevertheless, she writ to him very sharply, and reproached him with his contempt of her orders. This letter made such impression on the Earl, that he instantly resolved to return into England with the flower of his army, and be revenged of his enemies, flattering himself with a general insurrection in his favour. But the Earl of Southampton dissuaded him from so dangerous a resolution. The Queen, informed of this project, countenanced a report, that a fleet was preparing in Spain to invade England, and under that pretence raised six thousand men. Sometime after, she augmented her army, and gave the command to the Lord Admiral, who was no friend to the Earl of Essex. But this terror being dispelled by advices from Ireland, she disbanded the greatest part of her forces.

The news of what passed in England convincing the Earl of Essex that he was suspected by the Queen, he took a sudden resolution to go and justify himself, without demanding the Queen's leave. He was accompanied by the Earl of Southampton and several officers, who on their arrival in England disposed of themselves different ways. He referred only six men to attend him, and posted with all diligence in order to be with the Queen before she had notice of his arrival, but he found, notwithstanding his care, he had been prevented. The Queen was then at Nonsuch, ten miles from London. She received him without any emotion, and with some marks of favour, but after some reproaches for his irregular conduct, she commanded him to his apartment till further orders.

After that, being asked why he made a Truce with the Earl of Tir-oen, which might at any time be broken at a fortnight's warning, since he was empowered to conclude a Peace, he answered, that the Earl of Tir-oen was so unreasonable in his demands, that they could not be granted (3); but it was his opinion, that a Truce might bring him to more equitable Terms. This answer did not satisfy the Queen, who was moreover provoked at his leaving his Government without her permission; besides that the persons who attended him into England, were very apt to cause her to suspect him. Wherefore she committed him to custody at the Lord Keeper's, to prevent his running into new excesses.

In Camden's Annals, there is an Apology writ by the Earl himself, in which it appears, that he very lamely answered the accusation of having neglected to attack the Earl of Tir-oen, and employed his army in expeditions of little consequence. He contented himself with saying, that he had put the Irish affairs in such a situation, that, during his nine months Government, the English had sustained no damage. But he was not entrusted with an army of twenty thousand Men, to stand upon the defensive. As for his return without leave, he mentioned it not. Concerning the persons who attended him, he said only, that not above six came to Court with him, but of the rest who accompanied him from Ireland, he did not speak. The Commission given to the Earl of Southampton, contrary to the Queen's express orders, he also passed over in silence. The rest consisted wholly in exclamations upon the injustice of suspecting him, and in magnifying his Father's merits, his Brother's, killed in the Queen's service, and his own. At the same time his friends and relations loudly complained of the rigour with which he was treated, representing it as excessive. Some even plotted to rescue him by force, but he would not consent to it.

Mean while, the Earl of Tir-oen, hearing the Earl of Essex was arrested, broke the Truce, and did great mischief to the English Inhabitants in Ireland. He flattered himself with a great and speedy assistance from Spain (4), and the Pope, who had made him a priest of a pretended Phoenix Plume. In this exaltation, he formed no less project, than to drive the English entirely out of Ireland.

In the mean time, the Earl of Essex's friends were inciting the people to an insurrection in his favour, representing him, as the most accomplished Lord England ever saw, since the foundation of the Monarchy. At the same time, they inveighed against the Ministry, not without malicious reflections on the Queen's conduct, as if she took no care of the Irish affairs. This extremely injured the Earl, and increased the Queen's suspicions of him. As she had provoked him, she easily believed he was plotting revenge. Wherefore, in the beginning of October, she assembled the Council in the Star-Chamber, where the Earl's conduct was examined, and unanimously condemned by all the Privy-Councillors. Nothing, however was done against him, the Queen only desiring to satisfy the people, that it was not out of caprice that he was under confinement. He remained therefore at the Lord-Keeper's house, where he gave himself up to devotion, spending his time in Prayer, and writing Letters to his friends in so devout a strain, that he was thought to have renounced all worldly vanities (5).

In the close of the year, the Archduke Andrew, Governor of the Low-Countries in his Brother Albert's absence, who was gone into Spain, to marry the Infanta, princess of Portugal, sent him a Bull, by which he was freely content to it, if the Queen would consent to be included. This condition put a stop to the Negotiation at once. The Queen, however, made only to amuse her, till a Fleet, then preparing in Spain should be ready to invade England. But this pretended Fleet, which gave her some uneasiness, ended at last in a few Gallies, put to Sea by Frederic Spinola, a Genoese, in the King of Spain's service, and carried by him into the harbour of Sluis.

The Earl of Tir-oen improved the disorder created by the Earl of Essex in the Irish affairs. He reduced the whole Province of Ulster to his obedience, and hoped to be soon master of the whole Kingdom. He was so well rewarded, Pope Clement VIII. sent him a Bull, by which he granted to him and his adherents, the same Indulgences, as to those who fought against the Turks, for the recovery of the Holy-Land. But [Charles Blount] Lord Montjoy, appointed Lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the Earl of Essex, found means to stop the progress of the Rebels, and give a check to their insolence.

At the same time, Archduke Albert, called also the Cardinal Infant, being returned from Spain, made new proposals of Peace to Elizabeth. Henry IV. supported them with all his Interest, and succeeded so far, that the Queen sent Plenipotentiaries to Boulogne, where the Peace was to be negotiated. But after the Ambassadors of the two contending Crowns had been four months parted, without ever assembling, by reason of a dispute of precedence between England and Spain. After great contests on this subject, Queen Elizabeth had at last consented to an equality, but the Spaniards would not quit his pretensions. If the Plenipotentiaries had met, another obstacle would have occurred, which would never have been surmounted. This was, that the Spaniards were for a separate Peace or Truce with England, to which Elizabeth, doubtless, would not have consented. Besides, the King of Spain pretended, that Elizabeth should surrender the places mortgaged to her by the States. The Spanish Ambassadors having founded the English on these two Articles, and finding they should never obtain their desires, used the pretence of Precedency to break off the Negotiation.

The second day of July, Prince Alberville gained the famous Battle of Newport over the Archduke. The English, to the number of fifteen hundred, under the conduct of Sir Francis Vere, distinguished themselves gloriously; but there remained eight hundred dead upon the spot.

Elizabeth being now sixty seven years old, it was with extreme vexation, that the Catholics saw the English Crown ready to fall on the head of a Protestant Prince. Clement VIII., being desirous to prevent it, to the utmost of his power, sent two Briefs into England, one addressed to the Romish Clergy, and one to the people. In these Briefs, they were forbid to acknowledge, after Elizabeth's death, any Prince who would not swear, not only to tolerate their Religion, but even to support it with all his 1600. power. These Briefs were privately conveyed into the Nation, and communicated but to few, all dreading the penalties enacted by law.

But at the same time, some found a more ready and effectual way to prevent the King of Scots ascending the Throne of England. The Ruthvens, Sons to Earl Gow, beheaded in 1584, conspired against him, and inviting him to their house [at Perth] on some pretence, designed to murder him, but he escaped by a sort of miracle (1). The two Ruthvens were killed, and their complices condemned to die. Afterwards, by an Act of Parliament, all who bore the name of Ruthven were obliged to quit it, that the very name of the Family might be abolished.

The Earl of Essex was still under arrest at the Lord Privy Seal's, where he closely applied himself to devotion. He writ from time to time such submissive Letters to the Queen, that he seemed to have lost that extreme haughtiness so prejudicial to him. At last, the Queen, content with having humbled him, permitted him to retire to his own house, under the free custody of Sir Richard Berkley, who was to watch him. Probably, he had been soon restored to favour, the Queen clearly discovering her Sentiments in that respect (2); but his friends and domesticks ruined him. They had made such strong cabals among the people, that nothing was talked of but the Earl of Essex's innocence. Whereas the Queen pretended to have treated him with great lenity and moderation, it was given out, that he was unjustly persecuted, and even his life attempted on false suggestions. Elizabeth, who was very nice in such a point, and considered the people's prejudices against her as a great misfortune, resolved to shew, the Earl had more reason to praise her moderation, than complain of her rigour. To this purpose, she ordered him to be brought before the Privy-Council, to which she had added four Earls, two Barons, and four Judges. But she told these Commissioners, it was not her intention to condemn him to any infamous punishment, as guilty of treason or treachery; but only to convince him of having failed in his Allegiance, and slighted her orders and instructions, through excess of vanity. The Queen's design was to shew the prejudiced people, that the Earl of Essex deserved a severer punishment, than a few months imprisonment.

When he appeared before his Judges, he was first accused of contemning the Queen's orders, in making the Earl of Southampton General of the Horse. Secondly, of making Knights, contrary to the express words of his Patent. Thirdly, of neglecting to pursue the Earl of Tircon, though that was the principal end of his Commission. Fourthly, of secretly conferring with that Rebel. Fifthly, of granting a Truce very prejudicial to the Queen's affairs. Sixthly, of abandoning his Government, without vouchsafing to ask the Queen's permission. Some inferences were likewise drawn from his disrespectful expressions in his Apology, and from certain dangerous principles contained in a Book dedicated to him, concerning the deposing of Richard II.

After hearing the Articles of his Accusation, he kneeled down, and thanked God for all his mercies, and his Sovereign, for not ordering him a hearing in the Star-Chamber. He declared, he would neither excuse his faults, either in whole or in part, nor contend with the Queen: He acknowledged his guilt, but protested upon his honour, that his heart had been always free from the least thought of Rebellion. However, in continuing to speak, he began to urge some excuses in his own behalf. But the Lord-Keeper interrupted him, by reminding him, that he had taken a good method, but was now swerving from it: That in extenuating his faults, he likewise extenuated the Queen's clemency; and that in fine, a manifest disobedience was but an ill proof of a good intention. The Lord-Keeper, in preventing him from enlarging on his justification, did him a good office. The Queen's intention was not to have him rigorously tried, but only to shew, he had been treated more gently than he deserved. His confession led him to the same end, whereas his justification would have obliged his judges to a more severe examination. So, whether he understood his own interest of himself, or was warned what to do, he held his peace. After this, the Commissioners consulting together, were of opinion, that he ought to be removed from the Council-Board, suspended from his offices of Earl Marshal, and master of the Ordinance, and committed to prison during the Queen's pleasure.

His office of Master of the Horse was untouched, at the Queen's express command, who was unwilling to give occasion to believe, she had entirely withdrawn her confidence from him. She even ordered, the Sentence should not be recorded. The Earl received this chastisement with so much humility (3), that the Queen, pleased with his deportment, removed Berkley from him, and left him at full liberty. But she advised him to be his own keeper, and forbid him the Court.

For some years the Queen had honoured the Earl of Essex with a particular esteem and affection. She had given him marks of it on sundry occasions; and particularly by the Posts, Offices, and Commands he had enjoyed. This distinction had so filled him with pride, that he solely ascribed to his merit these extraordinary favours, which were the pure effect of the Queen's inclination. For this cause, he had not always that regard for her, she had reason to expect from him, imagining she could not be without his assistance. In a word, he was a very bad Courtier. It is not strange, that so imprudent a conduct altered the Queen's affection, and yet, it appeared in all her proceedings, that it was not entirely extinguished. Her design was only to humble that proud spirit, which seemed to vie with her, wherein she believed to have now been successful. It seemed, he was at last sensible, that humility was the only way to restore him entirely to favour, and had resolved to pursue that method as the surest. Immediately after his sentence, while he was preparing to retire into the Country, he told the Queen, by the Lord Howard, "That he kissed the Rod and the Queen's Hand, which had only corrected, and not ruined him, but should enjoy no peace, till he saw again those eyes which had once shined so propitiously on him: That he had resolved to atone for his error, and like Nabuchadnezzar, to dwell with the beasts of the field, eat grass as an ox, and be wet with the dew of heaven, till it should please his Queen to restore him to his Senses." This submission was very agreeable to the Queen, and yet she answered, she would not be amused with vain words, but as he had so long abused her patience, she would take some time to try his humility. This was a plain intimation, that with a little patience he would appease her entirely, and it was in some measure directing him how to form his conduct. But he was so imprudent as not to improve this advantage, and to follow the interested counsels of his domesticks (4), who advised him to petition the Queen for the continuation of the Farm of the sweet Wines, which had been very profitable to him. The Queen, to prove his humility, refused his petition, knowing it to be in her power to repair the loss, whenever he pleased. But instead of receiving this denial with the humility and resignation he had professed since his disgrace, he discovered passion and resentment, which made the Queen think, he was not yet sufficiently humbled. Whereupon, Cuff his Secretary and Confident, suggested to him, that the Queen not only intended to humble, but beggar him, and render him contemptible to all the World. Cuff was seconded by other incendiaries, who at last inspired him with the design to restore himself to favour by force, and destroy all his enemies about the Queen's person. After this resolution, his House was open to all the Male-contents. The Earl of Southampton, who had withdrawn into the Netherlands, returned to England: and the Earl of Essex leaving the country, came to reside in his house at London. When he arrived, Merrick his Steward kept open house, for all who thought they had cause to complain of the Queen or her Ministers, and a great number of suspicious Persons resorted to his house. In short, his whole conduct showed, he was meditating some dangerous design. His enemies improving these proceedings, found means to insuffle suspicions into the Queen, and to have Spies placed upon him, who informed the Court of what passed in his House (5).

It is pretended, his enemies, who had projected his ruin, knowing his pride and haughtiness, could not find it in their hearts to write to him, not to discover so much impatience in his disgrace, but to throw himself entirely upon the Queen's mercy, as the readiest way to her favour. These advices drew from him answers agreeable to the intentions of his enemies, which being told to the Queen, completed his ruin. They were filled with expressions denoting his anger and impatience, and even intimating his designs, which he said, that a storm was fallen upon him when he expected a harvest: That the Queen had reduced him to a private life, which was disagreeable to him: That he was incapable of giving a submission as was expected from him: That he had been unjustly imprisoned: That Sovereigns had not an unlimited power, nor were infallible: That he had been wounded in every pore of his body: That his enemies triumphed, but should never have the satisfaction to see him cringe to them. To these expressions, which were no signs of repentance, care was taken to add reports capable to make him forfeit the Queen's favour for ever. She was told, he had said, She was grown an old Woman, and no less crooked and distorted in her mind than in her body. Camden seems to intimate, that he designedly passes over in silence things still more offensive to the Queen.

Probably, the Earl of Essex thought all farther caution needless, his project being now formed, though he had laid his trust in ill. Those who speak most favorably of it, say, his project was to seize the Queen's person, and drive his enemies from Court, as was practised in Scotland with regard to King James. But he seems to have had greater designs, since he courted the King of Scotland's assistance, perhaps, to place him on the Throne before the Queen's death. It was known, he had writ to that Prince that a plot was formed to deprive him of the Succession, and give the Crown to the Infanta of Spain: That for this purpose, the Projectors, who governed at Court, had filled the most considerable Posts with the Infanta's Adherents: That Secretary Cecil Son of the late Treasurer, was at the head of this party, and had engaged in it the Lord Treasurer Buckhurst with the Earl of Nottingham the Lord Admiral, and the better to execute his project, he had committed the Government of the maritime places to his creatures (1), where the Spaniards might most conveniently land: That the Queen was so impaired in her understanding, that she was incapable to act of herself, and was entirely guided by her Ministers: That he was therefore necessarily obliged to proceed openly to defeat this conspiracy; and to this end, was speedily to dispatch Ambassadors to England, to demand a public declaration of his right to the Succession, and the removal of his enemies, creatures and pensioners of Spain, from the Court and Council. At the same time he furnished him with proofs to be used by the Ambassadors, to show the truth of the plot. Lastly, he insinuated that his Ambassadors should be sufficiently supported. Camden, who writ in the Reign of James I, has not thought proper to tell us, how these propositions were received by that Prince: but it may be judged, they were not disapproved, since Ambassadors were presently sent into England, who however came too late. This Historian adds, the Earl of Essex gained to his party some Presbyterian Ministers, and even some Papists, by commiserating their afflicted condition, under the Queen's tyrannical Government, and by inspiring them with hopes of being eased. Then he hired the swordsmen about London, and placed them near his house. After that, he established a Council composed of the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Davers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges Governor of Plymouth Fort, Sir John Davis a great Mathematician, [and Surveyor of the Ordnance.] John Littleton a man of great sense and judgment, and equally qualified for the Cabinet and Camp.

This juncto meeting in Drury house, the Earl of Essex gave them a list of certain Noblemen whom he believed at his devotion, containing one hundred and twenty Earls, Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen, and desired them to consult, whether it was most proper, to seize the Palace or the Tower, or both at once. The result of their deliberation was, That the Queen's person and Palace should first be seized, and when she was in their power, the Earl should dismiss certain persons from her presence, and turn them out of their places; but that nothing should be done, till the arrival of the Scotch Ambassadors (2).

Mean time, the great resort of suspected Persons to Essex's house (3), some words unwarily dropped by the conspirators, and the reports of the spies, confirming the Court's suspicions, the Council met at the Treasurer's house, and sent one of the Secretaries (4) to the Earl of Essex, to require his attendance. But at the same time a note was delivered him, advising him to take care of himself. Whereupon he told the Secretary he was indisposed and could not stir from his house. Immediately after, he consulted whether he should pursue his first project of seizing the Palace, or attempt to take the City of London, or make his escape, since his plot was now discovered. The first of these projects was deemed impracticable, because the guards had been doubled. The second occasioned long debates on the uncertainty of the execution, because the disposition of the Londoners was not sufficiently known. In the mean time one of the conspirators entered, affirming he came from the City, and that the Inhabitants were ready to defend the Earl against all his enemies. He added, that Thomas Smith, the Sheriff, who commanded a thousand of the trained-bands, had promised to join him. Probably the person who made this false report had been induced to it by some of the principal conspirators, who finding the Earl begin to relent, was willing to engage him so far, that it should not be possible for him to recede. This was sufficient to make the Earl resolve to raise an insurrection in the City, being persuaded the people were inclined to his cause. It was therefore agreed, that the next day the Earl, attended by five or six hundred men should repair to the City, and assembling the Aldermen and people, require their assistance. That if the Citizens were well disposed, they should be employed to gain access to the Queen, or in case of disappointment, the conspirators should retire to some other part of the Kingdom.

Pursuant to this resolution, the Earls of Rutland and Southampton went next morning to Essex's house, with three hundred Gentlemen (6), and immediately, the Gates were shut, and no person suffered to come in or out. But Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of the most zealous of the party was permitted on some pretence to go out (7). It was probably he who discovered the plot to the Court; for soon after the Queen sent to the Mayor of London, to order the trained-bands to be ready to march upon the first notice. At the same time she sent the Lord Keeper, the Earl of Worcester, and Sir William Knollys (8), to the Earl's house, who were let in through a wicket, without any of their Attendants, except the Parle-bearer. In the Courtyard they saw the Earls of Essex, Rutland, and Southampton, surrounded with a crowd of armed men, and the Lord-Keeper advancing towards them, told the Earl of Essex, he was sent by the Queen to know the reason of so great a concourse. Then the Earl raising his voice, told him, "he certainly knew that it was designed to murder him in his bed (9): That his hand-writing was counterfeited, in order to have a pretence to destroy him: That he had assembled his friends for the security of his life, since his enemies could not be satisfied without having his blood." The Lord-Keeper answering, the Queen would do him justice, provided he would discover his grievances, was interrupted by a voice, crying out, My Lord, you are betrayed, they design only to ruin you, we lose time, let us be gone. Upon this, the Earl made a sign to those sent by the Queen to follow him (10), and while they were crossing the Court, they heard a confused noise, saying, Kill them, away with that Great Seal, secure them in prison. When they were in the house, the Earl told them, "if they would have a little patience, he would go and advise with the Lord-Mayor and Sheriffs, and return immediately." Upon these words, he left them, and ordering the door to be shut, set a guard upon them.

Immediately after, he began to march with his company, and entering the City, cried out, For the Queen! A Plot is laid for my Life! Then he went to the Sheriff's house, which was at a distance (11), and during his march was not joined by more than a few numbers led by curiosity crowded to see him pass. In vain he cried, Aim, my Friends, or you can do me no good. He was not a man stirred in his favour. The Sheriff, who saw him approaching, withdrew himself by a back door, to the Lord Mayor's. The Sheriff's flight convinced the Earl he had been deceived, when he was told, he might depend on his assistance. While he was at the Sheriff's, uncertain what to do, he was informed that a herald (12) had proclaimed him a Traitor, in one of the Wards of the City, and that the Earl of Cumberland had done the same in another. Upon this, he left the Sheriff's house, and crying in the Streets, that England was going to be delivered to the Infanta of Spain, conjured the inhabitants to take arms for the prevention of so great a misfortune. But seeing no man prepare to support him, and hearing withal, that the Lord Admiral was marching against him with a strong party, he resolved to return to his own house. But coming to Ludgate he found [Sir John] Lesion posted there with a company of Soldiers to oppose his Passage. He instantly sent Gorges to desire leave to go through; but being denied, was obliged to return to St. Paul's. Here Gorges represented to him, that it would be proper to discharge the three Counsellors, and having the Earl's leave, he freed them immediately, and accompanied them himself to White-Hall. Probably, Gorges had betrayed him from the very beginning.

Mean time, the Earl persisting in his resolution of returning home, found the street chained, and guarded by Soldiers (1). As he saw no other way to pass than by attacking the guard, he ordered Blunt to fall on, and seconded him sword in hand, with great resolution. But he was repulsed and shot through the Hat (2), and Blunt was taken prisoner. By this resistance, he was forced to go to Queen-hith, and taking boat with a few followers, the rest being dispersed, retired to his house on the Thames side (3). When he came there, his first care was to burn some Papers, and then, fortify his house in the best manner he could, still expecting to be relieved by the Londoners. Shortly after, the Lord Admiral invested the house, both from the street and the gardens which reached to the river (4). Then, he summoned those within to surrender, to which they answered, they would dye sword in hand. This was the opinion of the Lord Sands, who pressed the Earl of Essex to fight his way out, representing, it was more honourable to die by the Sword, than the Ax. And indeed the besieged seemed to be all fixed to that resolution. But the Earl of Essex suddenly changed his mind, and offered to surrender on these three conditions: that they should all be civilly treated; tryed according to the Laws; and that Ashton the Minister should be sent to him to comfort him in prison. The Lord Admiral answered, that he engaged for the first; that the Queen would doubtless perform the second; and as to the third, he promised his interest to obtain it. Ashton was a Presbyterian Minister. This done, the Earls of Essex, Rutland, Southampton, the Lords Sands, Cromwell, Montague, with Devereux and Bromley, were put into boats and conducted to the Tower. The rest were committed to other prisons. The next day the Queen by Proclamation thanked the Londoners for their fidelity, warning them withal to have a watchful eye on whatever passed in the City, the Conspiracy being, as she said, more dangerous than was imagined.

The thirteenth of February, Thomas Lee, the Earl of Essex's creature, and intimate friend of the Earl of Tiron, was hanged for saying to a certain Officer, that it would be a glorious action for six brave fellows to force the Queen to release Essex and the other prisoners. Two days after, the Queen published a proclamation, ordering all vagabonds to leave the City on pain of death. The Court had received information, that a great number of such persons lay hid in the City, to rescue the Earl of Essex, when an opportunity offered.

At last, some of the Prisoners having discovered the most secret resolutions of the Conspirators, the Earls of Essex and Southampton were tried the 10th of February (5). They were accused of the crimes I have mentioned, and their sole defense was, that they had done nothing but for their own preservation; however, they could not prove their lives had been in danger. The Earl of Essex expressed a disregard of his life, but the Earl of Southampton implored the Queen's mercy, and desired the Peers to intercede for him. They were both condemned to dye as Traitors.

The Earl of Essex after his sentence seriously reflected on his past conduct, and appeared very penitent. Ashton greatly contributed by his exhortations and remonstrances, to put him into this disposition. But because this Presbyterian Minister advised him to declare whatever he knew, and probably by that means, the King of Scotland was known to be concerned in the Conspiracy, Camden speaks of it in such a manner as shows, he approved not this conduct. By the impressions (says he) left upon him by his minister, Essex could think of nothing but damnation, unless he discovered the whole scene, and confessed who were his complices. An author who talks in this manner, is easily perceived to be secretly interested in the deposition of the criminal. However this be, the Earl of Essex desiring to speak with some of the Privy-Counsellors, the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Admiral, and Secretary Cecil went to him. He immediately asked the Lord Keeper's pardon for detaining him at his house, and Cecil's for accusing him of asserting the Infanta's Title to the Crown of England, and was sincerely reconciled to both. Then, he declared, that the Queen could not be safe whilst he lived, and desired he might suffer privately in the Tower. He owned, that some of his friends and domesticks were wicked Persons, and publick pests, and desired to speak with Blunt and Cuff, who were immediately sent for. When he saw them, he exhorted both to ask pardon of God and the Queen, and told Cuff that this disloyalty was owing to his advice. He declared that Sir Henry Nevill, Ambassador to France, was privy to the Conspiracy. This probably occasioned the recalling of that Ambassador as he was going to Paris, and his being ordered into the custody of the Lord Admiral. The Earl of Essex said also, that Montjoy Lord Deputy of Ireland, and several others in Scotland, France, and the Low-Countries were accessory to the design. But the Lord Montjoy's behaviour in Ireland, had so recommended him to the Queen, that she took no notice of the Earl's deposition against him. In short, the penitent Criminal made a full discharge of his conscience, and concealed nothing of what he knew.

Essex, (says Camden) thought a verbal confession too little, and therefore being moved by the dismal scene presented to his conscience, by the person whom he chose to guide it, he delivered the same in writing under his own hand, which his enemies shewing to King James some time after, brought the Earl and his friends into great dislike with that Prince. If King James had not been concerned in this affair, there is no visible reason why Essex's declarations should have made him forfeit his esteem. But according to the Earl's project, the Ambassadors of Scotland were now on their way to London, and King James ever after spoke of this Lord as of one who was his Martyr.

The 25th of February was appointed for the Earl of Essex's execution. That day the Queen appeared something irresolute. She even sent an order to the Lieutenant of the Tower to countermand his execution; but presently after, ordered him to proceed. This irresolution, pretended or real, has afforded plenty of matter for Plays and Romances, in which Elizabeth is represented as struggling with love and anger, not knowing which of the passions she should obey. She was now however in her 65th year, an age wherein the motions of love could not be very violent. But without dwelling on these trifles, it suffices to say, that the Earl of Essex died like a good Christian, with all the signs of a serious repentance. His head was not separated from his body till the third stroke, but the first deprived him of all sense of pain. The Marshal de Biran being told in what manner he died, ridiculed it, and said, such a death was more becoming a Priest than a Soldier.

Thus ended the life and projects of the Earl of Essex, projects which were never yet thoroughly known. Tho they seem to have tended only to dethrone Elizabeth, and set the Crown on the head of the King of Scotland, it is however not unlikely that he only used that Prince's title as a pretense to ruin Elizabeth, and that his confidence in the People's Affection inspired him with greater designs. It is certain, the Queen had given occasion to think she had more than a common esteem for this Lord. When he was yet but one and twenty years old, she forgave him what he had lent his Father, for his Expedition into Ireland; and he was the only person to whom she was ever so liberal. The Earl of Leicester dying shortly after, she ordered his goods to be exposed to sale, for payment of the sums she had lent him. Before the Earl of Essex had done her any great service, she made him Knight of the Garter, and gave him a place in her Privy-Council. She continued afterwards to distinguish him from all her other Courtiers, not only by the Posts, Offices, and Commands she honoured him with, but chiefly by particular marks of her favour, which were visible to all, and made him to be considered as a favorite. These favours produced their usual effect, that is, rendered him proud and vain. He could not bear that any person should be promoted but by his means, and was a sworn enemy to all who were trusted by the Queen. Nay, he grew so excessively proud, that he pretended to lord it over the Queen herself, and forced her to follow his advice in every thing. This procured him that unfortunate Box on the Ear, which, doubtless, inspired him with thoughts of a signal revenge. For, from that time, he began to meditate projects which proved his ruin, and might have been attended with that of the Queen herself; so careful ought Sovereigns to be, not to affront persons of Honour. His Family was originally

To display in few words the Elogy of this illustrious Queen, it seems to be sufficient to observe, that her name is still of Blessed Memory with the English, now when Flattery cannot be supposed to have any share in the venue they pay her. But Elizabeth banished from England the choice Religion, and restored the Reformation. This alone was the cause that two Parties have been formed on her account, who mutually tax each other with

The Protestants, considering that this Queen was the sole bulwark of their Religion, which they say without her would have been destroyed in England, Scotland, Ireland, and perhaps in France and the Low-Countries, cannot forbear giving her great commendations, and feel themselves inclined to excuse her failings. For the same reason, the Roman Catholics look upon her with another eye; nay, some have not scrupled to paint her in the blackest colours, and use her the most odious epithets. This makes it impossible to give her a character that shall please all the world. I shall content myself therefore with making some Reflections which will assist those who seek only Truth, to pass an impartial judgment on this famous Queen, free from party-passion and prejudice.

Elizabeth had great sense, and a judgment naturally, found and solid. This appeared in her whole conduct, from the beginning to the end of her Reign. Nothing shows her capacity more, than her address in surmounting the difficulties and troubles created by her enemies, especially when it is considered what these enemies were, the most powerful, the most artful, the most subtle, and the least scrupulous in Europe (2). The bare naming of them is a sufficient demonstration. The Court of Rome under several Popes, Philip II. King of Spain, the Duke of Alva, Henry II. and Charles IX. Kings of France, Catherine de Medici, the Duke of Guise, the Cardinal of Lorraine, Mary Queen of Scots, all the Romish Clergy, and particularly the Jesuits. Had her forces been proportionable to those of her enemies united together, there would be nothing very extraordinary. Strength often supplies the want of capacity. But in what manner did she withstand so potent, so formidable Enemies? It was by two or three Maxims which she made the rule of her conduct, and from which she never swerved: To make herself beloved by her people: To be frugal of her Treasure: To cherish dissension amongst her Neighbours. If things are rightly considered, she had no other way to secure herself. It cannot therefore be denied, that this is a clear evidence of her ability. But as her ability was never questioned, it is not this I am chiefly to describe. On the contrary, her enemies have taken occasion from thence to defame her, by representing as vices disguised, what her friends extol as so many virtues. They pretend, that her ability consisted wholly in an over-strained dissimulation, and a profound hypocrisy. In a word, they say she was a perfect Comedian. For my part, I don't pretend to deny that she made great use of dissimulation, as well to the Courts of France and Spain, as to the Queen of Scotland and the Scots. This would be denying a manifest truth. The Court of Rome was the only Court she never dissimuled with. I am also persuaded, that being so much concerned to gain the love and esteem of her subjects, she affected to speak, frequently and with exaggeration, of her tenderness for them, and desired to have it believed, that she did thro' an excessive love to her People, things wherein her own interest was mostly concern'd. But the question is to know, whether in her circumstances her dissimulation was blameable. What injury was it to her subjects to endeavour to persuade them, she loved them tenderly, since she actually and really did whatever was necessary to convince them? As to foreigners, it must be carefully observed, that her dissimulation and artifices tended not to invade their possessions, but to preserve her own. Her enemies frequently attempted to deprive her both of Crown and Life, and she saved both by her policy and dissimulation. Where is the harm of such a conduct? Can the dissimulation and artifices which aim only at self-preservation, be, without extreme prejudice, confounded with the dissimulation and artifices that tend to surprize the innocent, and invade the property of others; can these, I say, be considered upon the same foot? For my part I am so far from thinking that this sort of dissimulation is any blemish to Elizabeth's reputation, that I rather believe it ought to be reckoned among her commendable qualities.

Avarice is another failing imputed to her by her own friends. I will not deny that she was too parsimonious, and upon some occasions stuck too close to her maxim, not to be at any expence but what was absolutely necessary. However in general I maintain, that her circumstances required her, if not to be covetous, at least not to part with her money but with the greatest caution, both to preserve her People's affections, and enable her to withstand her enemies. After all, whom did she wrong by her extreme frugality? A dozen of hungry Courtiers, who would have been very glad she had lavish'd her treasure, like the King her Father in the beginning of his reign. As for the rest of her Subjects, instead of having cause to complain of this pretended avarice, they had reason to be pleas'd with it, since it confist'd not in robbing them of their property by illegal methods, as Henry VII. her Grandfather had done, but in husbanding her revenue, and consequently their own (3).

She is also accus'd of not being so chaste, as she affected to appear. Nay, some pretend, there are now in England the descendants of a Daughter she had by the Earl of Leicester. But as hitherto no proof of this accusation has been produced, it may be safely reckon'd among the calumnies with which her reputation has been attack'd, as well during her life as after her death.

It is not so easy to justify her concerning the death of the Queen of Scots. Here it must freely be owned that she sacrific'd equity, justice, and perhaps her own conscience, to her safety. If Mary was guilty of her Husband's murder, as there is reason to believe, it belong'd not to Elizabeth to punish her. And indeed it was not for that she took away her life, but she us'd that pretence to detain her in prison, under the deceitful excuse of making her innocence appear. On this occasion her dissimulation was blame-worthy. This first injustice engag'd her afterwards, to use numberless arts and devices to have a pretence to render Mary's imprisonment perpetual. Hence arose at last the necessity of putting her to death on the scaffold. In short, this excess of violence gave birth to more artifices and acts of dissimulation to justify herself, and cast the blame on the innocent. This, doubtless, is Elizabeth's great blemish, which manifestly proves to what height she carried the fear of losing a tottering Crown. This continual fear and uneasiness, is what characterizes her reign, because it was the spring of almost all her actions. All that can be said for Elizabeth, is, that the Queen of Scots and her friends had brought things to such a point, that one of the two Queens was to perish, and it was natural that the weakest should fall. But this does not excuse Elizabeth's injustice to Mary, in detaining her in prison, which had no other foundation than Elizabeth's fear concerning her Crown.

I come now to Elizabeth's religion. I don't believe her being a true Protestant was ever question'd. But as it was her interest to be so, some have taken occasion to doubt whether the zeal she express'd for her religion, was the effect of her perswasion or policy. What may have occasioned this doubt, is, that it clearly appears in her History, that in assisting the Protestants of France and the Netherlands, as well as those of Scotland, she had only temporal views, namely, her own safety and defence against impending invasions. But it cannot thence be inferred, she was not a good Protestant, or had no religion at all, since 'tis not impossible that her religion should agree with her temporal interest. All that can be said, is, that she happened sometimes to prefer her temporal, before her religious concerns.

She is warmly accus'd of persecuting the Catholics, and putting several to death. 'Tis true, there were some that suffer'd death in her reign. But one may venture to affirm, that none were punished but for conspiring against the Queen or State, or for attempting to destroy the Protestant Religion in England, and restore the Romish by violent methods. The Catholics who lived peaceably, were tolerat'd, tho' with some restraint as to the exercise of their religion, but with none as to their consciences. If this may be called persecution, what name shall be given to the sufferings of the Protestants in the reign of Mary?

(1) She lived fifty nine years, six months, and seven days; and reigned forty four years, four months, and eight days, and is buried in Henry VIII's Chapel. Her Successor King James erected a stately Monument to her Memory, which the Reader may see in p. 159, her Epitaphs are also in Speed, p. 881.

(2) Pope Sixtus V. us'd to speak of Queen Elizabeth, and the King of Navarre, as the only Princes that understood what it was to govern; and profanely wish'd, I might enjoy her but one night, saying, they would beget a new Alexander the Great between them. Burnet's Ref. Tom. II. p. 41.

(3) She was not covetous, but that four Subjects having been grant'd her one of her Parliaments, she having said that three would be better than four, by Proclamation charged the fourth, and so much of the other three as was not levied. Burnet's Hist. of Lewis, p. 128.

(4) The secular Priests themselves shew'd in their writings: That in the eleven first years of Queen Elizabeth's reign, not one Papist was rector of the Religion; in ten years after the publication of Pope Pius V's Bull, not above twelve Priests had been put to death, and most of them for crimes in the year 1580, when the turbulent and restless Jesuits first set foot in England; and yet in the ten next years after that, not above thirty Priests were executed, and fifty five banish'd. See Camden, p. 649.

246b1's Character, I shall add, that she was a good and illustrious Queen, with many virtues and noble qualities, and few faults. But what she ought to be esteemed for above all things, is, that she caused the English to enjoy a felicity unknown to their Ancestors, under most of the Kings her predecessors. This, doubtless, is the Test, by which we are to judge of those whom God has set over us.

ELIZABETH had no sooner breathed her last, but the Council met to consult about the measures that were to be taken in the present juncture. The Queen, who had delayed to name her Successor till the end of her days, at last declared, the King of Scotland was to ascend the Throne of England after her, and it was not doubted but her Will agreed with this declaration. So, the Council deemed it necessary, before all things, to be assured of it, by perusing the Will, which was immediately opened, and found to confirm what the Queen had declared by word of mouth. The King of Scotland had therefore in his person a threefold Right, which rendered his Title indisputable. The first was what is called in England, a Parliamentary Right, which derived its validity from the Act of Parliament, securing the Crown to Henry VII. and his Heirs. The second was Hereditary Right, for this Prince was the nearest relation, and natural Heir to Elizabeth. These two Rights were farther strengthened by the Queen's Will, which made the third. So, the Council readily judged, he ought to be acknowledged for King of England. This resolution being imparted to the Lord-Mayor of London, the new King was proclaimed by the name of James I, six hours after the Queen's death.

Though the Council had been careful to send the King the first news of his accession to the Crown of England, Sir Robert Carey, the Lord Hunston's youngest Son, found means to be before them (1). James, who impatiently expected the news, received it however without altering his countenance, the Queen's illness having been long enough to afford him time to be composed, when the news should arrive. Nevertheless, he could not forbear lifting up his eyes to heaven, probably to thank God for the favour he had long expected, not without great anxiety. Elizabeth would never positively declare, she intended to name him for her Successor. She contented herself with keeping him in hopes, but in such a manner, that she seemed to relieve the power of depriving him of the Succession, if his conduct displeased her. James's correspondence with the Earl of Essex, which, though connived at, was not unknown to the Court of England, might give him some apprehensions. Besides, Elizabeth never loved him; whether because he was Son to her mortal enemy, or had shown too much impatience to possess the Crown of England; or in fine, by reason of his inclination to the Catholics. All these reasons made this Prince very uneasy, in the expectation of a Crown which his birth intitled him to, but which, however, he might have lost, had Elizabeth been pleased to take measures to deprive him of it. The news of the Queen's death could not then be agreeable to him, since, by his correspondence with one of the chief Ministers, he was assured she had done nothing to his prejudice.

Presently after Carey's arrival, came Sir Charles Percy Stow, and Thomas Somerjet, who, by order of the Council of England, notified to him the Queen's death, and the Council's diligence in proclaiming him (2). These were quickly followed by Sir Thomas Lake, who was sent by the Council to inform him of the state and condition of the Realm (3).

Whilst the news of his accession to the Crown was carrying to the King, the English were reflecting on the alterations which the Queen's death was likely to produce.

1603. The People in general lamented the loss of their Queen; They had been happy under her, and were not sure their happiness would continue in the new Reign. A King of Scotland on the Throne of England, was to most no pleasing object. Besides, since James was of age, he had given no very advantageous idea of himself. His unsteadiness, his weakness for his Favorites, his inclination to the Catholics, of which, on several occasions, he had given visible marks, were not qualities apt to prepossess the English in his favour. It was hoped, however, he would tread in the steps of the illustrious Queen, his immediate predecessor, because it was thought he could not follow a better course, and what is desired is easily believed. As for the deceased Queen's Ministers and Courtiers, the good and welfare of the Realm was what least affected them. Every one was wholly intent upon gaining the favour of the Successor. Towards the end of the late Reign, there were two factions at Court, the one consisting of Essex's friends, and the other of his enemies. The first was entirely humbled by the death of their Head; and the other had so far the ascendant, that they absolutely ruled in the Council. Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State, and second Son of the late Lord Treasurer Burleigh, was at the head of this Party. But this politic Courtier, foreseeing, that after the Queen's death his Party could not fail of sinking, since King James considered the Earl of Essex as his martyr, had taken timely measures for his support. Before the Queen's decease, he had devoted himself to the King of Scotland, and held a private correspondence with him, to inform him of what passed at Court. By this means, he had secured that Prince's favour, though it was not without danger of losing the Queen's, had he known his secret practices (1). He was the only Man of his Party that had gained the new King's favour, which he so artfully cultivated, that in the end he became his Prime Minister.

Sir Robert Cecil was devoted to King James before Elizabeth's death's decease. Weldon.

The hopes and fears of the English with regard to Religion. Speed.

There was also another thing which engaged the attention of the English, namely, the affair of Religion. The King's Conduct in Scotland gave occasion for sundry reflections, which kept People in uncertainty, none knowing positively what was to be hoped or feared. James was born of Roman Catholic Parents, but being taken from his Mother in his infancy, had been educated in the Protestant Religion, and always professed it. On the other hand, the Religion he had been brought up in, though Protestant, differed a little from the Religion established in England, if not in Doctrine, at least in Discipline, and some other points of external worship, which were considered by the two Churches as very important. In a word, it was the Presbyterian or Puritanical Religion. In fine, this Prince had shewn on numberless occasions, that he was far from being an enemy to the Romish Religion. All this formed a certain contrait, which bred an universal suspense. The Catholics hoped to meet, under his Government, with gentler treatment, and more indulgence than under Elizabeth, nay, they carried their expectations much farther. The Presbyterians flattered themselves, that James, who had been educated in their Religion, would promote the reforming of the Church of England upon the plan of that of Scotland, and hoped shortly to see the downfall of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy. Finally, the Church-of-England-Men thought to have reason to expect, that the new King would conform to their Religion, since it was established by Law. But after all, the hopes of the three Parties could not but be mixed with fears, since the King had not yet declared. Such were the sentiments of the English, concerning their new King, whom as yet they knew only by report.

As soon as James was informed by the persons sent from the Council of England that he was proclaimed, he dispatched Aston to acquaint the Privy Counsellors, that he was preparing for his journey, and accordingly he left Scotland the 5th of April, eleven days after Elizabeth's death. The principal Scotch Lords, by whom he was attended into England, were the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Mar, the Lord Hume, and the Lord Kinloss, with several others of less distinction, but who afterwards were promoted to English Honours and Dignities. He spent above a month in his journey from Edinburgh to London (2), where he arrived the 7th of May. He had no sooner entered England, but the People strove to demonstrate their respect by magnificent entertainments in all the Towns he passed through. Such were their acclamations, their wishes for his prosperity, their praises and joy for his arrival, that an honest plain Scotchman could not forbear saying, This People will spoil a good King. Mean while, the multitudes which flocked from all parts to see their new Sovereign, grew at last so troublesome to him, that he was forced to set bounds to their curiosity by a Proclamation. This was very surprizing to the People, who did not understand that a little inconvenience should hinder the King from receiving the respects of his new Subjects. But perhaps this was owing to the King's fear, that among the crowd some assassin might lurk, and attempt upon his life. It may be too, he had a mind to accustom his Subjects not to be too familiar with their Sovereign. Be this as it will, it did not hinder the people from paying him every where the respect due to him, and expressing great satisfaction to see him pass, in order to be seated on the Throne.

At York, most of the English Lords came and paid him their homage. Among these was Secretary Cecil, who was now considered as out of favour, because he had been Essex's sworn enemy. But great was the surprize, when the King received him with extraordinary marks of esteem. This gave occasion to suspect, he had taken care beforehand to gain his favour, and the King's behaviour to him afterwards confirmed the suspicion. Some accuse this Lord of inspiring the King with the design of setting himself above the laws, and not suffering the Parliament to share the supreme authority with him. At James's Death, it is certain, James's chief care, after his accession, was to maintain the prerogative Royal in its utmost extent, nay, to carry it higher than any of his predecessors. He must, at the time I am now speaking of, have conceived a larger notion than had been hitherto formed, of the power of an English King, since when he came to Newark he ordered a Cut-purse to be hanged by his sole warrant, and without trial. It cannot be denied that this was beyond the lawful power of a King of England, and directly contrary to the privileges of the English Nation. Probably, care was taken to warn him of the ill effects such illegal acts might produce among the people, since he refrained from them ever after.

Some Others. At James's Death, he was to maintain the Royal Prerogative. He brought a Cut-purse a trial. Weldon, p. 5.

On the 3d of May he came to Theobald's, Secretary Cecil's House (3), where he stayed some days. Here the Council came to pay their respects to him, and here passed what was most remarkable in his journey till his arrival at London. When he was about to leave Scotland, he sent Carey to tell the Privy-Counsellors, that his intention was to continue every man in his post. However, at his coming to Theobald's, he encreases their number with several others, most of whom were Scots, his design being, as he more plainly shewed afterwards, to make but one Kingdom of England and Scotland. The new Scotch Counsellors were the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Mar, the Lord Hume (4), and Sir James Elphinstoun [his Secretary.] He nominated also two English Noblemen, the Lords Zouch, and Burleigh, Secretary Cecil's eldest brother. I find likewise that at the same time or presently after, he admitted into his Council the Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland (5), the Lords Thomas and Henry Howard, the one son, the other brother to the late Duke of Norfolk, of whom the first was a suspected, the last a known Papist, but upon the King's arrival he had embraced the Protestant Religion. The King's gratitude to the Howard-Family, who, for the sake of the Queen his Mother, were in disgrace in the late Reign, did not stop there. The Lord Thomas was made Earl of Suffolk, and then Lord Treasurer, and the Lord Henry was created some years after Earl of Northampton. Moreover, Philip Earl of Arundel, the late Duke of Norfolk's eldest son, having lost his title by his condemnation, though Elizabeth gave him his life, the King created his Son Thomas, Earl of Arundel and Surrey (6). Thus the King's regard for the Duke of Norfolk's

(1) The person that managed Cecil's correspondence at the Court of Scotland, was Bruce, a younger Brother of a noble Family in Scotland, who carried the matter with him addressed in secrecy, that all the great men in England, without knowing of one another's doing it, and without the Queen's suspecting any covered a little before the Queen's death. Being in the Coach with her as she was taking the air, on Black-heath, a Post from Scotland came by. Whereupon the Queen stopped her Coach to receive the Packet. Cecil dressing some of his secret conveyance might be discovered, and having a ready wit, hastily which the Queen, mistrusting nothing, and having all sorts of things, ordered to be done. (6) To avoid confusion, I will be proper to continue the account of the numerous Howard Family, from page 821. Vol. I. — Thomas Howard, the 3d Duke of Norfolk, married, 1. Ann, Daughter of King Edward IV, by whom he had Henry Howard, who died young. 2. Elizabeth, Daughter of Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, by whom he had Henry Earl of Surrey, beheaded 13. 1603. than to establish any one by solid and undeniable reasons. I shall add here in confirmation of what I have said, that the Kings who were reckoned the wisest and most able, took care to have their Titles confirmed by the Parliament, when they believed them liable to any objections. So James I. in resolving to establish this pretended Hereditary Right, was the first cause of the Troubles which afflicted England, and which are not yet ceased.

This Prince's choice of the Ministers who were to manage the public Affairs, greatly conduc'd to cherish his high conceit of his personal qualities, and of the Regal Authority. The first was Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury. This Lord, who had been Essex's sworn enemy, knowing how much the King was concerned in that Earl's disgrace, found no better way to keep in his favour than by flattering him continually, and making his court to him, by talking of kingly Government according to his notions. He was accus'd at least of inspiring him with sentiments very disadvantageous to the People and Parliament. He was in other respects a man of a great genius, consummate prudence, vast capacity, and perfectly acquainted with the fate and interest of the nation. The Earls of Suffolk and Northampton, the one Lord-Chamberlain, the other Lord-Keeper, were much inferior to the Earl of Salisbury in parts and ability. But 'tis pretended they were Papists in their hearts, and as the Catholic Religion could be restored in England but by an arbitrary power, they earnestly laboured to indulge the King in his notions concerning the regal Authority. To these three Lords the King chiefly committed the management of his affairs. All the rest of the Courtiers followed the same method, and emulously strove to gain the King's favour, by a blind submission to his Will.

Shewy after the King's arrival at London, he sent a numerous train of Lords and Ladies (1) into Scotland to attend the Queen and his Children, who were ready to come to him. He had three Children, namely, Henry nine years old, Elizabeth, and Charles (2). This last, being indisposed, was left in Scotland till September the next year.

Whilst the Queen was on her journey, the King remembered, he had complained to Elizabeth of Valentine Thomas, who had slandered her, and was now in prison. It is not known wherein this slander consisted, but whatever it was, about a month after the King's arrival, Thomas was ordered to be brought upon his Trial, and received sentence of death for conspiring against Elizabeth, and some of her Council (3).

The Marquis of Rofny

About the fame time, and before the Queen's arrival, the Marquis of Rofny came from the King of France, to congratulate the King upon his acceffion to the Crown of England. He had exprefs orders from the King his Mafter to appear in mourning with all his train, at his firft audience: But he was told, he would difoblige the King, who would doubtlefs look upon this affectation as a reproach for not going himfelf into mourning for the Queen. The Marquis fays in his Memoirs, that the King being at table, boafed publicly, that for feveral years before Elizabeth's death, it was he properly that governed England, and that no refolution was taken in the Council but by his direction. He would perhaps have been nearer the truth, had he faid, Elizabeth governed Scotland and himfelf too, without his perceiving it. The French King's defign was not only to congratulate the King. His chief aim in fending the Marquis of Rofny his Favorite, was, to hinder James from being gained by the Spaniards, and to 1603.

renew his defensive alliance with Elizabeth, in which the Ambassador succeeded to his wish.

him but compliments. Probably, this Ambassador was sent into England, only to observe what passed there, and to sound the new King's intention concerning a Peace between England and Spain. James had now shewn by his proceedings, that he was inclined to Peace, since, without any solicitation, he had revoked the Letters of Mark granted by Elizabeth, to several private Persons (4). Some time after, Taxis came also to London from the King of Spain, and having congratulated the King upon his accession to the Crown, desired Commissioners might be appointed to treat with him of a Peace. 'This negotiation, which was then only begun, ended at length in a Treaty of Peace, concluded the next year (5).

The Plague, which began to break out in December, increasing at London during the hot weather, the King retired for some time to Wilton, the Earl of Pembroke's Seat, near Salisbury.

Whilst the Court was at Wilton, a Conspiracy, or rather the project of a Conspiracy was discovered, the Authors whereof were [Thomas] Lord Grey [of Wilton, Henry Brooke Lord Cobham, Sir Walter Raleigh, George Brock, two Priests, Wajzen and Clare, and many others (8). The design was to place on the Throne Arabella Stewart, the King's Cousin-German. To this end, the Lord Cobham was to treat with the Archduke at Brussels, and try to obtain fix hundred thousand Crowns, of which Raleigh was to have seventy thousand. Cobham was also to carry Arabella's Letters to the Archduke, the King of Spain, the Duke of Savoy, wherein she should promise to marry the person they should name, and to grant a full Toleration to the Catholics. It was farther agreed, that the Lord Grey (7) should ask the King's leave to raise two thousand Men for the service of Holland, and with these Troops should seize his Person. But this was only a theft unexecuted in every point, except that some of the Conspirators had conspired with Count Arenberg. It is thought, the Count occasioned this Plot to betray Raleigh, who, of all England, was the Man most desired by the Spaniards, and that afterwards he himself informed the King of it (8). However this be, the Conspirators being apprehended, were tried at Windsor in November following, and condemned to die. Raleigh was found guilty upon the written evidence of one single witness, namely the Lord Cobham, even without being confronted, contrary to the express Law of the Land (9). Only George Brock however, the Lord Cobham's Brother, and the two Priests were executed, the King having ordered the rest to be back to prison, but without giving them a Pardon. The Lord Grey died soon after, and the Lord Cobham obtained this liberty at last (10). But Sir Walter Raleigh remained twelve years in the Tower, where he wrote a History of the World, much esteemed in England. I shall have farther occasion to speak of him in the course of this Reign.

Hence it was natural to infer, that to conquer their obliquity, it was requisite to use some severity. And this was what the King plainly intimated, when he said, "he would answer for the Bishops, that it was not their design immediately to enforce obedience," and when he afterwards added more clearly, "that after such a time they should be dealt with in another manner." But this conference wrought not the conviction of the Puritans, and all the fruit the King reaped by it, was, to shew them how much they were mistaken in depending upon his protection.

Whitgift was a mild and peaceable man, who would have been very glad to reclaim the Puritans by gentle methods, agreeable to the Gospel, but he died quickly after, on the 29th of February. He was succeeded by Richard Bancroft, a Prelate of a very different character, who, instead of dealing gently with the Puritans, never ceased incensing the King against them, and doing them all the mischief he could. Herein he was but too closely imitated by the rest of the Bishops, who found a double advantage in destroying the Puritans. In the first place they made their Court to the King, who hated them mortally. Secondly, they preserved the Hierarchy, which the Puritans were desirous to overthrow. The persecution, which these suffered whilst Bancroft was at the head of the Clergy, induced many families to withdraw out of the Kingdom, to enjoy elsewhere liberty of conscience, denied them at home (1). Bancroft is also accused of having been one of the most zealous to insinuate into the King the Maxims of arbitrary power.

The 22d of February the King published a proclamation, commanding all Jesuits and other Priests having orders from any foreign power, to depart the Kingdom (2). This proclamation was so worded, that the King was extremely careful to shew, he did not banish the Jesuits in hatred to the Catholic Religion in general, but only on account of their attachment to the doctrine of the Pope's unlimited power over crowned Heads. This is what the King very diligently observed throughout his whole Reign. He constantly affected to consider the Romish Religion, so far only as it might be contrary to civil Government, that is to say, with respect to the Pope's unlimited Power. As for the other Doctrines, he was very willing to allow the Catholics to believe what they pleased, provided they renounced the belief of the Pope's superiority over Kings. He was persuaded this equity would procure him a peaceable Reign: but he had too much reason afterwards to be convinced, that he was taking wrong measures, and yet would never alter his conduct. Most of the Catholics were not satisfied with so limited a Toleration, and the zealous Protestants represented the King as a Papist. 'Tis certain, he gave occasion to think he was inclined to the Catholic Religion, by his constant care to shew, he was displeased only with the Pope's absolute Power, and valued not the other Doctrines, which distinguished the two Religions. This obliged him to take, in favour of the moderate Catholics, some steps which rendered him very suspicious to many Protestants (3), whilst others considered his zeal against the Presbyterians as an undeniable evidence of his attachment to the Protestant Religion.

The Proclamation against the Jesuits was soon followed by another, enjoining the Puritans to conform to the worship of the established Church (4). There was not seen here the same care to justify the King's conduct with respect to this sort of persecution. The King intimated in the first, that he would have regard to the tender consciences of such Catholics as could not comply with the received Doctrines of the Church of England. But in this, there was not the least indulgence for the tender consciences of the Puritans. These were all a set of obstinate people who deserved to have no favour shewn them!

As the Parliament was to meet the 19th of March, the King thought it necessary to gain the affection of his subjects, by suppressing some abuses introduced about the end of the late Reign, tending to the oppression of the people. This he did by several Proclamations against certain Monopolies; against Protections frequently hindering the course of justice; against Salt-Petre men, who dug up people's houses, unless they were well fed; against the King's Purveyors, who seized any man's horses and cart, under colour of employing them for the King, and then excused them for money. Among these Proclamations, there was one not so acceptable to the people, namely, that against Hunting, on very severe penalties to the offender. This Reign was a Reign of Proclamations. The King and his ministers would have been glad to have had them regarded as Laws; but neither the Judges nor people were yet accustomed to it.

Shortly after, another appeared, appointing the 5th of August to be kept as a Holy-day. It was ordered, that every year on that day publick thanks should be returned to God in all the Churches, for the King's miraculous deliverance in the year 1600, from the Conspiracy of the Gouries, who made an attempt upon his Life (5). This new Holy-day was not universally liked. Besides that the occasion of it happened to the King before his accession to the Crown of England, there were people as well in Scotland as England, who had the malice to affirm it was only a fiction to cover a real conspiracy of the King against the two Rutbems or Gouries, who were killed on this occasion. I don't relate this with intent to blemish King James's Weldon, reputation, or to question the deliverance for which he was pleased to thank God, but only to shew that from the beginning of his Reign in England, there were some who had no great opinion of him (6).

As the time of the Parliament's meeting approached, the King and Queen made their entry into London four days before, not having been able to do it sooner by reason of the Plague. The King had need that day of all his patience, nothing being more disagreeable to him than the Solemnities which drew a crowd of People about him (7). Herein he differed from Queen Elizabeth, who took a pleasure in seeing her people press to behold her, and in hearing their acclamations.

James's First's notion of the English Constitution was, as I observed, very different from what had been hitherto current. If any of his Predecessors had been of his opinion, they had, at least, taken care to conceal it, or to shew it but on extraordinary occasions. For his part, he did not think fit to follow their example, since he omitted no opportunity to discover his thoughts. He was persuaded, the privileges of the Nation and Parliament were so many Usurpations, or at best, but revocable concessions of the Crown, and gave frequent occasion to believe, he had formed a design to free both himself and successors from the restraint which the Laws, Customs, and Privileges of the English Nation had laid on his Predecessors. However this be, from one end of his Reign to the other, he embraced all opportunities to improve his Prerogative-Royal, to which he set no Bounds but his Will. The first publick step which discovered his sentiments, was the calling of his first Parliament, of which I am now going to speak. Both in the Writs and the Proclamation, he takes upon him to describe what sort of Representatives should be elected, not by way of exhortation, as the former Kings had done, but by way of command, and as conditions without which they should not be admitted into the House. This was directly striking at the Commons, whose privilege of deciding the validity of Elections had never been questioned.

We notify by this Presentes, that all Returnes and Certificates of Knights, Citizens and Burgeses, oughte and are to be brought to the Chaucery, and there to be filed of Record; and if any shall be founde to be made contrarie to this Proclamation, the same is to be rejected as unlawful and insufficient, and the Citie or Borough to be fined for the

In this Proclamation the King acknowledges himself personally much beholden to the Bishop of Rome for his kind Offices and private temporal Carriage towards him in many things, and says, he is ready to returne the same towards him as a secular Prince.

The chief Explanations now added were, the whole Rubrick before private Baptism; all the latter part of the Catechism, from the Lord's Prayer to the end; Prayers in St. Elymer, lib. p. 466, &c.

(5) There was not only a yearly Fast for this deliverance, (whether real or imaginary) but also a weekly commemoration, by a Sermon every Thursday. Weldon says, that the wifely of the Scott Nation gave little credit to that story, p. 8. And Dr. Weldon, that being in itself so improbable a thing, and attended with so many inconsistent circumstances, it was disbelieved at the time it was said to have been attempted, p. 19.

Chamber to the King; and the second, besides the title of Earl of Hildersburgh, got one of the prime Baronies of the Kingdom, Daughter to the Earl of Suffolk. Weldon, p. 667.

(7) The Suburbs and City were one continued Scene of Pageantry. There were seven triumphal Gates or Arches erected in the streets through which he was to pass from the Tower to White-hall. It seems, he endured this day's bust and pretty patiently, being sure he should never have such another. But afterwards (says Weldon) in his publick appearances, the crowds of People made him so impatient, that he often dispersed them with frowns, not to say curses. His private Recreations at home, and his hunting Exercises abroad, both with the least disturbance, were his delights. Stow, p. 836, &c. Weldon, p. 667.

1604. same; and if it be founde that they have committed any grosse or wilful default and contempt in their Election, Retorne or Certificate, that then their Liberties, according to the Lawes, are to be seized into our handes as forfeited; and if any Person take upon him the place of a Knight, Citizen or Burgesse, not beinge duly elected returned and sworn according to the Lawes and Statutes in that behalf provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this our Proclamation, then every Person, so offending, to be fyned and imprisoned for the same.

Thus the King assumed a Power not only to enjoin Penalties on such as should offend against the Statutes concerning Elections, but also to enjoin them by a bare Proclamation, the authority whereof he rendered equal to that of the Laws. We shall see presently this was not done without design.

At the opening of the Parliament, the King being seated on his throne, sent for the Commons as usual: But as the crowd was great, it happened that several of the Members could not enter. Sir Herbert Crofts, one of the Representatives, striving to get in, was rudely thrust back by one of the King's Guards, who knowing him to be what he was, said to him in a jeer, Goodman Burgesse, you come not here. This affair made some noise afterwards; but the House thought proper to take no notice of it. The Commons being entered, the King made a speech to both Houses, which, though very long, deserves to be inserted at length, that from some certain Passages may be discovered the Genius, Character and Designs of this Prince.

"IT did no sooner please God to lighten his hand, and to relent the violence of his devouring Angel, against the poor people of this City, but as soon did I resolve to call this Parliament, and that for three chief and principal Reasons. The first whereof is, (and which of itself, although there were no more, is not only a sufficient, but a most full and necessary ground and reason for convening of this Assembly;) this first Reason, I say, is, that you, who are here presently assembled to represent the body of this whole Kingdom, and of all sorts of people within the same, may with your own ears hear, and that I out of mine own mouth may deliver unto you, the assurance of my due thankfulness for your so joyful and general applause, to the declaring and receiving of me in this Seat, (which God by my birth-right and lineal descent, had in the fulness of time provided for me;) and that, immediately after it pleased God to call your late Sovereign, of famous Memory, full of dayes, but fuller of immortal Trophies of Honour, out of this transitory Life. Not that I am able to express by words, or utter by eloquence, the vive image of mine inward thankfulness, but only that out of mine own Mouth you may rest assured to expect that measure of thankfulness at my hands, which is according to the infiniteness of your Deserts, and to my inclination, and ability for requital of the same. Shall I ever? Nay, can I ever be able, or rather so unable in memory, as to forget your unexpected readines and alacrity, your ever memorable resolution, and your most wonderful conjunction and harmony of your hearts, in declaring and embracing me as your undoubted lawfull King and Governour? Or shall it ever be blotted out of my mind, how at my first entry into this Kingdom, the people of all sorts rid and ran; nay, rather flew to meet me? Their eyes flaming nothing but sparkles of affection; their mouths and tongues uttering nothing but sounds of Joy; their hands, feet, and all the rest of their members in their gestures, discovering a passionate longing, and earnestness to meet and embrace their new Sovereign. Quid ergo retribuam? Shall I allow in myself that which I could never bear with in another? No, I must plainly and freely confess here, in all your audiences, that I did ever naturally so far mislike a tongue too smooth, and diligent in paying their Creditors with lip payment and verbal thanks, as I ever suspected that sort of People meant not to pay their debtors in more substantial sort of Coin. And therefore for expressing my thankfulness, I must resort unto the other two reasons of my convening of this Parliament, by them in Action to utter my thankfulness: Both the said reasons having but one ground, which is the deeds, whereby all the dayes of my life I am by God's grace to express my said thankfulness towards you, but divided in this, that in the first of these two mine Actions of thanks are so inseparably conjoynted with my person, as they are in a manner become individually annexed to the same. In the other reason, mine actions are such, as I may either do them, or leave them undone, although by God's grace I hope never to be weary of the doing of them.

"As to the first, it is the blessings which God hath in my person bestowed upon you all, wherein I protest, I do more glory at the same for your weale, than for any particular respect of mine own reputation, or advantage therein.

"The first then of these blessings, which God hath jointly with my person sent unto you, is, outward peace; that is, peace abroad with all foreign Neighbours: For I thank God, I may justly say, that never since I was a King, I either received wrong of any other Christian Prince or State, or did wrong to any. I have ever, I praise God, yet kept peace and amity with all, which hath been so far tied to my person, as at my coming here, you are witnesses, I found the State embarked in a great and tedious War; and only by mine arrival here, and by the peace in my person, is now amity kept, where war was before, which is no small blessing to a Christian Commonwealth: For by peace abroad with their Neighbours, the Towns flourish, the Merchants become rich, the Trade doth increase, and the People of all sorts in the land enjoy free liberty to exercise themselves in their several Vocations, without peril or disturbance. Not that I think this outward Peace so unparably tied to my person, as I dare assuredly promise to myself, and to you, the certain continuance thereof: But thus far I can very well assure you, and in the word of a King promise unto you, That I shall never give the first occasion of the breach thereof; neither shall I ever be moved for any particular or private passion of mind, to interrupt your publick peace, except I be forced thereunto, either for reparation of the honour of the Kingdom, or else by necessity for the weale and preservation of the same: In which case, a secure and honourable war, must be preferred to an unsecure and dishonourable war. Yet do I hope, by my experience of the by-past blessings of peace, which God hath so long, ever since my birth, bestowed upon me, that he will not be weary to continue the same, nor repent him of his grace towards me; transferring that sentence of King David's, upon his by-past victories of war, to mine of peace; That that God who preferred me from the devouring jaws of the Bear, and of the Lyon, and delivered them into my hands, shall also now grant me victory over that uncircumcised Philistine. But although outward peace be a great blessing, yet it is as far inferior to peace within, as civil wars are more cruel and unnatural than wars abroad. And therefore the second great blessing that God hath within my person sent unto you, is peace within, and that in a double form: first, by my descent lineally out of the loins of Henry the Seventh, is re-united and confirmed in me the union of the two princely Roles of the two houses of Lancaster and York, whereof that King of happy memory was the first uniter, as he was also the first ground-layer of the other peace, (the lamentable and miserable events, by the civil and bloody dissention betwixt these two houses, was so great, and so late, as it need not be renewed unto your memories) which as it was first settled and united in him, so is it now re-united and confirmed in me; being justly and lineally descended, not only of that happy conjunction, but of both the branches thereof in any times before. But the union of these two princely houses is nothing comparable to the union of these two ancient and famous kingdoms, which is the other inward peace annexed to my person.

"And here I must crave your patiences for a little space, to give me leave to discourse more particularly of the benefits that do arise of that union which is made in my blood, being a matter that most properly belongeth to me to speak of, as the head wherein that great body is united.

"And first, if we were to look no higher than to natural and physical reasons, we may easily be persuaded of the great benefits that by that union do redound to the whole island: for if twenty thousand men be a strong army, is not the double thereof, forty thousand, a double the stronger army? If a Baron enricheth himself with double as many lands as he had before, is he not double the greater? Nature teaches us, that mountains are made of notes; and that at the first, kingdoms being divided, and every particular town, or little country, as tyrants or usurpers could obtain the possession, a signiory part: Many of these little kingdoms are now, in process of time, by the ordinance of God, joined into great monarchies, whereby they are become powerful within themselves, to defend themselves from all outward invasions, and their head and governour thereby enabled to redeem them from foreign assaults, and punish private transgressions within. Do we not yet remember that this kingdom was divided into seven little kingdoms, besides Wales? And is it not now the stronger by their union? And hath not the union of Wales to England added a greater strength thereto? Which, though it was a great principality, was nothing comparable in greatness and power, to the ancient and famous kingdom of Scotland.

"But

1604. "But what should we stick upon any natural appearance, when it is manifest that God by his almighty providence hath pre-ordained it so to be? Hath not God first united these two kingdoms, both in language, religion, and similitude of manners? Yea, hath he not made us all in one island, compassed with one sea, and of itself by nature so indivisible, as almost those that were borderers themselves on the late borders, cannot distinguish, nor know, or discern their own limits: these two countries being separated neither by sea, nor great river, mountain, nor other strength of nature, but only by little small brooks, or demolished little walls, so as rather they were divided in apprehension than in effect; and now in the end and fulness of time united, the right and title of both in my person, alike lineally descended of both the crowns, whereby it is now become like a little world within itself, being intrenched and fortified round about with a natural, and yet admirable strong pond or ditch, whereby all the former fears of this nation are now quite cut off: The other part of the island being ever before now, not only the place of landing to all strangers that were to make invasion here, but likewise moved by the enemies of this State, by untimely incursions to make enforced diversion from their conquests, for defending themselves at home, and keeping sure their back-door, as then it was called, which was the greatest hindrance and lett that ever my predecessors of this nation gat, in disturbing them from their many famous and glorious conquests abroad: What God hath conjoined then, let no man separate. I am the husband, and all the whole island is my lawful wife; I am the head, and it is my body; I am the shepherd, and it is my flock. I hope therefore no man will be so unreasonable as to think, that I, that am a Christian King, under the gospel, should be a polygamist and husband to two wives; that I being the head, should have a divided and monstrous body; or that being the shepherd to so fair a flock, (whose fold hath no wall to hedge it but the four Seas) should have my flock parted in two. But as I am assured that no honest subject, of whatsoever degree, within my whole dominions, is less glad of this joyful union than I am; so may the frivolous objection of any that would be hinderers of this work (which God hath in my person already established) be easily answered; which can be none, except such as are either blinded with ignorance, or else transported with malice, being unable to live in a well-governed Common-wealth, and only delighting to fish in troubled waters: for if they would stand upon their reputation and privileges of any of the kingdoms; I pray you, were not both the kingdoms monarchies from the beginning? And consequently, could ever the body be counted without the head, which was ever unseparably joined thereunto? So that as the honour and privileges of any of the kingdoms could not be divided from their Sovereign; so are they now confounded and joined in my person, who am equal and alike kindly head to you both. When this kingdom of England was divided into so many little kingdoms, as I told you before, one of them behoved to eat up another, till they were all united in one. And yet can Wiltshire or Devonshire, which were of the West-Saxons, although their kingdom was of longest duration, and did by conquest overcome divers of the rest of the little kingdoms, make claim to priority of place or honour before Sussex, Essex, or other Shires, which were conquered by them? And have we not the like experience in the kingdom of France, being composed of divers Duchies, and one after another conquered by the sword? For even as little brooks lose their names by their running and falling into great rivers, and the very name and memory of the great rivers swallowed up in the Ocean; so by the conjunction of divers little kingdoms in one, are all these private differences and questions swallowed up. And, since the success was happy of the Saxon kingdoms, being conquered by the spear of Beltona, how much greater reason have we to expect a happy issue of this greater union, which is only fastened and bound up by the wedding-ring of Affrica? And as God hath made Scotland (the one half of this Isle) to enjoy my birth, and the first and most imperfect half of my life; and you here to enjoy the perfect and last half thereof; so cannot I think that any would be so injurious to me, no, not in their thoughts and wishes, as to cut asunder the one half of me from the other. But in this matter I have far enough insisted, resting assured, that in your hearts and minds you all applaud this my discourse.

"Now although these blessings, before rehearsed, of inward and outward peace be great: Yet seeing that in all good things, a great part of their goodness and estimation is lost, if they have not appearance of perpetuity or long continuance; so hath it pleased Almighty God to accompany my person also with that favour,

"having healthful and hopeful issue of my body; whereas some are here present, for continuance and propagation of that undoubted right which is in my person; under whom I doubt not but it will please God to prosper and continue for many years this union, and all other blessings of inward and outward peace, which I have brought with me.

"But neither peace outward, nor peace inward, nor any other blessing that can follow thereupon, nor appearance of the perpetuity thereof, by propagation in the posterity, is but a weak pillar, and a rotten reed to lean unto, if God do not strengthen, and by the staff of his blessing make them durable; for in vain doth the watchman watch the city, if the Lord be not the principal defence thereof; in vain doth the builder build the house, if God give not the succels; and in vain, as Paul saith, doth Paul plant, and Apoll water, if God give not the encrease: for all worldly blessings are but like twinkling shadows, fading flowers, or chaff blown before the wind, if by the profession of true religion, and works according thereunto, God be not moved to maintain and settle the thrones of Princes. And although that five mine entry into this kingdom, I have both by meeting with divers of the Ecclesiastical State, and likewise by divers Proclamations, clearly declared my mind in points of religion, yet do I not think it amiss in this so solemn an audience, I should now take occasion to discover somewhat of the secrets of my heart in that matter. For I shall never, with God's grace, be ashamed to make publick profession thereof at all occasions, lest God should be ashamed to profess and allow me, before men and angels; especially, lest that at this time men might presume farther upon the misknowledge of my meaning, to trouble this parliament of ours than were convenient.

"At my first coming, although I found but one religion, and that which by my self is professed, publicly allowed, and by the law maintained; yet found I another sort of religion, besides a private Sect, lurking within the bowels of this nation. The first is the true religion, which by me is professed, and by the law is established: the second is, the falsely called Catholics, but truly Papists: the third, which I call a Sect, rather than a Religion, is the Puritans and Novelists, who do not so far differ from us in points of religion, as in their confused form of policy and purity, being ever discontented with the present government, and impatient to suffer any superiority, which makes their feet unable to be suffered, in any well-governed common-wealth. But as for my course towards them, I remit it to my Proclamations made upon that subject.

"And now for the Papists, I must put a difference betwixt my own private profession of mine own salvation, and my politick government of the realm, for the wealth and quietness thereof. As for mine own profession, you have me your head now amongst you, of the same religion that the body is of: As I am no stranger to you in blood, no more am I a stranger to you in faith, or in the matters concerning the house of God. And although this my profession be according to mine education, wherein, I thank God, I sucked the milk of God's truth, with the milk of my nurse; yet do I here protest unto you, that I would never, for such a conceit of constancy, or other prejudicate opinion, have so humbly kept my first profession, if I had not found it agreeable to all reason, and to the rule of my conscience. But I was never violent, nor unreasonable in my profession: I acknowledge the Roman Church to be our mother church, although distressed with some infirmities and corruptions, as the Jews were, when they crucified Christ. And as I am none enemy to the life of a sick man, because I would have his body purged of ill humours; no more am I enemy to their Church, because I would have them reform their errors, not willing the down-throwing of the temple, but that it might be purged, and cleansed from corruption; otherwise how can they wish us to enter, if their house be not first clean? But as I would be loth to dispense in the least point of mine own conscience, for any worldly respect, than the foolishlest Precisian of them all; so would I be as sorry to strait the politick government of the bodies and minds of all my subjects to my private opinions: Nay, my mind was ever so free from persecution, or thralling of my subjects in matters of conscience, as I hope those of that profession within this kingdom, have a proof since my coming, that I was so far from encreasing their burthens with Religious, as I have so much, as either time, occasion, or law could permit, lightened them. And even now at this time, have I been careful to revise and consider deeply upon the laws made against them, That some overture might be proposed to the present Parliament, for clearing these laws by reason, (which is the soul of the law,) in case they have been in times past further, or more rigorously extended by judges,

“ than the meaning of the law was, or might tend to the hurt “ as well of the innocent, as of guilty persons. And as to the “ persons of my subjects which are of that profession, I “ must divide them into two ranks, Clericks and Laicks;
 “ for the part of the Laicks, certainly I ever thought them “ far more excusable than the other sort, because that sort “ of religion contained such an ignorant, doubtful, and im“ plicit kind of faith in the Laicks, grounded upon their “ church, as except they do generally believe whatsoever
 “ their teachers please to affirm, they cannot be thought “ guilty of these particular points of heresies and corrupti“ ons, which their teachers do so wilfully profess. And “ again, I must sub-divide the same Laicks into two ranks, “ that is, either quiet and well-minded men, peaceable “ subjects, who either being old, have retained their first “ drunken in liquor, upon a certain shamefacedness to be “ thought curious, or changeable; or being young men, “ through evil educations, have never been nursed or brought “ up but upon such venom, instead of wholesome nutriment:
 “ And that sort of people, I would be sorry to punish their “ bodies for the error of their minds, the reformation “ whereof must only come of God, and the true Spirit.
 “ But the other rank of Laicks, who either through curi“ osity, affectation of novelties, or discontentment in their “ private humours, have changed their coats, only to be “ factious stirrers of sedition, and perturbors of the Com“ mon-wealth; Their backwardness in their religion gi“ veth a ground to me, (their magistrate) to take the better “ heed to their proceedings, and to correct their obduracy.
 “ But for the part of the Clericks, I must directly say “ and affirm, that as long as they maintain one special “ point of their Doctrine, and another point of their Prac“ tice, they are no way sufferable to remain in this King“ dom. Their point of Doctrine is, that arrogant and “ ambitious supremacy of their head the Pope, whereby
 “ he not only claims to be spiritual head of all Christians,
 “ but also to have an imperial civil power over all Kings “ and Emperors, dethroning and decrowning Princes with “ his foot as pleaseth him, and dispensing and disposing of “ all kingdoms and empires at his appetite. The other “ point which they observe in continual practice is, the “ assassinations and murders of Kings; thinking it no sin, “ but rather a matter of salvation, to do all actions of re“ bellion and hostility against their natural Sovereign Lord,
 “ if he be once cursed, his subjects discharged of their fide“ lity, and his kingdom given a prey, by that three-“ crowned monarch, or rather monster, their head. And “ in this point I have no occasion to speak further here, “ saving, That I could wish from my heart, that it would “ please God to make me one of the members of such a general “ Christian union in religion, as laying wilfulness aside on “ both hands, we might meet in the midst, which is the centre “ and perfection of all things. For if they would leave, and “ be ashamed of such new and gross corruptions of theirs, as “ themselves cannot maintain, nor deny to be worthy of reformation, “ I would for my own part be content to meet them in “ the mid-way, so that all novelties might be renounced on ei“ ther side. For as my Faith is the true, ancient, catho-“ lick and apostolick Faith, grounded upon the scriptures
 “ and expres word of God; so will I ever yield all reve“ rence to antiquity, in the points of ecclesiastical policy:
 “ And by that means shall I ever, with God's grace, keep “ my self from either being an heretic in faith, or schis“ matick in matters of policy.
 “ But of one thing would I have the Papists of this “ Land to be admonished, that they presume not so much “ upon my lenity, (because I would be loth to be thought “ a persecutor) as thereupon to think it lawful for them “ daily to encrease their number and strength in this “ Kingdom; whereby, if not in my time, at least in the “ time of my posterity, they might be in hope to erect “ their Religion again. No, let them assure themselves, “ that as I am a friend to their persons, if they be good “ subjects; so I am a vowed enemy, and do denounce “ mortal war to their errors. And that as I would be “ sorry to be driven by their ill behaviour, from the pro“ tection and conservation of their bodies and lives; so “ will I never cease, as far as I can, to tread down their “ errors and wrong opinions. For I could not permit the “ increase and growing of their Religion, without first be“ traying of my self and mine own conscience: Secondly,
 “ this whole Isle, as well the part I am come from, as
 “ the part I remain in; in betraying their Liberties, and “ reducing them to the former slavish yoke, which both “ had casten off before I came amongst them; and thirdly, “ the liberty of the Crown in my posterity, which I should “ leave again under a new slavery, having found it left “ free to me by my predecessors. And therefore would I “ wish all my good subjects that are deceived with that “ corruption, first, if they find any beginning of inflic“ tion in themselves of knowledge, and love to the truth, “ to foster the same by all lawful means, and to beware of “ quenching the spirit that worketh within them. And “ if they can find as yet no motion tending that way, to “ be studious to read and confer with learned Men, and “ to use all such means as may further their reformation; “ assuring themselves, that as long as they are disconform“ able in Religion from us, they cannot be but half my “ subjects, be able to do but half service, and I to want

 “ the best half of them, which is their Souls.

“ And here I take occasion to speak to you my Lords
 “ the Bishops; for as you my Lord of Durham said very “ learnedly to day in your Sermon, Correction without In“ struction is but a tyranny: So ought you, and all the “ Clergy under you, to be more careful, vigilant, and di“ ligent, than you have been to win Souls to God, as “ well by your exemplary life as doctrine. And since “ you see how careful they are, sparing neither labour, “ pains, nor extrem peril of their persons, to pervert,
 “ (the Devil is so busy a Bishop,) ye should be the more “ careful and wakeful in your charges. Follow the rule “ prescribed to you by St. Paul, Be ye careful to exhort “ and instruct, in season, and out of season: And where “ you have been any way sluggish before, now waken “ yourselves up again with a new diligence in this point, “ remitting the success to God, who calling them either “ at the second, third, tenth, or twelfth hour, as they are “ alike welcome to him, so shall they be to me his Lieu“ tenant here.

“ The third reason of my convening you at this time, “ which containeth such actions of my thankfulness to“ wards you, as I may either do, or leave undone, yet “ shall, with God's grace, ever press to perform all the “ days of my life. It consists in these two points, in “ making of laws at certain times, which is only at such “ times as this, in Parliament; or in the careful execution “ thereof at all other times. As for the making of them, “ I will thus far faithfully promise unto you, that I will “ ever prefer the weal of the body, and of the whole “ Commonwealth, in making of good Laws and Con“ stitutions, to any particular or private ends of mine, “ thinking ever the wealth and weal of the Common“ wealth to be my greatest weal, and worldly felicity:
 “ A point wherein a lawful King doth directly differ
 “ from a tyrant. But at this time I am only thus far “ to forewarn you in that point, that you beware to seek “ the making of too many Laws, for two especial rea“ sons: First, because in corruptissima Republica plurima “ leges: And the execution of good Laws is far more “ profitable in a Commonwealth, than to burden Men's “ memories with the making of too many of them. And “ next, because the making of too many Laws in one “ Parliament will bring in confusion, for lack of leisure “ wisely to deliberate before you conclude: For the Bi“ shop said well to day, that to deliberation would a large
 “ time be given; but to execution a greater promptness “ was required. As for the execution of good Laws, it “ hath been very wisely and honourably foreseen, and or“ dered by my Predecessors in this Kingdom, in planting
 “ such a number of Judges, and all sorts of Magistrates, “ in convenient places, for the execution of the same.
 “ And therefore must I now turn me to you that are “ Judges, and Magistrates under me, as mine eyes and “ ears in this case: I can say none otherwise to you, “ than as Ezekias the good King of Juda said to his “ Judges, *Remember that the Thrones you sit on are God's,
 “ and neither yours nor mine*. And that as you must be “ answerable to me, so must both you and I be answer“ able to God, for the due execution of our Offices.
 “ That place is no place for you to utter your Affec“ tions in; you must not there hate your foe, nor love “ your friend; fear the offence of the greater Party, or “ pity the misery of the meaner; ye must be blind, and “ not see distinctions of persons; handleless, nor receive “ bribes; but keep that just temper and mid-course in all “ your proceedings, that like a just balance, ye may nei“ ther sway to the right nor left-hand. Three principal “ qualities are required in you, Knowledge, Courage, and “ Sincerity; that you may discern with Knowledge, exe“ cute with Courage, and do both in upright Sincerity.
 “ And as for my part, I do vow and protest here in the “ presence of God, and of this honourable audience, I “ never shall be weary, nor omit no occasion wherein I “ may shew my carefulness of the execution of good Laws.
 “ And as I wish you that are Judges, not to be weary in “ your Office, in doing of it, so shall I never be weary, “ with God's grace, to take account of you, which is “ properly my calling.
 “ And thus having told you the three causes of my con“ vening of this Parliament, all three tending only to “ utter my thankfulness, but in divers forms; the first
 “ by word, the other two by action; I do confess, that “ when I have done, and performed all that in this speech
 “ I have promised, Inutilis servus sum. Inutile, because

"the meaning of the word Inutilis in that place of Scripture, is understood, that in doing all that service which we can to God, it is but our due, and we do nothing to God, but that which we are bound to do: and in like manner, when I have done all that I can for you, I do nothing but that, which I am bound to do, and am accountable to God upon the contrary. For I do acknowledge that the special and greatest point of difference that is betwixt a rightful King, and a usurping Tyrant, is in this; that whereas the proud and ambitious Tyrant doth think his Kingdom and People are only ordained for satisfaction of his desires and unreasonable appetites; the righteous and just King doth by the contrary acknowledge himself to be ordained for the procuring of the wealth and prosperity of his People, and that his greatest and principal worldly felicity must consist in their prosperity. If you be rich, I cannot be poor; if you be happy, I cannot but be fortunate; and I protest that your welfare shall ever be my greatest care and contentment. And that I am a servant is most true; that as I am head and governor of all the people in my dominions, who are my natural vassals and subjects, considering them in numbers and distinct ranks; so if we will take the whole people as one body and mass, then as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, so must a righteous King know himself to be ordained for his people, and not his people for him: for although King and people be relata, yet can he be no King if he want people and subjects: But there be many people in the world that lack a head; wherefore I will never be ashamed to confess it my principal honour, to be the great servant of the Common-Wealth; and ever think the prosperity thereof to be my greatest felicity, as I have already said.

"But as it was the whole body of this Kingdom, (with an uniform assent and harmony) as I told you in the beginning of my Speech, which did so far oblige me, in goodwill and thankfulness of requital by their alacrity and readiness in declaring and receiving me to that place which God had provided for me, and not any particular persons, (for then it had not been the body) so is my thankfulness due to the whole State. For even as in matters of faults, Quod à malis peccatur impune peccatur; even so in the matters of virtuous and good deeds, what is done by the willing consent and harmony of the whole body, no particular person can justly claim thanks, as proper to him for the fame: And therefore I must here make a little apology for my self, in that I could not satisfy the particular humours of every person that looked for some advancement or reward at my hand, since my entry into this Kingdom. Three kinds of things were craved of me, advancement to honour, preferment to place of credit about my person, and reward in matters of Land or Profit. If I had bestowed honour upon all, no man could have been advanced to honour; for the degrees of honour do consist in preferring some above their fellows: If every man had the like access to my Privy or Bed-chamber, then no man could have it, because it cannot contain all: And if I had bestowed lands and rewards upon every man, the fountain of my liberality would have been so exhausted and dried, as I would lack means to be liberal to any man: And yet was I not so sparing, but I may without vaunting affirm, that I have enlarged my favour in all the three degrees, towards as many, and more than ever King of England did, in so short a space. No, I rather crave your pardon, that I have been so bountiful: For, if the means of the Crown be wasted, I behoved then to have recourse to you my subjects, and be burdensome to you; which I would be lothest to be of any King alive. For as it is true, that as I have already said, it was a whole body which did deserve so well at my hand, and not every particular person of the people: yet were there some who by reason of their office, credit with the people, or otherwise, took occasion both before, and at the same time of my coming amongst you, to give proof of their love and affection towards me. Not that I am any way in doubt, that if other of my subjects, had been in their places, and had had the like occasion, but they would have uttered the like good effects, (so general and so great were the love and affection of you all towards me:) But yet this having been performed by some special persons, I could not without unthankfulness but requite them accordingly. And therefore had I just occasion to advance some in honour, some to places of service about me, and by rewarding to enable some who had deserved well of me, and were not otherwise able to maintain the ranks I thought them capable of, and others who although they had not particularly deserved before, yet I found them capable and worthy of place of preferment and credit, and not able to sustain those places for "which I thought them fit, without my help. Two especial causes moved me to be so open-handed, whereof the one was reasonable and honourable, but the other (I will not be ashamed to confess unto you) proceeded of mine own infirmity. That which was just and honourable, was, that being so far beholden to the body of the whole State, I thought I could not refuse to let run some small brooks out of the fountain of my thankfulness to the whole, for refreshing of particular persons that were members of that multitude. The other, which proceeded out of mine own infirmity, was, the multitude and importunity of suitors. But although reason come by infusion in a manner, yet experience groweth with time and labour: And therefore do I not doubt, but experience in time coming will both teach the particular subjects of this Kingdom, not to be so importune and undiscereet in craving; and me not to be so easily and lightly moved in granting, that which may be harmful to my estate, and consequently to the whole Kingdom.

"And thus having at length declared unto you my mind, in all the points for the which I called this Parliament, my conclusion shall only now be, to excuse my self, in case you have not found such eloquence in my Speech, as peradventure you might have looked for at my hands. I might, if I list, alledge the great weight of my affairs, and my continual business and distraction, that I could never have leisure to think upon what I was to speak, before I came to the place where I was to speak: And I might also alledge, that my first sight of this so famous and honourable an assembly, might likewise breed some impediment: But leaving these excuses, I will plainly and freely in my manner, tell you the true cause of it; which is, that it becometh a King, in my opinion, to use no other eloquence than plainness and sincerity. By plainness I mean, that his Speeches should be so clear, and void of all ambiguity, that they may not be thrown, nor rent asunder in contrary senses, like the old Oracles of the Pagan Gods: And by sincerity I understand, that uprightness and honesty which ought to be in a King's whole Speeches and Actions; that, as far as a King is in honour erected above any of his subjects, so far should he strive in sincerity to be above them all, and that his tongue should be ever the true messenger of his heart. And this sort of eloquence may you ever assuredly look for at my hands."

"This speech was not received with the applauses expected by the King. Besides the excessive length, several things were remarked which gave occasion for censure. In the first place, no body could tell what to make of his actions of thanks inseparably conjoined in his person, and containing two blessings, the first whereof was confined to these two points: 1. That having never had war with any of his neighbours, he inferred from thence that he brought peace with him every where. But it was no great wonder, he had not been hitherto in war with his neighbours, since Scotland has properly no neighbours but the English. 2. That without being solicited he had revoked the Letters of Mark against Spain. The other blessing of his actions of thanks consisted in the union in his person of the titles of the two Houses of Lancaster and York. Hence he would have insinuated, that by his accession to the throne of England, he freed the English from the dread of seeing a renewal of the civil wars occasioned by the titles of the two Houses. But this pretended dread was only a chimera of his own forming. Since Henry VIII, who much more justly united in his person the rights of the two contending Houses, the dread of a civil war had so disappeared, that it was entirely forgot. As for his efforts to show the great advantages which would accrue to England from the union of the two kingdoms, they were entirely vain, as will hereafter appear. Besides, his inferences from the arbitrary comparisons, of a head with a divided body, a husband with two wives, a shepherd with two flocks, seemed so little solid, that they were turned to ridicule. What he said about religion was displeasing to all. The Catholics were not satisfied with his distinctions. The Puritans were extremely offended, that he should positively say of them, "They were ever discontented with the present government, and impatient of any superiority, which made their sect insufferable in a well-governed Common-wealth." The Protestants in general remarked in his speech too great condescension for the Papists, and even contradiction in what he said about them. On the one hand, he affirmed, he was of the Church of England, and his faith grounded upon the Holy Scriptures. On the other hand, he was ready to lay aside all prejudice, and meet the Catholics half way. He declared himself a mortal enemy to their errors, but took care to intimate, that he confined, as I may say, these errors to the doctrine of the Pope's exorbitant power. Upon the other

1604. fort of actions of thanks, consisting in the making and executing of laws, 'twas said, that a King of England might extol his condescension concerning some particular law, made to his own detriment, and the nation's benefit: But no King before him ever pretended to lay an obligation upon his people, for giving his assent to such laws as were for his own and the kingdom's good. It was also observed, that he admonished the Parliament not to enact too many laws, as if he feared to be obliged to carry his pretended thankfulness too far. That as for the few good laws he was willing to admit, all the effects of his thankfulness consisted in giving the judges a very common and trivial charge. Finally, it was remarked, that this thankfulness upon which his whole speech turned, was as imaginary as the cause which produced it. In thanking the people of England for receiving and embracing him as their undoubted and lawful King and governor, he did not mean to declare that the people had made him so, but only that being undoubted King by his birth right, they had received and owned him as such. This was lessening the obligation, and consequently the thankfulness too. Wherefore it was thought by many, that the King's aim, in this long harangue, was not so much to express his thankfulness to the English, as to insinuate to them, that all he was obliged to them for, was, their not opposing his undoubted right: that his chief intention was, to obtain of the Parliament the union of the two kingdoms; to prevent any new laws against the Papists, and to have the execution of those already in force left to him. What was only conjectured at first, became certain afterwards, as the King's intentions were discovered. In this very Parliament therefore, a suspicion and jealousy of the King began to be entertain'd by the people. This also put the House of Commons upon their guard, and made them carefully weigh the King's words and actions, who notwithstanding the maxims laid down in the conclusion of his speech, was a great master in the art of chusing ambiguous expressions. This must always be remembered, in order to understand the events of this reign.

The first thing the Parliament did, was to prepare an act for acknowledging the King's title to the crown of England. James had not required it. On the contrary, in all appearance, by repeating several times in his speech, that he was undoubted King by birth-right, he designed to intimate, he did not want the Parliament's confirmation. But if this was his intent, the two Houses did not, or seem'd not to understand it, whether they resolv'd to preserve a privilege hitherto enjoyed, or feared such an omission might occasion troubles and rebellions. The King on his part thought it not prudent to refuse the act.

After the Parliament had considered of some other affairs, they appointed commissioners to examine the King's proposal concerning the union of the two kingdoms. But the King had already obstructed it, by lavishing honours and riches upon his Scotch courtiers. This convinc'd the English, they could not but lose by a union, whose end, as they believed, was to render the Scots partakers of the riches of England, whereas the English had nothing to expect in Scotland. (1.) Hence the King's speech was censured, where he spoke of Scotland as the one half of the island, though the English were persuaded, there was a great inequality between England and Scotland. The eager pursuit of the Scots after places, pensions, and rich matches, rais'd the jealousy of the English, and rendered them very averse to the union projected by the King. With these dispositions the commissioners met to examine the advantages and inconveniences, in order to make their report to the two Houses (2.)

Whilst this affair was in hand, most people could not forbear showing discontent with regard to religion. The Catholics expected greater favours from a Prince, whom they imagin'd in their interest. His distinctions between the Clericks and Laicks, between those who ascrib'd to the Pope an unlimited power, and such as received not that doctrine, made them fear, the advantages they had promised themselves in this new Reign would be very inconsiderable. The Presbyterians were enraged to see the King so openly prefer the Papists before them. All the Protestants in general heard with grief, the advances made by the King to the Papists. Especially, the offer of meeting them half way, and the affectation of condemning only a single Tenet, gave occasion to fear, he had indeed the sentiments he was suspected of in Scotland. What means, said they, his offer to the Papists of meeting them half way, upon their renouncing the doctrines repugnant to the regal authority? Where is this half way to be? Does it relate to the Hierarchy? But if the Pope's authority is not received, there will be no difference between the English and Catholic Church.

Does he reckon the Catholics will have come half way, when they have renounced the Pope's exorbitant power? If so, we must, in order to go the other half, yield them the rest of the Articles, which were the cause of our separation. In a word, it was not known how far this offer was to extend, or where to stop, to obfuscate and doubtful was this expression, though he had declared, he would use no other eloquence than Plainness and Sincerity.

the zealous Church of England-men, were alone plac'd, because the King seem'd bent not to suffer the Puritan, who were no less odious to them than the begotting Papist.

It is certain, their zeal for the Church of England was carried a little too far, and the King, by declaring himself so plainly a sworn enemy to the Puritan, bred a mutual enmity between the two Parties, which was but too much cherish'd, and which, at another time, prov'd fatal to the established Church. The Puritans were so offend'd at the uncharitableness for them, and the great condescension to the Papists, that they did not scruple to charge the King, the Bishops, and the zealous Episcopalians, with being so many popish agents. Amidst these divisions, the King's emissaries had but too many opportunities to foment the animosity of the two Parties, and carry it to the utmost height, knowing they could not better execute their designs, than when the Kingdom was involved in troubles. It is pretended, at this time many Jesuits, with their Superiors permission, were received, some as Presbyterian Ministers, others as Church of England Priests, and that under these disguises, they so stretch'd the principles of the two Parties, whether in their writings or in their sermons, that the breach was rendered irreparable.

At the same time, those who approach'd the King's person, both English and Scots, thought only of making their Court, in order to obtain his Good-graces and Favours. The jealousy between the two Nations help'd to strain the flattery used by the whole Court to the King. Every one strove to keep in his esteem by whatever was most grateful to him, and nothing was more so, than to be extol'd for his Learning and Parts, and to hear the royal authority talk'd of according to his principles. It was some time, before the people had a clear knowledge of this Prince's Genius and Character; but when he was once well known, the esteem at first entertain'd of him, very sensibly diminish'd, to which the King himself greatly contributed by his strange conduct, as will hereafter appear.

The principal affair for which the King had summon'd the Parliament was, the union of the two Kingdoms, though he pretended, his sole motive was to express his thankfulness to the English. He had so good an opinion of his Eloquence, that he did not question the success of this affair, and the nomination of the Commissioners for that purpose confirm'd his belief. So, whether through impatience, or to engage the Parliament the sooner to unite the two Kingdoms, he order'd himself to be proclaimed King of Great-Britain, without staying for the Parliament's determination. From thenceforward he would hear no more of the distinction of the two Kingdoms. St. Andrew's Cross was quarter'd with St. George's in the Flags, and by Proclamation the Scottish Coins were made current in England. This shew'd, the King did not doubt, the affair of the Union would succeed to his wish. But he did not yet know the Genius and Character of the English. Such as had no share in his Bounties, loudly murmur'd to see his Scotch Attendants grown so rich in a very short space, that the English could not imitate their magnificence without ruining their Estates (3.) Several Passquils were daily made upon this occasion, not much to the advantage of the Scots, nor consequently to the design of the Union of the two Kingdoms.

There was also another thing which did not render the people favorable to the King. This was an occasion of discontent given to the House of Commons, and which it will be necessary to mention, in order to show this Prince's Idea of the English Constitution, and the just cause he gave the Commons to fear, he design'd to invade their Privileges. Immediately after the opening of the Parliament, the Commons examining, according to custom, the contested Elections, there was a debate in the House about the return of Sir Francis Goodwin, and Sir John Fortescue, for Knight of the Shire for the County of Bucks, and upon a full hearing, Sir Francis was declared duly elected. Three days after, the Lords sent a message to the Commons, that there might be a conference about Goodwin's election. The Commons surpris'd at so extraordinary a message, answer'd, They did not think themselves oblig'd to give an account of their proceedings, and therefore could

The Lords replied, The King having been acquainted with what had passed in Goodwin's case; thought himself engaged in honour to have the affair debated again, and had ordered them to confer with the Commons upon it. Whereupon, the Commons, by their Speaker, gave their reasons to the King, why they could not admit of this innovation. But all they could obtain was, that instead of a conference with the Lords, the King commanded them to confer with the Judges. This pleased them no more than the other. They set down their reasons in writing, and delivered them at the Council-Chamber, to desire their Lordships to intercede for them to the King, not to violate their Privileges. The answer was, The King absolutely commanded them to have a conference with the Judges. The Commons were extremely surprized at so absolute an order. Mean while, fearing to be accused of too easily engaging in a quarrel with the King, they thought it more proper to yield, than stand out, fully bent however to adhere to what had been determined in the case of the contested Election. Certainly the King had engaged in a very nice affair, and probably, would not have come off with honour, had he not been diligently by Goodwin's moderation. Sir Francis chusing to forfeit his right rather than occasion a quarrel between the King and the Commons, desired the House to order the County of Bucks to elect another Knight in his stead. The King and Commons equally accepted of this expedient, which prevented them from coming to extremities; but the King found from hence, that no great account was made of the Proclamation upon calling the Parliament, whereby he meant to be master of the Elections.

The Commons perceived by this affair, that the King's intention was to found them, and that hereafter such incidents might frequently be revived. For which reason, on the 16th of June, addressing the King concerning certain Grievances, they took occasion to represent their Privileges, of which they supposed him not yet fully informed. This address so displeased the King, that on the 7th of July, he prorogued the Parliament to the 7th of February, to have time to think of means to humble the Commons (1).

It is certain, most of those who approached the King, laboured to inspire him with the design of rendering himself absolute, or rather to confirm him in this resolution, by which they perfectly made their Court. Besides, arbitrary power is as advantageous to Ministers and Courtiers, as it is prejudicial to the rest of the nation. Several Authors accuse the Bishops of having been of the number of the flatterers. Perhaps matters have been a little aggravated. However, many things give occasion to believe, that the Clergy of the Church of England were inclined to ascribe to the King, more power than his Predecessors had hitherto enjoyed. At least, it is certain that from the reign of James I. to this present time, many of the Clergy have endeavoured to perfwade the people, that they ought to acknowledge in the Sovereign an unlimited authority (2), and have extended Passive Obedience in England as far as in the most arbitrary Monarchies.

Bancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, a most zealous assertor of the Prerogative-Royal, was one of the first who attempted to go beyond the usual bounds, by causing things to depend on the King's will, which were undeniably within the Parliament's jurisdiction. He exhibited to the King and Council twenty five grievances of the Clergy (3), which were desired to be returned in granting Prohibitions, that the King's Courts might not have cognizance of what concerned these Articles. It is said, his intention was to show others the way to apply directly to the King, without regarding the Parliament or Convocation. But the King was told, in case he granted the Archbishop's request, he would be engaged in inextricable difficulties, because the redressing of Grievances had ever belonged to the Parliament. Whereupon, the King consulted the Judges, who answered unanimously; he ought to refrain from deciding any thing concerning the Archbishop's request.

The conclusion of the Peace with Spain soon followed the prorogation of the Parliament. Taxis having informed the King of Spain how the Court of England stood affected, the Constable of Castile was sent into the Low-Countries, with orders to pass into England and conclude the Peace. But the Constable being detained by some affairs in the Netherlands, conveyed his power to Taxis and Richardot. These two Deputies being come to London (4), agreed upon a Treaty, which was not however signed till the 18th of August, after the arrival of the Constable of Castile. Some say, this Ambassador purchased the Peace with large sums of money, distributed among the King's Ministers. But this can only be said by conjecture, those who are entrusted with such sort of intrigues, not being used to discover them (5). However this be, the Treaty with the King of Spain was double, there being one relating entirely to Commerce.

"By the IVth Article of the first Treaty it was agreed, Coke, p. 56
"That neither the Kings of England nor Spain, should "directly or indirectly, give aid to the Enemies or Rebels
"of either part, of what nature or condition soever they "were.

"By the Vth, They renounced all former Leagues, Confederacies, Capitulations, and Intelligences contrary to that Treaty.

"In the VIIth, King James excuses the delivery of Coke, p. 57
"the cautionary Towns to the King of Spain; and promises to enter into a Treaty with the States, wherein
"he will assign a competent time to them, to accept and "receive Terms for a Pacification with the Archduke;
"which if they refused, he would from thenceforth think
"himself freed from the former conventions with them."

These, doubtless, are the Articles which have given occasion to say, the Spaniards bought the Peace. It does not however appear, that after this Treaty James withdrew his Troops from the Service of the States, as he should have done by virtue of the IVth Article, nor that he fixed a time for the States to make a Peace, pursuant to the VIIth. On the contrary, it will be seen, that he delivered to them the cautionary Towns for a much less sum than was agreed on with Elizabeth. Moreover, Andrew du Chesne, in his History of England, speaking of this Treaty, relates only four Articles, whereof the fourth is directly contrary to the forementioned fourth Article. According to that Historian the Article ran:

"That as to the States of Holland and Zealand, things Du Chesne
"should remain as they were, as well with respect to the cautionary Towns, as to the other Articles of the Treaties between Elizabeth and the said States, without the King of England's being obliged to recall his Troops from the Low-Countries; or to forbid his Subjects to serve the said States. Moreover, that the Commerce, Trade and Navigation between the English and the said States should continue upon the same foot as in Elizabeth's life-time.

This contrariety makes me think, that James, to please the Spaniard and the Archduke, was perfwaded to agree, that the fourth Article should be inserted in the Treaty in the manner first mentioned, in order to induce the States to hasten a Peace, and that this same Article, as related by Du Chesne, was a restriction of the first, or a secret Article, which was alone to take place. This is so common a thing in Treaties, that this Conjecture cannot be considered as groundless, especially as it is confirmed by the event.

The Peace with Spain being concluded, the King was perfwaded to grant a Monopoly of the Trade with Spain and Italy to a Company of Merchants, and to forbid all his Subjects, except such as were authorized by this Com-

only, to traffick in those Countries. But in the next Session of the Parliament, the Commons taking into consideration how destructive to trade such a Monopoly was, represented so plainly to the King the ill consequences thereof, that the Company's Patent was revoked, and the trade with Spain and Italy declared free as before.

During the rest of the year 1604 nothing remarkable befell England. The King led a peaceable life amidst the flatteries of his Court, and very lavishly bestowed his favours on his Minions. But this liberality bred a great discontent in those who had no share in it, and thought themselves however no less worthy than the others. Queen Elizabeth took a very different method, but James did not think fit to be her imitator. Never were Honours bestowed with less discretion and more profusion than in this Reign. Accordingly, they were no longer considered as the reward of merit but only of adulation (1).

The Town of Ostend besieged now three years by the Spaniards, was at last forced to capitulate the 20th of September. By the taking of this place the Conquerors gained only heaps of ruins, which had cost them immense sums and the loss of numberless Officers and Soldiers (2). Before James concluded the Peace with Spain, he seemed willing to concern himself in the preservation of Ostend: but when the Peace was made, he thought only of strengthening his new friendship with the King of Spain and the Archduke, by sending them Ambassadors.

The King made choice of his High-Admiral the Earl of Nottingham for Ambassador extraordinary to Spain. The Earl departed in March 1605, with a very numerous retinue, consisting, according to some, of no less than six hundred and fifty persons (3).

At the same time, the Earl of Hertford was sent in Embassy to Brussels. Whilst he was at Sea, a Dutch Man of War sailed by, and refusing to strike, the English Captain [Sir William Monson] prepared to compel him, but the Ambassador would not give him leave. This was the first indignity of that nature received by England from the Dutch, whose Sovereignty was not yet so much as acknowledged by any potentate in Europe. If James had demanded reparation, doubtless, he might easily have obtained it, considering the then circumstances of the United Provinces. But very likely, he did not think it worth his while to make a noise about an affair of so little importance. The English however murmured at it, and many took occasion to compare the King's insolence with Elizabeth's spirit, who, doubtless, would not have been so easy under such an affront. James gave himself no trouble about it, believing that to avoid all occasion of rupture with his Neighbours was a more effectual way to procure his own and the Nation's welfare, than to engage in a war for such a trifle.

The jealousy, the English began to conceive of the Hollanders, was nothing in comparison of that caused by the King's prodigal favours to the Scots (4). Most Historians accuse the Catholics of cherishing this jealousy between the two Nations, to make an advantage of their divisions. But without being forced to recur to so remote a cause, the old enmity between the two Kingdoms, and the King's inclination for the Scots, were in my opinion much more natural causes of it. The King was no stranger to this jealousy, and used some endeavours to allay it. He ordered this year in England, Thomas Douglas, a Scotchman, to be hanged, for counterfeiting the King's Privy-Seal to several Princes of Germany. This man falling into the hands of the Elector Palatine, who discovered the fraud, was sent into England, where he met with his desert.

Hitherto the King was undisturbed and surrounded with plenty: whereas he had spent in Scotland, the first years of his life in troubles and want. Since his accession to the throne of England, he had not been obliged to ask money of his Parliament, because when he came to the Crown, he found the deceased Queen had not yet touched the subsidy granted her by the Parliament, amounting to three hundred thousand pounds Sterling, which he had entirely received. This, with his usual Revenues, enabled him to be liberal to his Favorites of both nations, who quickly grew very rich. On the other hand, he took a pleasure in raising to honors and dignities several persons, who would not have aspired to them in Elizabeth's reign. In short, he saw himself incessantly flattered by his Courtiers, who omitted no opportunities to show how much they admired his wisdom and all his other virtues. This was a necessary method, to acquire his favour. To say all in a word, he led a very soft and peaceable life, in the midst of plenty and pleasures, to which some pretend he was a little too much addicted (5). But this Prince has had the misfortune to have for Historians such as loved him not, as on the other side, he has had the good fortune to have some who have endeavoured to praise all his actions. So, there is danger of being greatly mistaken, if an idea of his character is formed upon the commendations or invectives of his Historians. It is better to keep solely to the examination of his actions themselves.

Whilst every thing seemed to procure King James a quiet and peaceable Reign, the devil, envying the happiness of the English, inspired some of his Agents with one of the most horrible Plots that ever was heard of. I mean the Gunpowder-Treason-Plot, which has made so much noise in the world, and of which I shall relate the particulars, without any aggravation.

Whatever might be the ground of the hopes entertained by the Catholics, when they saw King James ascend the throne of England, it is certain they expected great things from him, and at least a full Toleration, with liberty of publicly exercising their Religion. Upon this Toleration they built their hopes of restoring by degrees their Religion in England. But the King's Speech to the Parliament discovered two things. The first, that this Toleration, which till then had been hardly doubted, was not yet ready to come. The second, that though they should obtain it of the King, it would not be for such as acknowledged the Pope's authority in its utmost extent. These were the men however that were most active and eager to re-establish their Religion in the Kingdom. They despised a bare liberty of Conscience for the moderate Catholics, to which the King seemed to confine his favours. They believed it to be the King's intention to divide the Catholics, and make two Sects, whereof one, renouncing the doctrine of the Pope's Supremacy, should be tolerated in the Kingdom, and the other expelled. This division appeared to them so destructive to the Catholic Religion, that they imagined, the King by this artful and politic conduct, intended to reconcile to the Church of England, such as should imprudently reject the papal authority, as it happened in the Reign of Henry VIII.

To prevent the execution of this pretended design, which might be very prejudicial to the Church of Rome, some of these Zealots consulted together, and formed a horrible Plot, which was afterwards approved by the rest. The chief of these wretches was Robert Catesby, a Gentleman of Northamptonshire, descended from the Catesbys mentioned in the Reign of Edward V. This man having gained Thomas Percy the Earl of Northumberland's Countess, John Grant, Ambrose Rowland, James Christopher Wright, Francis Triggam, Guy Fawkes, Sir Everard Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter (6), Thomas Bates, and Robert Keyes, chose five of them to consult how to restore the Romish Religion in England. Percy one of the most zealous, proposed killing the King, and offered to perform it. To this Catesby replied, "though the King was dead, their cause would not be advanced, since he would leave Sons, who perhaps would not be more favorable to the Catholics. Nay, supposing the King and his Children were removed, there would remain so many of the nobles and gentry, that probably it would be very difficult to accomplish their design." He added, "he had thought of a way to destroy in an instant, almost all the principal enemies of the Catholic Religion, and to throw the Kingdom into such a conflagration, that not a man would be able to take proper measures to oppose 1605. "the execution of their designs." This way was to blow up the Parliament House (1), whilst the King should be speaking his speech from the throne to the Lords and Commons. Then he showed them in what manner the project might be executed, and was applauded by all. However, as so detestable a Plot could not but breed ideas frightful and naturally shocking to conscience, some moved to have the lawfulness of the project examined by their Divines. It is said, that Henry Garnet, Oswald Tjefmend, and John Gerard being consulted, approved of the Plot as just and lawful, since it was against excommunicated Heretics. I cannot warrant this, because I never saw their trials. But thus much is certain, they suffered death for not discovering the Conspiracy of which they were informed, and the King in an apology published some time after, affirmed, that Garnet was legally convicted, and had confessed his crime (2).

Be this as it will, the thing being determined, they took an oath of Secrecy, administered as it is said by Father Garnet (3). Then Percy being one of the Gentlemen-Pensioners, was appointed to hire a house, adjoining to the Upper-House of Parliament. This passed in November or December 1604, and the King was to make his speech to the Parliament on the 7th of February. Percy having hired the house, the Conspirators began with no small labour to dig in the cellar through the wall of partition, which was very thick (4). But as the Parliament was prorogued to the 3d. of October, they had as much time as was necessary to finish their work. In the beginning of February 1605, they had almost digged through the wall, when on a sudden they heard a noise on the other side. This threw them into a great fright, being apprehensive of a discovery, but their courage reviving, Guy Fawkes, who passed for Percy's footman, was sent to see what had occasioned their fear. Presently after he returned and said, the place from whence the noise came, was a large Cellar under the Upper-House of Parliament, full of Sea-Coals, which were now under Sale, and the Cellar offered to be let. As nothing could be more favorable to their design, Percy immediately hired the Cellar, and bought the remainder of the Coals. Then he sent for thirty-six barrels of Powder from Holland, and lodging them at Lambeth, caused them to be conveyed in the night into the Cellar, and covered with coals and faggots (5).

The Plot being thus in a fair way, it was considered what was to be done, when the King, Prince Henry his eldest Son, the Lords and Commons, should be buried in the ruins of the Parliament-House. The Duke of York the King's second son, being yet very young was not to be present at the Parliament, and the Princess Elizabeth his sister was educated at a house belonging to the Lord Harrington in Warwickshire. It was resolved therefore, that Percy who had free admittance into the King's Palace, should undertake to kill the Duke of York (6), and that others, under colour of a hunting-match should meet on the same day, near the Lord Harrington's house, and secure the Princess Elizabeth. As all this could not be effected without money, Trybam offered two thousand pounds Sterling, Digby fifteen hundred, and Percy promised to supply four thousand. Some moved for foreign aid beforehand: but the motion was rejected. It was resolved only to demand assistance of France, Spain, and the Arch-Duke, when the Plot should be executed. Then, after some consultation, they agreed to save the Princess Elizabeth, and proclaim her Queen. To this end, they drew up a Proclamation, taking care to insert nothing concerning Religion, for fear of alarming the people, till they were sufficiently strong to execute all their designs. Finally, they resolved to spread a report after the blow should be given, that the Puritans were the authors of it.

The Parliament being farther prorogued to the 5th of November, the Conspirators expected the day with the utmost impatience, not one being touched with remorse of the Crime they were going to commit. But God abhorring so detestable a Plot, inspired one of the Conspirators with a desire to save [William Parker] Lord Montague, Son of the Lord Marley. This Lord going home about seven in the evening, a letter was given him by his servant who received it from an unknown person, with a charge to deliver it into his master's own hand. The letter was without name [or date], (7) and expressed in these words: D

My L O R D,

O W I of the Love I beare to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation. Therefore I would advise you, as you tender your Life, to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this Parliament. For God and Man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. And thinke not slightly of this Advertisement, but retire yourself into your Country, where you may expect the event in safety. For though there be no appearance of any stirre, yet I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This Councell is not to be contemned, because it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme; for the danger is past so soon as you burne the Letter. And I hope God will give you the Grace to make good use of it: To whose Holy Protection I commend you.

This Letter was delivered to the Lord Montague ten days before the meeting of the Parliament. Tho' it was unintelligible to him, nay, tho' he imagined it only an artifice to frighten him, he carried it that very evening to the Earl of Salisbury, principal Secretary of State. The Earl showed it to some Privy Counsellors, who understood the meaning of it no more than he (8). However, they resolved to do nothing till the King's return, who was then at Royston.

The King returning to London the last day of October, the Earl of Salisbury read the Letter to him, [on the morrow,] and concluded that it was written by some fool or madman. To convince the King he repeated this Sentence, The danger is past so soon as you have burnt the Letter. For, said he, if the danger be past when the Letter is burnt, what signifies this warning? But the King ordering the Letter to be read again, explained the words otherwise, and said, so soon as you have burnt the Letter, was to be interpreted, in as short a Space as you shall take to burn the Letter. Then comparing this Sentence with the foregoing, That they should receive a terrible Blow this Parliament, and yet should not see who burnt them, he concluded that some sudden Blow was preparing by means of Gun-powder (9). This interpretation being deemed very plausible, it was resolved, that all the rooms and cellars adjoining to the Parliament-House should be searched, to see whether there was any powder concealed. This search was however deferred till the day before the meeting of the Parliament, in a belief, that the nearer the execution was, the more signs would be found. The Earl of Suffolk Lord Chamberlain, went himself to search, without noise or hurry (10). When he came to the cellar where the powder was, and saw the coals and faggots with which it was cover'd, he asked [Whyneard] the Keeper of the Wardrobe, who attended him, to what use he had put the cellar? Whyneard answer'd, Mr. Percy had hired it, and very probably the coals and wood were the Gentleman's fuel for winter. At the same time the Lord Chamberlain perceiving a man standing in a corner, asked who he was, and being told he was Mr. Percy's servant, did not seem to take any farther notice (11). This affected negligence made the Conspirators think

See State-Trials.

(4) It was about three years thick. They that worked in this Mine, were, Percy, Cateley, Thomas and Robert Winter, John and Christopher Wright, and Fawkes. They began to work Decemb. 11, and about Gandemass had worked the Wall half through. They all seven lay in the Hole, and had diet and powder, being resolved to die rather than yield or be taken. They had provided themselves with baked Meats, to have the less occasion for feeding out; and they went in at night, and were never seen. Fawkes's and Winter's Confess.

(5) They put in at first but twenty Barrels, but fearing they might be caught, they added fifteen more. There were a thousand Bibles, and five hundred faggots to cover them. Winter's Confess. In their indictment it is said, they put in thirty Barrels and four Highgates of Gun-powder, and also a great great Iron Bars and Stones. State-Trials.

(6) He, and another Gentleman, were to enter into the Duke's Chamber without suspicion; and having about a dozen others at several doors to expect him coming, and two or three on horseback at the Court-gate to receive him, he was to carry the Duke safe away, as soon as the Parliament House was blown up. Winter's Confess.

Discourse of
the Treason.

The Earl of Suffolk having made his report to the Council, it was thought if there was any powder concealed, it was in the large cellar under the faggots and coals. But as the Parliament was to meet on the morrow, it was resolved not to search under the wood till midnight, in hopes to find in or about the cellar some persons from whom information might be had. Pursuant to this resolution, Sir Thomas Knivet, Gentleman of the Privy-Chamber, and Justice of Peace for Westminster, going to the cellar about midnight, found at the door a man in a cloak and boots, whom he immediately apprehended (1). This was Guy Fawkes who passed for Percy's Servant (2). Then causing the wood and coals to be removed, they found underneath, thirty-six barrels of Powder. After this discovery, Fawkes being searched, there was found upon him a dark lantern, a tinder-box, and three matches (3). The villain, instead of being dismayed, boldly told them, if he had been taken within the cellar, he would have blown up himself and them together. The King being acquainted with the discovery (4), ordered the Prisoner to be examined concerning the circumstances of the Plot. He confessed the design was to blow up the King and Parliament, and expressed great sorrow that it was not done, saying, it was the devil and not God that was the discoverer. He obstinately refused all that day to name any of his Complices; but on the morrow being showed the rack confessed all he knew.

the Treason.

The opening of the Parliament, which was to be the same day, being deferred, and the news of the Conspiracy beginning to spread in London, Cateby, Percy, Winter, and the two Wrights, fled by several ways to their Companions, who were to secure the Princess Elizabeth. These last were ready to execute their design the moment they should hear of the success of the Mine at Westminster. As they did not question it would succeed to their wish, and believed they had nothing more to manage, they had the night before broke open a stable, and carried away twelve horses (5). This action had alarmed [Sir Richard Verney] Sheriff of the County, who had drawn the people together to seize the robbers. Presently after came the Conspirators that fled from London, and told their Companions, the plot had miscarried. Whereupon they resolved to keep together, to endeavour to make the Catholics rise, and put themselves at their head. But all their efforts ended only in raising about a hundred Horse (6).

Mean while, the Sheriffs of the neighbouring Counties (7) having sent notice to one another, called the people to arms, and pursued the Conspirators from place to place, till at length the villains were forced to take harbour at Ishbach (8), where the Sheriff summoned them to surrender. They answered, he had not a sufficient force to compel them, and prepared to defend themselves, or fight their way through. But in opening a barrel of powder to charge their muskets, it took fire and blew up part of the house (9). This accident constrained them to open the gate, and try to escape. Some were killed immediately by the people who surrounded them. Cateby, Percy, and Winter standing back to back, fought desperately, till the two first were killed with one shot, and the other taken alive, after receiving several wounds. Digby, Rookwood, Grant, and Bates, yielded, or were taken in trying to escape. Tresham, who staid at London with Robert Winter, Brother of Thomas Winter, and Littleton, was discovered and apprehended with his two Companions. All the prisoners were sent to the Tower, and strictly examined. Thomas Winter confessed himself guilty, and writ his Confession with his own hand. Digby extenuated his crime, because having expected the King would grant a free Toleration to the Catholics, and not seeing any likelihood of their obtaining it, he was driven by despair to ingage in the plot. Tresham said at first, that Father Garnet the Jesuit was privy to the Conspiracy, but afterwards denied it, by his wife's instigation, as it is pretended, affirming, he had not seen him for sixteen years. But Garnet, who was apprehended after Tresham's death, confessed, he had frequently conferred with him within six months. The Earl of Northumberland was sent to the Tower, on suspicion of being concerned in the plot. This suspicion was grounded upon his being Captain of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners, and admitting into his Cousin Percy, without admitting to him the oath of Supremacy, though he knew his Religion. The Session of the Parliament began not till the 9th of November, though it was fixed to the 5th. The King made a long Speech, representing the heinousness and consequences of this horrible plot, and magnifying the mercy of God in the miraculous discovery. But withal, he took great care to clear the Catholic Religion, and to observe, that this abominable plot, was to be ascribed to such only as were truly Papists, and imbued with the detestable principles mentioned in his first Speech to the Parliament. He affirmed, there were not many of these, and it would be extremely injurious to accuse the Catholics in general of following such extravagant maxims.

Works.

“For, added he, although it cannot be denied, that it was only the blind superstition of their errors in Religion, that led them to this desperate device; yet doth it not follow, that all professing that Romish Religion were guilty of the same: For as it is true, that no other Sect of Heretiques, not excepting Turk, Jew, nor Pagan, nor even those of Calicut, who adore the Devil, do ever maintain by the grounds of their Religion, that it was lawful, or rather meritorious, (as the Romish Catholics call it) to murder Princes or People for quarrel of Religion; yet it is true on the other side, that many honest Men, blinded, peradventure, with some opinions of Popery, as if they be not found in the questions of the Real Presence, or in the number of their Sacraments, and some such school question; yet do either not know, or at least not believe, all the true grounds of Popery, which is indeed the mystery of Iniquity. And therefore do we justly confess, that many Papists, especially our Forefathers, laying their only trust upon Christ and his merits, at their last breath, may be, and oftentimes are saved; detesting in that point, and thinking the cruelty of Puritans worthy of fire, that will admit no salvation to any Papist.”

And then concluding that part of his discourse, he declared, “As upon the one part many honest Men, seduced with some errors of Popery, may yet remain good and faithful Subjects; so upon the other part, none of those that truly know and believe the whole grounds of Popery, can ever prove either good Christians, or faithful Subjects.”

This Speech was much applauded by the Courtiers, who admired its wisdom, justice, and equity, and remarked the King's greatness of soul, who at the very time he had so much reason to complain of the Catholics, took care to justify their Religion, and hinder the innocent from being confounded with the guilty. But the rest of the People were not of the same opinion. They considered with grief and astonishment, the tender regard the King expressed for the Catholics in general, under pretence of a distinction, which was thought imaginary, or at least very useless, by reason of the difficulty of discerning those who held the maxims condemned by the King, from those who were willing to renounce them. They observed also the difference, the King put between the Romish Religion and that of the Puritans. The first hindered not its Professors from being faithful Subjects, but the last was not to be tolerated in any well-governed Commonwealth, as he expressed himself in his former Speech. Here, to turn the hatred of the good Protestants upon the Puritans, he is not content with detesting an opinion indifferent in itself, and which had no relation to the State, but even thinks it worthy of fire, either temporal or spiritual, for he does not say which, whilst he calls the doctrine of Transubstantiation a mere school-question. It was also said, that if upon this same opinion, he had been pleased to distinguish the Puritans who did not, from such as did, damn all the Catholics, this distinction would have been as well-grounded as that between the Catholics and Papists. In short, it was observed, that he affected to ascribe to the Puritans alone this opinion worthy of fire, which he might much more justly have imputed to the Roman Catholics, as all the World knew. It cannot be denied, that throughout the whole course of his Reign, this Prince 1605. showed an extreme tenderness for the Roman Catholics. This will still more plainly appear in the sequel, since what I have hitherto related may be deemed doubtful marks of his sentiments, and capable of admitting a favourable construction.

As soon as he had ended his Speech, the King prorogued the Parliament to the 21st of January: So that it evidently appeared he had caused them to meet for one single day, on purpose to show his thoughts of the conspiracy, and the manner he would have it examined, that is, with respect to such only as were concerned in it.

The Lords Montagu and Sturton, suspected of being privy to the Plot, were fined, the first ten thousand Marks, the other six thousand, though there was no other proof against them, but their not coming to the Parliament. They were sentenced by the Star-Chamber, which was then the terror of the Great Men, and which for the least offences, condemned the Parties accused in exorbitant Fines to the King's use (1).

The discovery of the Powder-Plot was universally ascribed to the King's penetration, who alone discovered the meaning of the Letter to the Lord Montague (2). Nay, some of his flatterers did not scruple to say, he could never have found out the Mystery, without the immediate assistance of the Holy Ghost (3).

The King of Spain's and the Archduke's Ambassadors testified their joy for this deliverance, by bonfires before their doors, and fountains of wine to the mob. This was not perhaps a very proper way to remove the suspicions of the English, who were apt to believe the Spaniards were concerned in this horrible Plot (4). It was remembered that when the Constable of Castile was in England, he said publicly, in case the King refused to tolerate the Catholics, there would be found Persons capable of any attempt. Nay, after the Plot was discovered, the Archduke refused to deliver some of the Complices who had escaped into the Netherlands (5), and sent the chief of them to Spain, where he was very well received. It is certain however, these Ambassadors were not accused by the depositions of the Criminals. Nay, the King publicly declared, he was sure no foreign Prince was privy to the Plot. Indeed, all the Princes, as well Catholic as Protestant, expressed their abhorrence of so damnable a design, and congratulated him upon his deliverance.

The Parliament meeting the 21st of January, the King appointed Commissioners to try the Conspirators. He had till now delayed to give the people the satisfaction to see these Villains punished. But perceiving if he did not do it of himself, the Parliament would not fail to petition him, he resolved to give them over to justice. There were but eight executed the 31st of January (6), though the number of the guilty was much greater. Some time after, Oldcorn, a Jesuit, saying openly, that the ill success of the Conspiracy did not render it the less just, was sent to prison, condemned and executed. Henry Garnet (Provincial of the English Jesuits) having also been arrested, was sentenced to die as a Traitor, upon the depositions of those that were already executed. Some say, he only confessed, he had heard of a conspiracy to restore the Catholic Religion in England, but was ignorant of the circumstances. Others pretend, the Plot was revealed to him only in Confession, and he was not obliged to reveal it. The King, as I said, publicly declared afterwards Garnet was legally convicted (7). The Jesuits have been pleased to honour these men with the title of Martyrs, as if they had suffered only in hatred to their Religion. But King James's humour and character will not permit it to be thought, that he put men to death only because they were Catholics.

Whilst the Parliament was considering the Powder-Plot, it was suddenly rumoured that the King was stabbed at O-

king with a [poisoned] Knife. This rumour instantly threw the People into the utmost consternation, imagining it was the effect of some fresh Conspiracy. But the alarm was soon over. Two hours after came certain advice that the King was alive, and he even returned to London that very day, and published a Proclamation to quiet the People. The Spanish Ambassador distinguished his affection for the King, by presenting Sir Leuvenor with a gold chain (8), for bringing him the news of his safety.

Mean while, the Parliament seriously applied themselves to prevent the designs of the Popish Recusants, that is, of such as refused to acknowledge the King's independent authority. For the more easy discovery of such Persons, the two Houses agreed to draw up an oath, which all Subjects, without exception, should be obliged to take. This oath was called the Oath of Allegiance, that is, of submission and obedience to the King, as Sovereign independent of any other power upon earth. It differed from the Oath of Supremacy, as it concerned only the King's Temporal Sovereignty, and his independence of the Pope; whereas the other, enacted in the Reign of Henry VIII., obliged the Subjects to acknowledge the King for supreme Head of the Church of England. So, every Catholic could safely take this new Oath, unless he was one of those who thought, that to be a true Catholic, it was necessary to believe, the Pope had power to depose Kings, and give away their Dominions. Nay, the King was extremely careful not to have any clause inserted in the Oath that might give just offence to the Catholics. The Commons having put in the rough-draught of the Oath, that the Pope has not power to excommunicate the King: He said these words might offend his good Catholic Subjects, and it sufficed to assert, the Pope's excommunication could not authorize Subjects to rise against their Sovereign. Here follows the Oath which has been, and still is spoken of by many, without well knowing what it is.

I A. B. do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify, and declare in my conscience before God and the World, That our Sovereign Lord King James, is lawful King of this Realm, and of all other his Majesty's Dominions and Countries: And that the Pope neither of his jurisdiction, nor of any authority of the Church or See of Rome, or by any other means with any other, hath any power or authority to depose the King, or to dissolve any of his Majesty's Kingdoms or Dominions, or to authorize any foreign Prince to invade or annoy him or his Countries, or to discharge any of his Subjects of their Allegiance and Obedience to his Majesty, or to give licence or leave to any of them to bear arms, raise troops, or to offer any violence or hurt to his Majesty's royal Person, State, or Government, or to any of his Majesty's Subjects within his Majesty's Dominions. Also I do swear from my heart, that, notwithstanding any Declaration or Sentence of Excommunication, or Deposition made or granted, or to be made or granted by the Pope, or his Successors, or by any Authority derived, or pretended to be derived from him or his See, against the said King, his Heirs or Successors, or any abolition of the said Subjects from their obedience, I will bear Faith and true Allegiance to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, and him and them will defend to the uttermost of my power, against all Conspiracies and Attempts whatsoever, which shall be made against his or their Persons, their Crown and Dignity, by reason or colour of any such Sentence, or Declaration, or otherwise, and will do my endeavour to disclose and make known to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, all Treasons and traitorous Conspiracies, which I shall know or hear of, to be against him or any of them. And I do farther swear, That I do from my heart abhor, detest and abjure as impious and heretical this damnable Doctrine and Position, That Princes which be excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, may be deposed and murdered by

The reader who is not of the King's side, will not be surprised to find, that the Jesuits of the Court of the King were, first, because he found that nothing was to be feared from one of King James's Complexions. Another reason was, though likely to make of it, by reason he had an Army then ready in Flanders to land in the huge multitude, to block a Church must needs have caused over the Nation, the sound with the Earl of Salisbury, in a Letter to him, that he was informed "the Papists did not so much fear after the late of the King, as the late of the Earl of Salisbury." Swear, or any other whatsoever. And I do believe, in confidence am refuted, that neither the Pope, nor any of his Clergy, hath power to absolve me of this Oath, or thereof, which I acknowledge by good and full authority, lawfully ministered unto me, and do renounce all promises and Dispenfations to the contrary. And all these Words I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to these express Words by me spoken, and according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same Words, without any equivocation, or mental evasion, or reservation whatsoever. And I do make this recognition heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the Faith of a Christian.

So help me God.

It is easy to see, this Oath contained nothing repugnant to the essential Article of the Romish Faith, and concerned only the unlimited power, which by some is ascribed, and by others denied, to the Pope. Accordingly, most of the English Catholics, with the Arch-Priest Blackwell, made no scruple to comply with it. Nay, when Urban VIII. sent them a Brief dated the 15th of July, forbidding them to take this Oath, they thought the Brief was forged by their enemies, to draw them into a Non-compliance. But the Pope spoke more fully the next year, and by a second Brief plainly told them, if they took the Oath they forfeited all hopes of Salvation. At the same time, Cardinal Bellarmino under the feigned name of Tortus, wrote a Book against this Oath, and sent it to the Arch-Priest Blackwell, to admit of the Oath he had committed the most heinous offence. This occasioned King James's Apology for himself, published some time after, with a Preamble addressed to all Christian Princes, wherein he cleared himself from the false imputation of being a persecutor of the Catholics. He began the Apology with justifying Queen Elizabeth's conduct to the Romanists, and then proceeded these words:

But now having sacrificed (if I may so say) to the manes of my late Predecessor, I may next with St. Paul justly vindicate mine own fame, from those innumerable Calumnies spread against me, in testifying the truth of my behaviour toward the Papists: wherein I may truly affirm, that whatsoever was her just and merciful government over the Papists in her own time, my government over them since hath so far exceeded hers, in mercy and clemency, as not only the Papists themselves grew to that height of Pride, in confidence of my mildness, as they did actually expect and assuredly promise to themselves Liberty of Conscience, and Equality with other of my Subjects in all things, but even a number of the best and faithfullest of my said Subjects were cast in great fear and amazement, by my course and proceedings, ever prognosticating and supposing, that some fruit to come of it, which shewed itself in the Powder-Treason. How many did I honour with Honours, of known and open Recusants? How inapparently did I give audience and access to both sides, believing equally all favourers and honourers on both Professions? How many did I continue in my court and company? And above all, how many did I free Recusants of their ordinary Payments? Besides, it is evident, what strict order was in out of my own mouth to the Judges to spare the execution of the Penal Laws, and the Clergy (joining their Conviction) joining their Protestations, till by all Priests that were taken, and not taken, might go out of the Country, with a day: my general Pardon having been extended to all Recusants in Prison, whereupon they were set at liberty as good Subjects: And all Priests that were taken after, sent or not set at liberty there. But time and paper will fail me to make enumeration of all the benefits and favours that I bestowed in general and particular upon Papists: In which, whenever, every scope of my Pen would serve but for a blot of the Pope's ingratitude and injustice, in meeting me with so hard a measure for the same.

All the King said in this part of his Apology was very true. But it is surprizing, that since he thought proper to make a long Apology to clear himself to foreign Princes, 1605, from the aspersion of being an enemy to the Papists, he should never think of excusing to his own subjects his too great condescension to these same Papists, and his extreme care to hinder the execution of the Laws enacted against them. There is another very extraordinary particular in this apology. The King evidently shows, that Cardinal Bellarmino confounds in his Book the oath of Allegiance with that of Supremacy, whereby it was manifest, he did not understand the point in dispute (2). But I have said enough of this subject. I shall only add, to conclude this day, what relates to the Powder-Plot, that the Parliament appointed the fifth of November to be a public Thanksgiving-day for so great a deliverance, which day has been constantly solemnized to this present time.

The common danger which threatened the whole Kingdom, stifled for a time the disputes between the King and Commons, which arose in the first Session of the Parliament. The Commons were so far from intending to revive them, that on the contrary, to gain the King's good-will, they granted him one of the largest Subsidies that had ever been given to his Predecessors in the most urgent occasions of the State, though he was then in profound Peace, and wanted money only to enrich his Favorites. This aid consisted of three whole Subsidies and six Fifteenths, [and Tenths], besides four Subsidies of four Shillings in the Pound granted at the same time by the Clergy (3). But the affair of the Union of the two Kingdoms was deferred to the next Session. So the King, having no farther occasion for the Parliament, prorogued it from the 27th of May to the 18th of November (4).

The consideration caused by the Powder-Plot in the Court and the whole Kingdom, was at length turned into a pleasant tranquillity. The King and People were equally pleased with being delivered from so great a danger; and the King had the more reason to be so, as he had brought the Parliament to be of his moderate sentiments with respect to the Roman Catholics, of whom ten only had been left to the honour of the Law. This was not aggravated, unless the obligation of bearing Allegiance to their King, or departing the realm, was to be deemed an aggravation. On the other hand, the King was able to gratify his Favorites, by means of the money granted by Parliament, and the whole Court rejoiced, every one expecting to partake of the King's bounties.

This money came very seasonably to the King, to give a splendid reception to his Brother-in-law the King of Denmark, who arrived shortly after, on purpose to visit the Queen his Sister, and the King (5). No cost was spared on this occasion, to demonstrate the King's and Queen's affections for this Prince, and to show him the riches of the Kingdom they had acquired. During his stay in England, there was one continued, though various, Scene of diversions, as Plays, Sights, Entertainments (6), Balls, Maskerades, Hunting; in a word, every thing that was thought proper to divert him.

Some time after, the Prince of Vandemont, the Duke of Lorraine's third Son, made the King another rich visit, attended by seven Earls, ten Barons, forty Gentlemen, and six-score domesticks. He stayed a fortnight with the King, by whom he was, with his whole train, royally entertained. These two visits consumed good part of the money lately granted by Parliament (7).

The Session of the Parliament which began the 18th of November, was chiefly employed in the affair of the Union, which the King strongly solicited. Sir Francis Bacon, the King's Solicitor, was ordered to move and support it with the best arguments he could devise. But though he was learned and eloquent, he met in the House of Commons, with persons able to withstand him, and to allege as strong reasons against, as he did, for the Union. The chief objections were, the inequality between the State and Riches of the two Kingdoms, the difference of the Laws and Customs, and Scotland's perpetual Alliance with France. But the most prevailing argument, though it was not publicly insisted upon, was the jealousy of the English, which baffled all Bacon's Rhetorick (8).

1607. the Parliament, sent for both Houses to Whitehall, and endeavoured in a long Speech to shew the necessity of the Union, and the common advantage it would procure. He answered the objections alleged in the two Houses, speaking one while with great mildness, another while with a menacing tone, and turning himself every way to attain his ends. He said, it was not reasonable, the English and Scots should consider one another as enemies, whilst Subjects of the same King, and consequently it was necessary all hostile Laws should cease, meaning the Laws made from time to time upon the frequent Invasions of the Scots on the borders of England. He added, it was no less reasonable, there should be between the two Nations community of Commerce, since he was no Stranger, but descended from the ancient Kings of England, and could not be natural Liege-Lords to both, whilst they were strangers to one another. Finally, it was against nature, for people who lived under the same dominion, to be no more united than Frenchmen and Spaniards.

He then proceeded to a nice point, as he had himself determined a thing which properly belonged to the cognizance of the Parliament. He said, he was informed by the Judges, there was a difference between the Ante-nati, and Post-nati of each Kingdom, that is, between such as were born before, and such as were born after, his accession to the Crown of England. That therefore he had published a Proclamation, declaring all those to be naturalized in both Kingdoms, who were born since his accession. That indeed, he confessed the Judges might err; but admonished both Houses, to beware to disgrace, either his Proclamations or the Judges, for so they might disgrace both their King and the Laws, who have Power, when the Parliament is done, to try both their Lands and Lives.

In answering the objection taken from the perpetual Alliance between France and Scotland, he affirmed, the Alliance was not between the two Nations, but only between their Kings. I do not know whether this was really fact.

He concluded his Speech with saying, "What is now defined hath often before been sought, and not obtained; to refuse it now then were double Iniquity. And for their security in such reasonable points of restriction, which he shall agree to, they need not doubt his Inclination: For, added he, I will not say any thing which I will not promise, nor promise any thing which I will not swear, what I swear, I will sign, and what I sign, I shall with God's grace ever perform."

The earnestness which the King expressed for the Union of the two Kingdoms, was not capable of prevailing with the Parliament, so inconvenient was it thought. All he could obtain, was the repealing of the hostile Laws. So the Union was rejected, without any mention however of the Proclamation concerning the Post-nati. But by not approving it, the Parliament did in effect reject it, since a Proclamation in England is not considered as a Law. Nevertheless, two years after, the King caused the same thing to be determined by the Judges of the Realm, though this determination was of no more force than the Proclamation (1).

The ill success of this affair extremely troubled the King. In his first Speech to the Parliament, he called such as were against the Union of the two Kingdoms, blind, ignorant, restless, and dissatisfied, and affirmed, no honest Subject whatever was less glad of this Union than himself. But he now found the Lords and Commons against it, and this cast a sort of ridicule upon his too hasty judgment. From thenceforward he always appeared very averse to Parliaments; as on the other hand, the people began to dislike him. They could not see without grief, so many Proclamations, which seemed to suppose the King's will to be the sole rule of the Government. The King's needless expences were another cause of complaint, because they were compared with Queen Elizabeth's frugality and good management. It was considered, the three hundred thousand pounds received by the King at his coming, with what was lately granted by the Parliament and Clergy, served only to enrich his Favorites and Ministers. All this began to form a cloud, which perhaps would have been followed by a storm, had not the King, on the fourth of July, prorogued the Parliament to the 16th of November, and afterwards to the 9th of February (2).

Before the Parliament was prorogued, there were some commotions in Northamptonshire (3), where the Country people rose in arms, under the conduct of one [John Reynolds] who styled himself Captain Pouch (4), but their troubles were short-lived. The Sheriff of the County found means to disperse the Rebels, without the assistance of any regular Troops.

The Earl of Tirconnell, the famous Irish Rebel, pardoned by Queen Elizabeth, was brought to London the beginning of this reign, by the Lord Montjoy, and presented to the King, who received him very graciously. Shortly after, he returned to his native Country, where he could not live in peace. He not only attempted once more to raise a Rebellion in Ireland, but also applied to foreign Princes for assistance. His secret practices not succeeding to his expectation, he was afraid of being apprehended, and chose to leave Ireland, taking with him the Earl of Tirconnell, whom he had drawn into his plots (5). When he was come to a place of safety, he gave out, that the outrages committed in Ireland upon the Catholics had constrained him to forsake his Estate and Country. But the King briskly repelled this aspersions by a sort of Apology published on this occasion, not indurging that the world should think him a persecutor of the Catholics.

In the beginning of this year, the Archduke and the Infanta his spouse, sent into Holland Father Ney, Provincial of the order of St. Francis, to propose a peace with the States of the United Provinces. Ney lying concealed for a time at Rijswijk, was at last admitted to audience by Prince Maurice, who told him plainly, there was no hopes of a peace, unless the United-Provinces were owned for a free and independent State. This declaration obliged the Father to return to Brussels, from whence he came some time after, with a Writing signed by the Archduke and the Infanta, with which the States were satisfied, provided it was ratified by the King of Spain, which ratification Ney undertook to procure. Henry IV. hearing what was transacting at the Hague, dispatched President Jannin to offer his mediation to the States, which was accepted. But as they feared to create jealousy in King James, if France alone was concerned in the affair, they wrote to him for his advice and assistance, and shortly after, sent an Ambassador to inform him more particularly of the situation of their affairs. Mean while, the King of Spain's ratification being come, the States found it full of equivocal and capacious expressions, which gave them occasion to require explanations. This prolonged the Negotiation, the success whereof shall be related hereafter (6).

April 11, 1608, [George Jervois] a seminary Priest of Rheims, was hanged at Tyburn, and the 23d of June, Thomas Garnet a Jesuit had the same fate. Garnet was offered a pardon, provided he would take the oath of Allegiance, which he resolutely refused.

Thomas Sackville Earl of Dorset, and Lord-Treasurer, dying suddenly as he was sitting at the Council-Table, Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury succeeded him in his post. He was a Lord of a great genius, and though crooked before and behind, nature supplied that defect with noble endowments of mind.

The chief concern of the Ministers was to see that the King did not want money. He had occasion for great sums, being extremely liberal, or rather prodigal (7), and it may well be thought, that in procuring money for the King, the Ministers did not forget themselves. But this is so customary a thing with Favorites and Ministers, that it would be wrong to upbraid them with it in particular. As to foreign affairs, they were little regarded throughout this whole Reign.

One of the properest means devised to procure the King money, was the monopoly of the sale of Cloth, at the solicitation of a certain Merchant, who, in appearance, dearly purchased his Patent. At this time, the English were not skilled in the art of dressing and dyeing English Woollen Manufactures. They sent them into Holland white, and the Hollanders, after they had dyed them, sent

This Case (says Wijten) was reported by Lord Chief Justice Coke, who was fit metal for any Sump-Royal, and adjudged by him, the Lord Chancellor Ellismer, and most of the Judges of the Kingdom in the Exchequer Chamber, though many strong and valid Arguments were brought against it: Such power is in the breast of Kings! And such softness are Judges made of, that they can model their Precedents into as many shapes as they please! Wijten p. 620.

See an account of it, and of the Translators, in Fuller, Cent. 17. p. 44.

them back, and fold them in England. The Merchant I just mentioned, intimating to the King and Ministry, that a great profit would accrue to England, if the Cloths were dressed at home, obtained a Patent to dress and dye them, exclusive of all others. Then the King published a Proclamation, forbidding all persons to send any white Cloths abroad. Whereupon the Hollanders prohibited the importation of dyed Cloths from England. So the Merchant who obtained the Patent, not being able to sell his dyed Cloths any where but in England, was forced to dress and dye only a small quantity. This raised such clamours amongst the Cloth-weavers, that the King was obliged to permit the exportation of a certain quantity of white Cloths. At length, the Court, by degrees connived at the offenders, and the Woollen-trade continued upon the same foot as before (1).

The same year, the King ingrossed to himself the selling of Allum, which had been lately found out in England, and prohibited the importation of foreign Allum, by Proclamation (2).

Whether the King intended to be revenged of the Hollanders for breaking his measures with respect to the Woollen Manufactures, or only to draw money from them, a Proclamation was published, prohibiting all foreign Nations to fish on the Coasts of Great-Britain. This occasioned the next year a Treaty, whereby the Hollanders engaged to pay an annual sum for leave to fish. The King would have afterwards broke the Treaty, and taken from them the licence he had granted them; but they maintained their privilege against his consent, by guarding their Fishing-Boats with men of war. James being a pacifick Prince, did not think this a sufficient motive to quarrel with them.

Archbishop Banckroft never ceased to plague the Puritans, to oblige them to conform to the Church of England. For this reason great numbers of these people resolved to go and settle in Virginia, discovered in the late Reign by Sir Walter Raleigh. Accordingly, some departed for that Country; but the Archbishop seeing many more ready to take the same Voyage, obtained a Proclamation, enjoining them not to go without the King's express licence. The Court was apprehensive this sect would become in the end too numerous and powerful in America. This very year the Archbishop made a fresh attempt concerning the twenty one Articles formerly mentioned: but the opposition of the Judges was so strong, that the King, however desirous he was to please the prelate, durst not proceed.

The Treaty at the Hague concerning a Peace between the Archduke and the States, was an important affair, in which it seemed, the King should have had a great share, and yet he appeared not to be much concerned. However he made two Treaties with the States, the first whereof was concerning the payment of what was due to him.

The other contained an alliance, which was not to take place till after they had concluded a peace with Spain (3). Then he sent Sir Robert Spencer to the Hague, to assist at the negotiations of Peace, jointly with Sir Ralph Winwood, his Ambassador in ordinary. Numberless difficulties occurred in this affair, the chief whereof was, that the King of Spain refused to speak plainly with respect to the liberty of the States. He had ratified the Archduke's declaration, but it was on condition the Peace should be made, and the States would treat only upon the foot of Free States. Besides, in the King of Spain's ratification were certain ambiguous expressions which the States were not pleased with. They knew also, that whilst they were negotiating at the Hague, the Spanish Court was endeavouring to gain the King of England, and, for that purpose, had sent to him Don Fernando de Gironne, a Lord of great distinction, as Ambassador extraordinary. This made the States extremely uneasy, and the more, as James affected on all occasions to intimate, that he looked upon them as Rebels.

He applied to their case the general maxims of Sovereignty, and firmly believed, what he would have had universally thought, that subjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their Prince upon any account whatsoever. Hence may be judged what effect his mediation could have. Accordingly his Ambassadors made a very little figure throughout the whole negotiation. James managed every thing, the English Ambassadors acting but faintly, and showing little or no desire that the Treaty should succeed.

What endeavours soever James might use, it was not possible for him to cause the Parties to consent to a Peace. And therefore he proposed at last a twelve or fifteen years Truce, during which both Parties should remain in possession of what they held, without prejudice to their rights. But the States rejected it unless their Liberty was plainly established. Whereupon the Ambassadors of Spain and the Archduke withdrew, as seeing no likelihood of Peace or Truce. However, James continued his instances to persuade the States to accept of the ratification as it was, and consent to some other Articles, on which there had been great debates. At length, by his many representations he obtained of the United Provinces, Zealand excepted, which stood out till the next year, what he desired to accomplish for the conclusion of the Truce.

King James did not gain much credit by this Negotiation. Besides his leaving every thing to the King of France, he acted not with sincerity, if we may believe President Jeannin; who in a Letter to the King his Master on this occasion, speaking of King James, says, He pretends a willingness to procure a Peace, and yet obstructs it, by publicly saying, he cannot forbear condemning the States for rebelling against the King of Spain their Sovereign. Indeed, Richardot did not scruple to own in a Letter to Jeannin, that the King of Spain's firmness was entirely owing to the King of England's promise, that the liberty of the States should not be mentioned in the Treaty of Truce (4). Henry IV. had no great opinion of James, as appears from his writing to Jeannin, that he knew what that---was capable of, but however it did not break his rest (5).

The Province of Zealand, resolving to follow the sentiment of the other Provinces, the Conferences were renewed at Antwerp, where a twelve years Truce was signed, April the 9th 1609. By this Truce the States obtained that the King of Spain and Archduke owned them as free and independent, and even avoided renouncing the Navigation and Trade to the Indies, which had been a principal obstacle to the negotiation.

James discovered no satisfaction at the advantages obtained by the States, because he considered it as a precedent very dangerous and prejudicial to the sovereign authority of Kings, with which he was ever extremely prepossessed. This evidently appeared at present, by his licensing two Books, which maintained the most extravagant maxims of arbitrary Power. The first writ by Covel Doctor of Civil Law (6), laid down these three Principles:

1. That the King was not bound by the Laws, or his Coronation-Oath.
2. That the King was not obliged to call a Parliament to make Laws, but might do it alone by his absolute Power.
3. That it was a great favour to admit the consent of the Subjects in giving Subsidies.

The other Book was composed by Dr. Blackwood a Clergyman, who laid down this principle, that the English were all Slaves by reason of the Norman Conquest.

The Parliament which met the next year, took this affair to heart, and would have severely punished the authors of these Books; but the King interposed, and frustrated the Parliament's design, by publishing a Proclama-

(1) Admiral Chichester, with some Irish Citizens, having promised Reichefs, Northampton, and the Lord Treasurer, great sums of Money, they procured a Patent for dressing and dying of Cloths, and got the King to issue into his hands the Charter of the Merchant Adventurers, for transporting of white Cloths. But by reason of the Hollanders Prohibition, and Chichester's dying and dressing Cloths worse and dearer than they were in Holland, infinite numbers of people lay idle, and were reduced to a starving condition. So the matter fell to the ground. Covel, p. 70.

(2) At this time Sir John Bourchier, (joining with the Lord Shiffeld President of the North, Sir Thomas Challenor, Sir David Hewitt, and others who had Lands in the North, brought the selling of Allum to perdition in England, which with great charges had been fetched from foreign parts, particularly from Italy; and the King took the whole traffick thereof to himself. Hewitt, p. 898.

(4) The Earl of Sainsbury, in a Letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, of the 23d of December 1608, clears the King from this Imputation. And in another Letter of the 18th of January 1608-9, to Sir Charles Cornwallis then Ambassador in Spain, he tells him, "That Richardot had reported he was the Person that had given to a promise to Spain. And adds, I am sure you never received any such direction from me, that am appointed your principal Correspondent, so his Majesty is so much periwaded of your Faith and Discretion, that you will not intermeddle in any thing beyond the Scope of your Direction." In another Letter of the 27th of January 1608-9, to the same Sir Charles, the Earl says, "Richardot does not directly clear you, and call the imputation upon the Spanish Ambassador, who should have given such hope by Letters, as having received them from the mouth of us that are of his Majesty's Council. But the Ambassador being challenged, did protest to the contrary, with all the Vows that may be. So as we see it was a device set on foot at Brussels, to colour the delays from Spain, and to save themselves from being disavowed in their Proceedings." See the Collection of State Papers in the Reign of James I. p. 469, 472, 474, where it seems to be plain that it was all a fiction of Richardot's to serve his master's turn.

He published a book called the Interpreter, containing the signification of such words and terms as are mentioned in the Law-writers and Statutes. It was printed at Cambridge first in Quarto, in the year 1607. It hath been enlarged and reprinted in Folio; but in all the later Editions, the odious and abusive Passages have been corrected or omitted.

1609. tion, to forbid the reading of these Books; and to order the Copies to be delivered to the Magistrates. But such Proclamations are usually ill-obeyed, especially when it is not the King's interest to fee them strictly executed (1).

1610. The King's Proceedings increased the discontent of most of the English. The Proclamations which were every day published, and whereof several were upon Subjects not us'd to be decided by the former Kings without the concurrence of the Parliament, and the indiscreet Speeches of the Courtiers, who rally'd the People's Privileges, bred suspicions and jealousies, which the King was not sufficiently careful to stifle in their birth. On the other hand, his condescension for the Roman Catholics, whose cause he espoused on all occasions, their access and credit at Court, even to their being admitted to the most important Offices, and into the Ministry itself, created fears in the People, and caused them to suspect some Plot was formed against the Protestant Religion. The Ministers knowing these dispositions, were justly apprehensive of meeting great difficulties in the Parliament, which was to sit the 9th of February. The King intended to procure money, of which he was in great want, tho' he had no war upon his hands, nor any affair which seemed to require an extraordinary aid. It was therefore necessary at least to give the Parliament good words, and try to palliate his immense expences, since his accession to the Crown. But James believing it to be derogatory to the dignity of a Sovereign, to make an Apology himself to his Subjects, ordered the Earls of Suffolk and Salisbury to do it for him.

The Earl of Salisbury, who was the spokesman, declared to both Houses, "that they were met, first, to supply his Majesty's wants; secondly, to redress the People's grievances." Then he told them, "that the King, willing to show them a singular mark of his favour, had resolved to create his eldest Son Prince Henry, Prince of Wales, during the session of the Parliament, though he was free to do it at any other time, as by many Precedents was evident." Having thus endeavoured to gain the King the Good-will of both Houses, by foisting an argument of his Majesty's regard for them, he demonstrated, "it was not without just reasons that the King demanded money, since what he had received had been laid out in very necessary expences." First, as for the three hundred and fifty thousand pounds due in the late Queen's time, he no sooner received the money with one hand, but he paid it away with the other, in redeeming the Crown-Lands she had mortgaged to the City of London (2). Secondly, he was forced to keep on foot for some time, an Army of nineteen thousand men in Ireland, not deeming it proper to make Peace with Spain without the sword in his hand. 3. He was obliged to bury Queen Elizabeth, whose obsequies were very expensive (3). 4. His own journey from Edinburgh to London could not be performed without money; for it would not have been decent for a King to come the first time to his Kingdom like a private person, and without a numerous train. 5. Neither was it fit that his Royal Comfort, with his Children, the Kingdom's future hopes, should be exposed to robbers, without a guard and retinue, and consequently their journey must have been very chargeable. 6. The King of Denmark's visit was so honorable to his Majesty, that he could not dispense with giving him a suitable and magnificent reception. 7. The Ambassadors who came from all parts to congratulate him upon his accession to the Crown of England, could not be sent back without presents, for the honour of the English Nation, besides the charge to entertain them during their stay (4). 8. The King was obliged to send Ambassadors to the Princes by whom he was congratulated, and to return their civilities (5). These were the causes, according to the Orator, of the King's wants, and not, as some affected to give out, his indiscreet bounty to his Servants. "But, added he, how could a bounty so worthy of a King be blamed? If he did not give to his Servants, they would be miserable in a Country abounding with riches. As for the Scots, it must be remembered, that tho' they were not born in the Kingdom, his Majesty was born among them; and not to have them taste of the blessing he had attained, were to have him change his Virtue with his Fortune. Upon all these accounts, his Majesty desires the Commons to supply his wants, which mark of esteem could not be denied to a King, who is not only the wisest of Kings, but the very Image of an Angel, that has brought good tidings to the English, and secured them in the enjoyment of perfect happiness; to a King, who by his vast knowledge and noble endowments, deserves the Title of Defender of the Faith; to a King who has shut the back-door by which England was liable to invasions, and who only seeks that every man may live happy under his own Olive. That none will wonder or startle at the King's desiring a Supply, but such as study to serve their own turns, and believe nothing but what they find written in the Stories of their own Ignorance. Among whom are to be reckoned those, who hearing of an order to bind up the printed Proclamations in a book, that the better notice may be taken of the things contained in them, have spread a report, that the King intended [this Parliament] to make Proclamations equal to the Laws, which never entered into his thoughts. That so far is he from governing by will and pleasure, that he is ready to hearken to any motion from the two Houses, provided they keep a just proportion, and oblige what is due to a great and gracious King."

This Speech produced not the effect hoped by the King and his Ministers. Some of the Commons loudly complained of the King's prodigality; and excessive bounty to the Scots (6). They said, the whole wealth of England would not serve to satisfy their avidity, that since the King's accession Gold and Silver were as common in Edinburgh as stones in the streets, and that all the riches of England flowed thither, where they were swallowed up as in a gulph, and never returned. Others said, it was visible, the King was gradually undermining the Nation's Privileges by continual encroachments. That he designed to establish the Civil Law, in the room of the Common Law, and had dropped some expressions to that purpose at his own table. Finally, he had approved of a Book lately written, the design whereof was to render the Common Law contemptible.

But what made most noise in the Lower-House was the High-Commission, which exercised in the Kingdom a kind of Inquisition for matters of Religion and State. For the better understanding this cause of complaint, it must be remembered, that when Henry VIII. was declared supreme head of the Church of England, he appointed Cromwell for his Vicegerent in religious affairs, with power to exercise the Supremacy in his name. After the tragical end of this first and only Vicegerent, this office was executed by Commissioners. And this is what was called the High-Commission, which continued during the Lives of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. and ceasing in Mary's Reign, was revived by Elizabeth. In her Reign the High-Commission exercised its authority with great moderation. But the case was otherwise under James I. This Prince as I have frequently observed, mortally hated the Puritans, and after his Proclamation for Uniformity, it was the High-Commission's business to see his injunctions executed. It may easily be guessed that the Commissioners who were all named by the King, were not favorable to the Puritans. Accordingly, they very rigorously exercised their power. Had they stopped there, this severity upon a set of obstinate People, as they were reckoned, and whose number was small in comparison of the Episcopallians, would not have excited the complaints of the Lower House. But they went much farther. I have observed, that because the Puritans were against the Hierarchy, the King inferred they were also against Monarchy; and there were but too many who laboured to confirm him in this notion. For this reason, all who were not very submissive to the King's orders, or great assertors of the privileges of the People, were affectually called Puritans (7). Under this pretence the High-Commission proceeded against them, and wanted not means to molest them. Thus to be really a Protestant and Member of the Church of England, the communicating in that Church, and complying with the external worship were not sufficient, the King's authority was also to be acknowledged as extensive as his flatterers were pleased to make it. They who ventured to censure his conduct, and question his unlimited power, were deemed infected with Puritanism, and to reason upon Puritanical principles. So, there were then two sorts of Puritans, Church-Puritans, and State-Puritans. But the High-Commission affected to confound them one with another, in order to exercise authority upon both. This was the occasion of the complaints in the House of Commons.

The King being informed of what was talked in the Parliament, sent for both Houses to Whitehall, and endeavoured to shew, he was unjustly complained of. But withal, he intimated by some expressions which plainly discovered his sentiments, that if he did not rule with an absolute sway, it was not for want of power, but entirely owing to his equity.

The King's Speech to the House of Commons.

He told them, " Though the King's heart be in the hands of the Lord, yet he will set it before the eyes of the People; assuring them, That he never meant to govern by any law, but the law of the land; tho' it be disputed among them, as if he had an intention to alter the Law, and govern by the absolute power of a King. He knew, he said, the power of Kings, resembling it to the power divine: For as God can create and destroy, make and unmake at his pleasure, so Kings can give life and death, judge all, and be judged of none. They can exalt low things, and abase high things, making the Subjects like Men at Chess, a Pawn to take a Bishop (1). And when he had raised the King's power to the height, with, Ye are Gods, he brings them down again with, They shall die like Men: And that all Kings, who are not tyrants or perjured, will bound themselves within the limits of their Laws; and they that persuade them the contrary, are vipers and pests both against them and the Common-wealth. Yet as it is blasphemy to dispute what God may do, so it is sedition in Subjects to dispute what a King may do in the height of his power. And as he will not have his Subjects discourse of what he may, so he will do nothing but what shall be consonant to Law and Reason. Then he strives to mitigate the sharpness of the words dropped from him at his Table, to the disparagement of the Common Law, on which he bestows very high Encomiums; but recalling himself, he points out some corruptions in it (2).

" After which, he addresses himself to the House of Commons, and not only thanks them for the bonfire they made of certain Papers, which were presented as grievances from some discontented murmuring Spirits; instructing them how to receive grievances hereafter: In which he would have them careful to avoid three things.

" The first, That they meddle not with the main points of Government, that is his Craft. To meddle with that were to lessen him, who hath been thirty years at the Trade in Scotland, and served an Apprenticeship of seven years here [in England].

" Secondly, He would not have such ancient Rights as he hath received from his Predecessors accounted grievances; that were to judge him unworthy to enjoy what they left him.

" And Lastly, That they should be careful not to present that for a grievance, which is established by a Law; for it is very unprofitful in Subjects to press their King wherein they are sure to be denied. Complaints may be made unto them of the High-Commissioners, let the abuse appear then, and spare not; there may be errors among them; but to take away the Commission, is to derogate from him; and it is now in his thoughts to rectify it in a good proportion.

" Then he shews the emergent cause of his great expences, since his coming to the Crown, which makes him desire a supply from them. And if they refuse to grant it him, his reputation will suffer at home and abroad; for the world will think it want of love in them, or merit in him, that both lessened their hearts, and tied up their hands towards him."

reply to the speech.

There was need of no great penetration to perceive in the King's Speech, the maxims on which he pretended to have a right to govern the English Nation, and his idea of Monarchy in all Countries without distinction. He frope too plainly, that it would have been difficult to understand him. It was Sedition in Subjects to dispute about the extent of the regal power, it was sedition followed, the King might do any thing; and if he ruled not like a tyrant, it was not for want of power, but for want of his justice and clemency. In short, that the King was to be examined, not to see what he would do, but what tends either plainly, or ambiguously, to establish in the King an absolute and despotic power. The English had not been used to hear their Kings speak in this manner: Henry VIII. the most arbitrary of all, managed the Parliament, in order to procure Acts in favour of the Sovereign, but never pretended to establish his authority upon such principles. So, the Commons evidently perceiving what the King had in his thoughts, resolved strenuously to oppose his designs. But it was not yet a proper season to begin. Such great bodies require time to form and execute their projects. They feigned therefore to take no notice of the maxims the King would have established, and granted a Subsidy, though a much smaller than he expected (3). This done, the Parliament having sat till July 23^d, was prorogued to the 16th of October (4).

Before the end of the Session, the King created his eldest Son Henry, Prince of Wales (5), and settled his Household, so that the young Prince kept his Court at St. James's, whilst the Queen kept hers at Somerset House, which he gave the name of Denmark House; but it was called so only during her life, and among her own people. Thus the King had three Courts to maintain, which was very expensive.

All the Historians affirm, the Prince of Wales was of a very different Character from that of the King his Father. Though he was but sixteen years old, there appeared in him principles of equity, justice, moderation, magnanimity, which so gained him the love and esteem of the English, that the King could not forbear being jealous. His Court was well regulated, in extravagancies or indiscretions were seen there, except perhaps the too frequent Masquerades, which were then much in vogue, because the Queen was passionately fond of them. As for the King, 'tis said, he did not spend much of his time in State-affairs, but entirely trusted to his Ministers. It may be, this is a little aggravated, though it is not very unlikely, that a Prince who was in peace with all the world, and a great lover of Books, and Hunting, should leave common affairs to his Ministers.

Whilst James lived in profound tranquility, the eyes of all Europe were fixed upon Henry IV's grand project to humble the House of Austria. This House daily grew so formidable, that it might very justly raise the jealousy of the other States. What had lately happened in respect of the Succession of John-William Duke of Cleves, was a clear evidence how attentive the House of Austria was to aggrandize itself on all sides. The Duke of Cleves dying the 25th of March 1609, his four Sisters, or their Heirs, claimed his Inheritance, containing the Duchies of Cleves, and Juliers, and the Earldoms of la Marck, Brigh, Ravenbergh, and Rauxheim. The chief Competitors were, Wolfgang-William, Son to the Duke of Neuburg, John Duke of Deuxponts, both of the Palatin family, John Sigismund, Elector of Brandenburg, Christian II. Elector of Saxony, and Charles of Austria, Marquis of Burgaw. Whilst these Princes contended about the Succession, the Emperor Rudolphus II. pretended it was to be committed to his trust, till the affair was decided. To that purpose, he sent his orders to Leopold of Austria, Bishop of Strasbourg, who entering the Duchy of Juliers at the head of an Army, took the capital City, and left a Garrison in it. This proceeding convincing the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Duke of Neuburg, that whilst they were contending about the Duke of Cleves's Succession, they both ran the risk of losing it, they joined in a league, and taking possession of the rest of the deceased Duke's dominions, implored the assistance of France and Holland to support them. Henry IV. who had now made great preparations against the House of Austria, promised to assist them a person. At the same time, he ordered the Troops he had in Holland, to be ready to join him in the Duchy of Cleves, and desired the States to send thither also Prince Maurice, with part of their own forces. But whilst he was preparing for this Expedition, he was murdered by

That the divers contrary Reports and Precedents, and the several Statutes and Acts of Parliament that conflict one another, might be reviewed and reconciled. See W. 679, p. 682.

The murderer's confession (2), discovered, that this regicide was committed in consequence of that Doctrine of the Romish Church, which was to disgraceable to King James, and the Jesuits were universally believed to be concerned in it. Wherefore James finding how much it behoved him to remove from his person, men who held so detestable a Doctrine, issued out a fresh Proclamation, commanding all Jesuits, [and Priests,] to depart the Kingdom, and all Reculants, not to come within ten miles of the Court. Then he caused all his Subjects to take the oath of Allegiance, which the Parliament, then sitting, had first taken.

The Court of Spain was generally suspected of contriving the King of France's murder, because, that Prince was known to be making great preparations against the House of Austria, and that House was not seen to prepare to oppose his designs. Mean while, whether James did not believe it, or thought it advisable to gain the friendship of a House so formidable to the Protestants, he sent to Sir Charles Cornwallis (3) his Ambassador to negotiate a Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the King of Spain's eldest Daughter (4).

Richard Bancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, and grand adversary of the Puritans died about this time. He had procured the King's Patent to found a College at Chelster, for the maintenance of a certain number of able Controversialists, who were to combat with their Sermons and Writings, the adversaries of the Church of England, as well Puritans as Papists, but his death put an end to the project (5). George Abbot, who succeeded him, was of a very different character. He was even suspected and accused of being a Puritan, because he would not, like his Predecessor, persecute that Sect, nor blindly follow the maxims of the Court with respect to Government.

The Parliament meeting the 16th of October, the Commons were in a humour which pleased not the King. And therefore he determined to dissolve the Parliament by Proclamation the 31st of December, having first prorogued it (6). The Ministers finding by the motions made in the Lower-House, that a resolution was taken to use the most effectual methods to redress the grievances, thought it against the King's and their own interest, to suffer the Commons to execute this project. The pretences for dissolving the Parliament set forth in the Proclamation, were,

That the King had proposed many things far differing and surpassing the Graces and Favours of former times, both in nature and value, in expectation of a good conclusion of some weighty cause, which had been there in deliberation, not only for the supply of the necessities of his Majesty's Estate; but for the ease and freedom of his Subjects: But these being, the two last Sessions, little taken notice of; and that the members, by reason of the length of the Parliament, were debarr'd from the hospitality they kept in the Country, and that divers Shires, Cities, and Boroughs, had been burdened with expence of maintaining their Members; for these reasons he dissolved them. This Parliament, being the first of this Reign, had sat seven years. From its dissolution to the year 1614, it was the Ministry's business to devise ways and means to supply the King's wants.

On the 1st of September Prince Maurice became master of Juliers, with the aid brought by the Marshal de la Chaire from France, and the English Forces that were in the Service of the States, under the command of Sir Edward Cecil, the Earl of Salisbury's Brother (7).

The King being freed from the incumbrance of the Parliament, and resolving never to call another, the Courtiers greatly applauded his design. An absolute Government was much more for their advantage, than a Government bounded by the Laws, where the King in some measure depends on the People. The whole Court was overjoyed at the King's shaking off the troublesome yoke of the Parliaments. The three Courts were a continued scene of mirth and diversions, and especially the Queen's where scarce any thing else was regarded. She had her

Favorites, as the King had his, that is, persons whose avidity was to be satisfied (8). The King however had not yet a Favorite, according to the usual sense of the word, though, whilst he reigned in Scotland, he had plainly showed he could hardly be without one. Perhaps, the ill offices, the English and Scots did one another, had, till now, prevented the King from fixing. Besides, this Prince's taste was very different from that of most others. Neither virtue, nor merit, nor eminent qualities, had any charms for him. He was to be captivated only by something external and dazzling, as youth, gracefulness of person, fine cloaths and the like. Never was Prince so much taken with such sort of outward accomplishments. I speak upon the testimony of the Lord Clarendon (9), and several others, and upon the characters of this Prince's favorites as well in England as Scotland, in whom no other merit was ever acknowledged. Be this as it will, among the English and Scots who approached the King, there was not yet found any one possessed of the qualities requisite to become his favorite. He wanted an unexperienced Youth, whom he might mould as he pleased. The English and Scots accounting it a sort of miracle that he could live so long without abandoning himself to some person, strove with emulation to give him a Favorite, without his perceiving it, by causing all the Youths of their Nation, whom they thought most capable of gaining his heart, to appear in his sight. But hitherto neither had been able to compass their ends. It was not till 1611 that the Scots found means at last to gain the advantage of their Rivals, by giving the King a Favorite of their Nation.

Robert Carr, a young Scotch Gentleman, about twenty years of age, just come from learning his exercises in France, going to Court to wait on the Lord Hay, his Countryman, to whom he was recommended, that Lord had no sooner cast his eyes on him, but he imagined him a fit person to fix the King's affection. With this view, he resolved to throw him at Court, and surprize the King, by presenting to him, as by chance, this new object. One day at a tilting, he chose Carr to present his Shield and Device to the King, according to custom. The King being on horseback, and Carr advancing to perform his office, his horse by some accident happened to start, throw him down and break his Leg. The King forry for this misfortune, asked who the young man was, and hearing his name was Carr, remembered he had a Page of that name in Scotland, which proved to be the same. This made him still more concerned for his fall, and was the cause of his ordering him to be lodged in the Palace, and all possible care to be taken of him. The tilting was no sooner over, but he visited Carr in his room. Next day he came again. In short, as long as Carr kept his bed, not a day passed but the King spent an hour or two with him. He found in this young Scot no great depth of learning, or experience, yet such a calm outside, as made him think there might be a fit harbour for his most retired thoughts. Wherefore he resolved to fix his inclination upon this object, hoping to render him, by his instructions, as great a man as any of his Ministers. As soon as Carr was recovered, the King made him a Knight, and Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and took the pains himself to teach him Latin. In a word, Carr became a perfect Favorite. All Suits, all Petitions were addrested to him, and no favours granted but by his means. Happily for him [George Hume] Earl of Dunbar, a Scotchman, who was very much esteemed by the King, died about this time. So Carr enjoyed the King's favour without a rival, and was raised to the office of Lord Treasurer of Scotland, vacant by the death of Dunbar.

The King's new inclination hindered him not from interposing in the disputes caused in Holland by the diversity of opinion upon certain religious points, between the Gemarijsts and the Arminians or Remonstrants. These disputes are so well known, that it would be lost time to explain them. It will suffice to relate the occasion of the King's interposing without being applied to, and even with an extraordinary zeal, for the preservation of Orthodoxy in this Church, though foreign and Presbyterian.

(4) It appears from a Letter of the Earl of Salisbury, that the first overtures of this Match came from the Court of Spain. See Wimond's Mem. Tom. 3. p. 291, &c.

(5) There is a formal Act of Parliament being for the establishment of this College. Willon, p. 685. Dr. Wiswood thinks, Archbishop Bancroft was not the Author, though he might be an encourager of this Foundation. Notes on Willon, p. 685. The Founder was Dr. Sutcliffe Dean of Exeter. This College was to consist of a Provost and twenty Fellows, to be chosen by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Vice-Chancellors of the University of Cambridge, and the University of Oxford. It was endowed with 30,000 l. a year, and 4000 l. in Money. His death, which happened about this time, rather than Bancroft's, as has been said in Dr. North's. The site of this College comes in process of time into the King's hands, it was founded a new for old and called St. a. c.

Franciscus Gomarus and Jacobus Arminius, both Divinity-Professors in the University of Leyden, had some years since discovered a difference in opinion, concerning absolute Predestination, Inamissibility of Grace, and some other Theological points. They began their disputes at the end of the last Century; but the war at that time not permitting people to attend to their controversy, it was confined to their Schools till the Year 1608. Gomarus followed the opinion of the first Reformers, and Arminius took a contrary course. At last, the States of Holland perceiving a Schism was forming in their Church, endeavoured to prevent it by means of a conference, which served only to inflame it. The disputes continued; each strengthened his party; and the States, being then employed in the important affair of the Truce, could not attend to this, and prevent its consequences. Arminius dying in 1608, his disciples and followers continued the dispute. At length they presented to the States a Petition, containing the Articles of their Faith; and as, instead of the Term Petitioners, they used that of Remonstrants, they were so called, and gloried in the name. The Gomarists presented likewise their Petition, styling themselves Contra-Remonstrants. For some time the two parties were known by no other names. But afterwards, that of Contra-Remonstrants was scarce heard of, whilst Arminius's followers are still called Remonstrants or Arminians.

Arminius's Professorship was filled with Conradus Vorstius, Divinity-Professor at Steinfort, in the County of Bentheim. This divine had published a Treatise concerning God, which had so exerted the Gomarists against him, that he was obliged to clear himself in a printed Apology from their imputations. But notwithstanding, before he came to Leyden, he was represented as a real Socinian. In 1611, he was attacked by some Divines, who offered to show formidable Errors both in his Treatise concerning God and in his Apology. These two Books being sent into England, the King read them, and presently after sent to Sir Ralph Winwood, his Ambassador at the Hague, a list of the errors he had remarked, ordering him withal to declare to the States, that he was resolved to publish in print, how much he detested such abominable errors, and the allowers and tolerators of them. This was directly falling upon the States, who had acquitted Vorstius. The Ambassador presented therefore on this occasion a Memorial, to which the States returned a modest answer, tho' they had reason to complain of the haughtiness, the King treated them with. Before the King received the answer, he had ordered some of Vorstius's Books to be publicly burnt at London, Oxford, and Cambridge. Notwithstanding all this, Vorstius was received at Leyden, and the King wrote against (1) him to the States with so much vehemence, that, in his opinion, burning was too good for him. Nay he threatened, that in case they continued to tolerate this Professor, he would cause the Churches of England and Scotland to withdraw from the Communion of that of Holland, and exhort all other reformed Churches to follow the example. Winwood when he delivered this Letter, made a Speech to the States, wherein he perfectly seconded his master's intentions.

Though the States of Holland thought it very strange to be thus checked, they believed however it was proper to show a regard to the King of England, though without complying with what he required. To this end, they answered the Ambassador, that they had provisionally ordered, that Vorstius should forbear the functions of his office till the next Assembly upon this affair, and in the mean time remain at Leyden only as an Inhabitant. Winwood took this answer for a denial, and complained in very haughty terms, of their little respect for the King his master. Not long after, the King published a Declaration against Vorstius, wherein he uses the States of Holland very roughly. Then the States, who were unwilling to quarrel with him, ordered Vorstius to remove from Leyden to Gouda, where he had another settlement provided for him.

It is difficult to guess the true cause of the King's great zeal on this occasion. It seems, on the contrary, that he ought not, upon many accounts, to have interposed in a Theological dispute, about which the States had not asked his advice, and which concerned a Church, over which he could not challenge the least jurisdiction. How could he, who in his Speech to both Houses of Parliament, called the questions about Transubstantiation, and the number of the Sacraments, mere School questions, how could he, I say, account the questions concerning Grace in Holland, to be of so much greater moment? Moreover, he who thought the Papists might be tolerated in England, provided they behaved like good Subjects, could not bear that Vorstius should be tolerated in Holland, or even so much as suffered to live (2). These are contradictions which I can only venture to explain by three conjectures. First, as he pretended to be very learned in Divinity, he imagined, that having declared for one of the opinions, he was bound in honour to support it. Secondly, looking up on himself still as Protector of the States, he had a mind to exert his authority on this occasion, and oblige them to do as he required. Thirdly, he was willing to favour Prince Maurice, who had declared for the Gomarists, against the Arminians, who had Pensionary Bornvoet at their head. I return to the affairs of England (3).

The King's fondness for his new Favorite continually and swiftly increased. The favour the King loaded him with, seemed to exceed all bounds. Having made him Knight, Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, Lord-Treasurer of Scotland, he created him the 25th of March 1612, Baron of Branhelm, and Viscount Rochester. A month after, he made him Privy-Counsellor, and then Knight of the Garter. Every thing at Court passed through his hands, and whoever desired any favour of the King, was first to make the Viscount Rochester his friend. So many favours heaped on this Favorite, convinced the Ministers and Courtiers, it would be in vain to endeavour to ruin him; and even to attempt it, would be very dangerous. So every one refused to pay his adorations to the person the King was pleased to honour. The Earl of Salisbury, however, was not pleased, to be surpassed by this newcomer, and continually obliged to use all his art to find money, in order to let it shewered on a man whose services were yet so inconsiderable. All the Historians agree, the King was liberal beyond measure, in his presents to his young Favorite, as if he had been possessed of an inexhaustible fountain of Treasure, though he was ever in want. One day, as the story goes, the King having given him an order under his own hand, to receive twenty thousand pounds at the Exchequer, the Lord Treasurer Salisbury, surprised at the immensity of the present, considering how little money there was then in the Treasury, successfully used a Stratagem, to demonstrate to the King, the excess of his bounty. He ordered the money, [all in silver,] to be laid on four tables in a room of his house, and inviting the King to an entertainment, caused him to pass through the room as by accident. The King failed not, as the Lord Treasurer foresaw, to ask, for what all that money was designed; to which Salisbury carefully answered, It was for the Viscount Rochester, according to his Majesty's command. Whether the King understood his meaning, or had not considered the greatness of the present, he said, it was too much for one man, and bid the Treasurer give him but

It is agreed by all, that the King was neither greedy nor first very wisely, as Favorite. He was neither greedy nor insolent; he did ever endeavour to be just, and especially the English, whose friendship he preferred before that of his Countrymen. He had but one great defect, and one friend of that Nation, a Count-German. This conduct rendered him agreeable to the English. The witness Prince of Wales alone, affected sometimes to mortify him, because they were both enamoured of the Countess of Essex, who gave the preference to the Favorite. This was sufficient to gain him the Prince's enmity, who nevertheless, would not be revenged of him. He chose rather to turn into contempt, his love for the Lady, who, as we shall see presently, was not worthy of such a lover. Except this Amour, which proved his ruin, the Favorite carried himself very prudently, being guided by the Counsels of Sir Thomas Overbury, a man of parts and great wisdom, who took care to keep him clear of those rocks, on which Favorites seldom fail to run.

But though the Viscount Rochester, carefully avoided being troublesome, his modesty served only to inflame the King's desire, to render him infinitely rich and powerful. This, added to the many bounties he bestowed on his Courtiers, both English and Scotch, and to the maintenance of three several Courts, threw him perpetually into straits.

His Ministers were incessantly devising means to raise money without a Parliament, of which he would not hear the least mention. It may be easily conceived, these means were not all legal, but that many of them occasioned murmurs among the people, as Monopolies, Benevolences, and Loans. A King of England can very hardly increase his Revenues by such methods, without giving his Subjects cause to believe, he intends to encroach upon their privileges, and James was now but too much suspected of such a design.

The King, to his great misfortune, lost in May the next year 1613, the Earl of Salisbury, who was perfectly acquainted with the affairs of the State, and genius of the English. He was a check to the rest of the Ministers, and hindered them from running upon precipices, the danger whereof they did not know so well as he. Moreover, he had a wonderful art of diverting the King himself from hurtful resolutions, though he did not always succeed (1). The Earl of Suffolk was made Lord Treasurer: but he was very different from the person he succeeded, both for parts and uprightness. Besides, he had a Wife who was very greedy of money, and made no scruple to take bribes with both hands.

During the great tranquillity enjoyed by the King, he caused the body of the Queen his mother to be removed to Henry VII's Chapel at Westminster, from Peterborough, where it was interred at first, and had lain ever since.

About the middle of the year [Robert Chrichton] Lord Sanguier, a Scotch Nobleman, was condemned to be hanged, for hiring two of his Countrymen to murder a Fencing-master (2). The Archbishop of Canterbury and several great men interceded for him in vain. Nothing could prevail with the King to pardon him, who thought this example necessary to curb the insolence of the Scots, who had already committed several outrages in England. His clemency to some had produced such ill effects, that he did not think proper to continue the same course, for fear, in the end, of a general quarrel between the two Nations, which must have been to the disadvantage of the Scots (3).

Howes.

Shortly after, arrived in England a very extraordinary Embassador. Sir Robert Sherley an Englishman, who had served the King of Persia many years in his army, desiring to see his native Country, obtained of that Monarch the character of his Ambassadors, and a Letter of Credit to the King. His instructions were only to pay his compliments to the King, with the offer of a free Trade to the English throughout the Persian Dominions. This Ambassador had passed through the Hague, where he demanded audience of the States, to propose to them a Treaty with the King of Persia. But because he came from Spain, where he had made some stay, the States suspecting, he had some other design, asked to see his instructions, and upon his scrupling to show them, he was desired to withdraw. As he had been also at other Courts, it was believed, he had put the King of Persia in hopes of engaging all the Christian Princes in a war with the Turks, who were preparing to invade him. He had married a Persian Wife, who was delivered of a Son in England, to whom the Queen stood Godmother, and Prince Henry Godfather. After a year's stay in England, he returned into Persia (4).

(1) Wilton gives him this Character: He had great Parts, was very wise, full of honour and bounty, a great lover and rewarder of virtue, and inexcusable in others, so as they did not aspire too high in places, or look too narrowly into his actions. p. 14. Others, who own he was a Man of an incomparable Prudence, as applied to him, what was in other words said of Gregory the Great, that he was the first of Treasurers, and the last good since Queen Elizabeth's days. The worst thing he says to his charge, was, the sale of the Crown Timber, Millions of English Oaks being felled, and sold at vile prices, not only during the Life of the Earl of Salisbury, but all the Reign of King James, to the great detriment of the Navy, the Walls of the Kingdom, p. 461. He also flattered the cream of the King's Manors in many Counties. Wilton, p. 51. He died at Marlborough, on Sunday, May 24, 1613, and was buried at Hatfield. Dugdale's Barons, Vol. III. p. 428.

(2) This young Lord, it seems, having a mind to disgrace one Turner a Fencing Master, in his own Art, had one of his Eyes thrust out by him. Some time after, the King of France asked him, How he lost his Eye? And Sanguier telling him, it was done with a Sword. The King replies, Does the Man live? This question made such an impression upon the young Lord, that at his return to England, he caused Turner to be pitted, at his House in White-Friars, Wilton, p. 688. He was tried in the Court of King's Bench, June 27, and executed before Westminster-hall gate, the 29th. Howes, p. 1002. Of-beron says, it was thought the King would not be prevailed with to pardon Sanguier, as he had done some other of his Countrymen for the like offence, by reason of his Love to the King of France, and not making any reply, when he said in his presence, to one that called out King James, Solomon, that he hoped he was not David the Fidler's Son, p. 457.

(3) Ranjiv Swichee Philip Herbert, the Earl of Pembroke's Brother, over the Face at a Horse-Race, which he not resenting, the King made him a Knight, a Baron, a Viscount, and an Earl in one day. Mr. Edward Hawley of Grey's Inn, coming to Court one day, Maxwell led him out of the room by a Black-firing he wore in his Ear, a fustian then much in use. But this had like to have cost warm blood; not only Grey's Inn Society, but all the Gentry in England, thought themselves concerned in the affront, and hastily threatened to kill Maxwell wherever he met him, if he refused to fight; which to frighten the King, that he sent for the Benchers, and made up the quarrel. One Murray a Scot, killed a Sergeant that came to arrest him; which things, with Sanguier's pitting Turner, and other insolencies, occasioned the following Verses on the Scots:

They Beg our Lands, our Grads, our Livs;
They Swinge our Nobles, and lie with their Wives;
They Pinch our Gentry, and fend for our Benchers;
They stab our Sergeants, and Pistol out Fencers. Osborn, p. 752.

(4) He was second Son to Sir Thomas Sherley of Suffolk, and had been abroad sixteen years, five whereof he had spent in the service of divers Christian Princes, especially the Emperor Rudolphus, who made him a Count of the Empire. He afterwards travelled into Persia, and served that Emperor ten years, who made him General of the Artillery, and gave him in Marriage, the Lady Teresia, Sister to one of the Queens of Persia. He left his young Son in England. Howes, p. 1002.

remove all melancholy objects from his sight, that might constantly renew his concern, or did not think proper to interrupt the diversions prepared for his Daughter's marriage. Drury obeyed him, however, to defer the Nuptials a few weeks, as the Prince's funeral could not be performed till the 7th of December.

Shortly after, the King held a Chapter of the Order of the Garter at Windsor, wherein the Elector Palatine, and Prince Maurice Stadtholder of Holland, were made Knights. They were installed in February following, both on the same day, the one at Windsor, the other at the

the same day, the one at Windsor, the other at the of February, the Elector having been inalled Knight of the Garter [on the 7th.] Nothing was spared to render the entertainments on these occasions as magnificent as possible. To this end the King demanded

Aid-money of his subjects, according to the ancient custom, observed when the Kings married their eldest Daughter. Though it was now a hundred years since this custom had been used, there having been no occasion since the Reign of Henry VII, yet few or none durst refuse to give what the King demanded. Great sums were raised by this means, which were all expended in the marriage (2).

The Elector and the Princess stayed in England till April, during which time there was nothing but entertainments, exercises, and other diversions. The City of London made the new married Couple a splendid feast; after which, the Lord Mayor [and Aldermen] presented the Bride with a Chain of Oriental Pearl, worthy the greatness and riches of that Metropolis (3).

By the departure of the Elector and Eleflore's (4), the Court became a little more quiet, as to public rejoicings, which had held several months without ceasing. But at the same time, a private scene was acting, the Plots whereof began to open this year, but were not quite unravelled till two years after. I mean, the annulling of the Earl of Essex's marriage; his Countess's second marriage with the Viscount Rochester; and the violent death of Sir

Thomas Overbury. As these three incidents did not happen all at once, and by accident, but were gradually brought in, by diabolical practices, it will be necessary to relate some things already passed, and which were deferred, that the thread of the story might not be interrupted.

Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, was, as I observed, a mortal enemy to the late Earl of Essex, and one of the

being but nine years old, did not give Cecil much uneasiness, though the King, at his coming to England, restored him to his estate and honours. Mean while, as this able Minister could not be ignorant of the King's affection for the Father, he was apprehensive, that, one time or other,

he should be made to pay for all his artifices to ruin that Lord. It was chiefly upon this account, that, in order to preserve the King's favour, he judged it proper to unite closely with the Howard Family, by his Son's marriage with the Earl of Suffolk's eldest Daughter (5). After which, perceiving the Earl of Essex to grow up, and fearing he might one day prove a thorn in his side, he believed it for his interest to be reconciled to him, and to confirm the reconciliation with the marriage of this young

Lord to the Earl of Suffolk's second Daughter, younger

Sister of his Daughter-in-law. Besides his own advantage by this alliance, he gave the King the pleasure to see in strict union three families, for which he had the greatest affection; namely, those of Howard, Devereux, and Cecil.

This marriage was accomplished in 1606, the Earl of Essex being then in his fifteenth, and Frances Howard his bride in her thirteenth year. As the married couple were yet very young, their relations thought fit the Earl should travel into France and Germany, till they were both a little more advanced in years. During his absence, his Countess became a perfect beauty, and eclipsed all the Court-La-

In the year 1610.

He found his Countess in the prime of her age and beauty;

but withal, extremely proud of her own merit, by reason of the praises bestowed on her by all. He was himself charmed with her, but met not with that return he expected. She daily coined fresh excuses to delay the consummation of the marriage, and showed as much reluctance as he did eagerness. He bore it patiently for some time, being unwilling to use compulsion, for fear of giving his Bride an aversion to him. Shortly after, he fell dangerously ill of the Small-Pox (6), that his life was despaired of: but the strength of his constitution overcame his distemper, though it was long before he was quite recovered.

In this interval it was that Robert Carr became the King's favorite. When he gained his master's heart, he made a conquest almost at the same time of the Countess of Essex's, who suffered herself to be taken with the charms of this young Scot, and entirely gave herself over to the new passion, without daring however to reveal it to the person that caused it. Mean while, the Earl of Essex finding himself perfectly recovered, pressed his spouse to consent to the consummation of their marriage: but he found her reluctance the greater, as she was enamoured of another. In short, after trying all sorts of ways to prevail with her, without being able to succeed, he had recourse to the Earl of Suffolk his Father-in-law, and entreated him to use his endeavours to vanquish his Daughter's obstinacy. The Earl of Suffolk, surprized at what his Son-in-law told him, sharply reprimanded his daughter, and positively told her, the must resolve to consummate the marriage. Then the Countess, not daring to disobey her Father directly, desired only a little longer delay. She believed, in case she could avoid consummating her marriage with the Earl of Essex, it would not be impracticable to procure a divorce, and then marry the Viscount Rochester. Indeed, the Viscount knew nothing yet of her passion: but he had too good an opinion of her charms, not to hope an easy conquest, as soon as she should have occasion to discover it. On the other hand, the great credit of Rochester and the Earls of Suffolk and Northampton, did not suffer her to question, that if the Favorite undertook to marry her, he would easily accomplish it. But she wanted some time to lay her measures, wherein however she met with great opposition both from her Husband and Father.

In this extremity, not knowing how to proceed, she opened her mind to one Mrs. Turner a Physician's widow, a woman of a dissolute life, and capable of the basest actions. As this woman had no good advice to give her, she persuades her to apply to one Dr. Foreman, who passed for a Conjuror. He had perhaps some secrets of nature, but was not sorry to be thought skilled in the Magick-Art, because many women came to consult him, and paid him well for it (7). To this man the Countess of Essex told her secret, and desired two things of him: First, to manage it so, that the Earl of Essex should be incapable to consummate his marriage. Secondly, to make the Viscount Rochester in love with her. Foreman very confidently promised both, and gave her certain Powders for her Husband to take, and to be put amongst his linnen, with instructions how she should behave to him. As for Rochester, he himself undertook to perform upon him the necessary operations.

Mean while, the Countess could no longer disobey her Father's command, so was forced at last to cohabit with her husband. But though they lay together, the marriage was not consummated, whether it was owing to Foreman's powders, or to some other more effectual means used by the Countess to frustrate her husband's efforts. However this be, the Earl of Essex imagined, that his living in London and at Court might contribute to his misfortune, and therefore resolved to carry his Lady to [Chartley in Staffordshire] a country-seat, about a hundred miles from London. The Countess could not be excused from going with her Lord: but all the while she was there, shut her self up in a room, and would not so much as suffer the light of the sun to enter, giving herself over to an excessive melancholy, whether out of vexation or policy, the better to deny her husband. After this manner she lived some time with her husband in the Country, who did not understand the meaning of this strange behaviour. In the mean while, she wrote several Letters to Mrs. Turner and

Foreman, telling them, She was afraid Foreman's Powders were not strong enough: her husband was as lusty as ever: it would be very difficult for her to hold out for ever, and if she should chance to yield, she should become the most unfortunate woman in the world: She intreated them to free her from her misery, and they should have what money they desired. These Letters were found in Foreman's Study, and read in open Court, upon an occasion which I shall mention presently (1).

At last, the Earl of Essex seeing himself in so uneasy a situation, resolved to carry his Lady back to London, and give her full leave to live as she pleased. He began to perceive there was something extraordinary in her carriage, which he chose rather to be ignorant of than endeavour to discover.

The Countess being returned to Court, and mistress of herself, no longer delayed to let Rochester know what she endured for his sake. There was no occasion to use Magick to produce the desired effect. He was young, and she the finest Lady in the Kingdom. So, any advances from the Countess, were more than sufficient to kindle a flame in the Favorite's breast. As soon as they began to understand one another, affligations became frequent. They were at first very private: but in time, the two Lovers used little caution, that not a Courier was a stranger to their amours. The King very probably was informed of it, since nothing delighted him more than to hear of the Love-Intrigues of his Courtiers. The Earl of Essex, who had also notice of it, chose to shut his eyes, and scorn an object to unworthy of his Love.

The Countess of Essex having succeeded in her intended conquest, and finding herself sure of her Lover's heart, would not allow his passion time to cool. Every thing seemed to favour the execution of her designs, that is, her divorce from the Earl of Essex, and marriage with the Viscount Rochester. Essex saw her no more, and seemed to concern himself very little about her, and Rochester was so beloved by the King, that, in all appearance, nothing would be impracticable. So the let her lover know her desires, and without much difficulty brought him to second her projects. But as he was wont to impart his most serious affairs to Overbury, he believed he ought not to conceal this from him, and the more, as he expected from him some good advice to accomplish it. But so far was Overbury from approving such a project, that he used his utmost endeavours to dissuade him from it. He represented to him the injustice and indignity of the thing, his danger of being ruined by such an action; and lastly, the little value he ought to have for a woman, who, though married, scrupled not to throw herself into the arms of another man: That she had already lost her reputation in the world, and when she should be his wife, all the dishonour would reflect upon him (2). Rochester, who did not expect so great opposition from his Friend, could not forbear showing some resentment. He had the address however to contain himself so far, as not to give him room to think he would proceed notwithstanding his advice, and continued, as usual, to communicate to him his other affairs. The Countess was in a violent passion when she heard Overbury's advice, and from that moment ceased not to excite her Lover to revenge. She was the more incensed against Overbury, as she feared, that being acquainted with the design, he would labour to render it abortive. In short, Rochester was so complaisant and blind, as to promise her to sacrifice his Friend. He might easily have dismissed him: but it would have been too dangerous not to ruin him entirely, after trusting him with the secret. It is pretended, that to strike the more surely, he consulted the Earl of Northampton, Uncle to the Countess of Essex, and by his advice used this artifice to ruin him. He entreated to the King Overbury's abilities: but intimated withal, that he took too much upon him, and was grown intolerably insolent; and therefore he should be very glad to have him removed, by some honorable employment, praying his Majesty to send him Ambassador to Russia (3). The King liking the proposal, appoints instantly Overbury for the Embassy. Rochester having proceeded thus far, acquaints Overbury with the King's intention, and pretending he could not live without him, entreats him to refuse the employment, promising to procure him a better at Court. He added, that indeed he believed it would not be in his power to hinder the King from being angry at first, who, probably would resent his refusal, but he did not question to appease him in a few days. Overbury fell into the snare, and when the King sent for him to acquaint him with the employment designed for him, he most humbly besought his Majesty to make choice of some other person. As soon as he was retired, Rochester aggravated his pride and insolence, in daring thus to refuse his master's gracious offer, adding, it was requisite to chastise him: That he was himself affected by it, for he should be infallibly blamed for using his interest for him. In short, by Rochester's instances, the King commanded Overbury to be sent to the Tower (4). Some days before, the Favorite had caused Sir George Elways, his creature, to be made Lieutenant of the Tower (5). Overbury was closely confined in a room, and not suffered to keep one of his servants, or receive any visits from his relations and friends, a rigor not used even towards the greatest offenders. He was now where the Viscount Rochester and the Countess of Essex withheld him, in order to dispatch him more easily. However, there were still some difficulties. It could not be done by stabbing, because the Lieutenant of the Tower, who is to answer for the prisoners, would not have suffered it, and besides, a murder openly committed in one of the King's prisons, would have made too much noise in the world. It was resolved therefore to make use of poison. To that end Mrs. Turner provided a truly person, one Weston (6), who had been a servant to her Husband, and Sir Thomas Monson recommended this man to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to wait on the prisoner as footman. But even this was not sufficient. Whatever was brought to Overbury to eat being dressed in the Lieutenant's kitchen, it was almost necessary to engage him in the Plot. Some say, the Earl of Northampton spoke to him of it, hinting that every thing was done with the King's privacy. Others affirm, the Lieutenant refusing to be concerned in the crime, and not daring however to discover it, by reason of the Quality of the Parties, took care to seize the victuals sent from time to time by the Viscount Rochester to the Prisoner, and throw them into the House of Office (7); and this is most likely, since, otherwise, Overbury would have been soon dispatched. He could not however hinder Weston from giving him a certain Jolly sent by Sir Thomas Monson, which almost killed him. Whereupon the Lieutenant of the Tower was still more careful, that Overbury should be seen but by Weston alone. This was a check upon Weston, because he perceived none could be accused but himself: wherefore he durst not make such haste as Overbury's enemies desired. There arose however an inconvenience from this delay, which was that every one was surprized, to see the King use so great rigor upon a friend of the Viscount Rochester's for so slight an offence, if the refusing to go in Embassy to Russia could be deemed any crime at all. It could not be conceived, and it was vainly endeavoured to discover the cause of the extreme severity with which Overbury was treated.

Whilst the unfortunate Prisoner languished in his confinement, the Viscount Rochester and the Countess of Essex were thinking of executing their project, that is of annulling the Countess of Essex's Marriage, that she might afterwards espouse the Viscount. To effect this, without Rochester's appearing to be concerned, the Earl of Northampton, who was in the two Lovers' secrets, undertook to speak to the King. Some say the Viscount Rochester had already acquainted the King with the Countess's design to be divorced, and had prayed his Majesty to procure him the Lady when the Marriage should be dissolved: but I do not know if this be well attested. However, the Earl of Northampton presented to the King the Countess of Essex's Petition to this effect (8): That the Earl her Husband being incapable of consummating their Marriage, she besought his Majesty to let her Complaint be examined, and if found well-grounded, to have liberty to marry another. Upon this petition, the King commissioned the Archbishop, several other Bishops, and some Laymen, to hear and determine the affair. This Court proceeded very gravely to the trial of the cause, and entered into such particular and secret examinations, as did not very well become

(8) Dr. Franklin, Author of the Annals of James I. says, the Earl of Suffolk presented the Petition. Here he begins his account, without any mention of what went before.

Clergymen. The Earl of Essex being examined, briefly answered, he had never consummated his Marriage, neither did he think he should ever be able to consummate it; but did not feel the same inability with regard to other women. Though this confession greatly favoured the Countess's cause, the Court deemed it proper to be certain of the truth by another method, and ordered the Countess to be inspected by a Jury of Matrons, assisted by some Midwives. This inspection being made, the Matrons declared she was a Virgin. But it is pretended, the Countess, under colour of saving her modesty, was permitted to appear in a veil before the matrons, and that Mrs. Pines a young Gentlewoman of her age and stature, was introduced in her place (1). I omit numberless circumstances of this trial, which are to be found in several Authors, and which it is indecent to relate. It suffices to say in a word, that by the sentence, the Marriage was dissolved, contrary to the opinion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who even published his reasons against it. But the King himself took the pains to answer the Archbishop's arguments, and to maintain the justice of the Sentence, upbraiding the Prelate with founding his opinion on Puritan Principles. Dr. Bilson Bishop of Winchester, one of the Judges, having spoken very strenuously to prove the nullity of the Marriage, his Son was soon after knighted. But the publick was so malicious as to call him Sir Nullity Bilson. This affair made great noise, and brought little honour to the Judges, most of whom could not be ignorant of the Countess of Essex's ill character (2).

If after her Divorce, the Countess had married any other than the Viscount Rocheſter, her conduct might have been easily justified. This was not the first marriage annulled upon the like account. But the sentence was hardly published, when the Viscount openly made his addresses to the Lady, and their Marriage was quickly concluded. The King not only gave his Favorite leave to marry the Countess, but also made him Earl of Somerset on the 4th of November, that the second Husband might be of equal rank with the first. The Nuptials were solemnized a month after with such extraordinary rejoicings, that had the King's own Son been married, there could not have been greater. The City of London signalized itself on this occasion, by a splendid entertainment which the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen gave the new-married Couple, and to which the King, Queen, and whole Court were invited. For some time nothing was talked of but banquets, balls, masquerades, and other diversions, in honour of the new Earl of Somerset's nuptials.

These things gave occasion to the disaffected to talk freely of the King. They reported, that in Scotland the Earl of Arran, formerly the King's favorite, married the Earl of Arbuthnot's Daughter, having procured, by the like means, and on the same account, a dissolution of that Lady's marriage with the Earl of March. It was thereby insinuated, that the King had taught his favorite the way to attain his Mistress. But these insinuations reached not the King's ear, those about him not being so ill Courtiers as to carry him such reports.

Whilst the Countess of Essex's marriage was annulling, the unfortunate Overbury was closely confined, without having the comfort of seeing any of his friends (3), as if he had been guilty of the most heinous of crimes. He had been extremely sick with the poison that was given him, without knowing the cause of his illness. But when he heard what was transacting, he no longer doubted concerning the author of his misery. In this lamentable state, he saw no other remedy but to write to the favorite, intreating him to deliver him out of his wretched condition (4). Rocheſter answered, that the King being still highly incensed, he had not yet been able to speak in his behalf, but hoped to do it within a few days. Nay, it is said, he sent a certain Powder in this Letter, as a sure remedy to cure his distemper. But Overbury was so wife as not to take it (5). In short, the two Lovers being impatient to see a man live so long, who might one day be their ruin, caused an imposedon Clyster to be administered by one Franklin an Apothecary's Prentice, which ended his miseries with his life. Some say, that William, and Franklin seeing the extraordinary effects of the Clyster, and fearing if they suffered the poison to operate any longer it would leave marks on the body, which would rise in judgment against them, smothered him with the bed-cloaths. When he was dead, he was speedily buried, without any ceremony, and a report spread, that dying of the Pox, he was so rotten, he could not be kept any longer. This was the Earl of Northampton's account in his letter to the favorite, to acquaint him with Overbury's death, admiring withal, the justice of God upon such wicked instruments (6).

The Earl of Somerset thought it a great advantage to have dispatched Overbury. But on the other hand, he found himself much more embarrassed in the management of affairs, since he was no longer assisted by that faithful Counsellor. As his small experience rendered every thing difficult, he was forced to chuse another friend, and it was the Earl of Northampton that supplied Overbury's place. But there was a great deal of difference between these two Counsellors. Overbury's sole view was to procure his friend honour and glory, and the Earl of Northampton's chief aim was to make use of his credit to countenance the Catholics. Ever since his being in favour, he had always protected them to the utmost of his power, as was obvious to all the world. But when he came to rule the favorite, he acted without any reserve. As he was Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Jesuits and Romish Priests could safely land there without being examined at their arrival. By this means their number so increased in a very short space, that the people loudly murmured at it, and cast the blame on the Earl of Northampton. Wherefore, to silence those who talked too freely, he took out a Writ of Scandalum Magnatum against some of them. He believed, it was not possible to convict him of a thing founded only upon common report, and that, such evidence not being valid in Law, he should silence his enemies by the punishment of some of the most forward to speak against him. But the Archbishop of Canterbury broke his measures, by producing a letter under the Earl's own hand to Cardinal Beilamine, wherein he said, That however the situation of the Affairs of England, and the instances of the King compelled him to be a Protestant in show, nevertheless his heart stood firm with the Catholics, and he would be ever ready to countenance them to the utmost of his power. Upon this letter the parties accused were discharged. Nay the King so reprimanded the Earl, that he retired to his Country-house, where he died soon after (7). He declared in his last Will and Testament, that he had always been a Catholic, and would die in that Religion. Thus several Historians speak of him. But the anonymous Author of the Annals of James I. and Charles I. who endeavours to vindicate these Princes, their Ministers and Government, in every thing without exception, forgets not to justify also the Earl of Northampton. He says among other things, that the charge of being concerned in Overbury's murder was only a rumour spread after his death, as if that were a certain proof of his innocence. As to the Earl's Religion, the same Author says, He died suspected more Catholic than five will think reasonable, though in the form of a Church-Papist (8).

1614. The Court was not so well affected to the Puritans as to the Papists. The Puritans were considered as enemies to the King and to Monarchy, but the Papists as hearty withers that the King might meet with no opposition to his will. This was sufficient to induce the Court to countenance the latter, and cause the former to endure continual mortifications. In the spring this year, some Presbyterian Families resolved to go and settle in New-England, to enjoy there that peace which they could not find at home. The Author, I just mentioned concerning the Earl of Northampton, says, these people were notorious Schismatics of several Sects, known by the general name of Puritans, which term included Good and Bad in their distinct kinds, truly and ingeniously distinguished into the Puritan-Knave, and the Knave-Puritan. As it was not impossible, by the increase of Presbyterian Families, the English Plantations might become nurseries for Non-Conformists, the Court gave orders not to let them depart. But afterwards, such as desired to remove beyond sea, being examined, some were allowed to pursue their voyage, and others were detained as surerics for those that went away.

It was now four years since the King had called a Parliament. It was a great comfort to him, to have no disputes with a House of Commons, ever ready to complain of Grievances, and take occasion to examine the conduct of the Sovereign or his Ministers. He liked it much better to command absolutely and without controul. But this was attended with great inconvenience. He was forced continually to invent new methods to raise money, and these methods, grounded upon absolute authority, caused loud murmurs among the people. Neither did these methods bring in sufficient sums for the King's occasions, who loved magnificence, and was always ready to give. Hence sprung his wants, which incessantly increased, his Revenues, as well ordinary as extraordinary, not sufficing for his expences. He seemed, however, to have an inexhaustible fund, so profuse was he, without considering how he should recover what was unnecessarily given. The following instance of his bounty may serve to show his character. Being one day in the Gallery [at Whitehall,] and none with him but Sir Henry Rich, afterwards Earl of Holland, and James Maxwell [one of his Bed-Chambers,] some Porters passed by with three thousand pounds, going to the Privy-purse. Rich seeing the money, turned to Maxwell, and whispered him. The King perceiving it, asked what he said? Maxwell told him, Rich should think himself very happy if he had such a sum. Whereupon the King calling to the Porters, ordered them to carry the money to Rich's lodgings, saying, at the same time, I am sure you have a great purchase; but I am more delighted in giving you the money, than you can be in receiving it.

If the King had been thus lavish out of his abundance or out of his savings, his generosity must have been laudable. But unhappily, in order to be thus profuse to a few private persons, he gained the ill-will of all the rest of the Nation, and was forced to use, to raise money, several extraordinary methods, which were looked upon as so many Grievances, and loudly complained of. Moreover, he was obliged, either not to call a Parliament, or to quarrel with the House of Commons. James was however the Solomon of the age, the wisest, most prudent, and most just of Kings. These at least are the epithets generally given him, and which are even to be found in several Histories penned since the Restoration of Charles II.

The King's excessive liberality reducing him continually to straits, he had at last recourse to a project, formed by the late Earl of Salisbury; namely, to create Knights Barons, a sort of middle Nobility, between Barons and Knights Bachelors. Their number was not to exceed two hundred: but the King, at the first promotion, made only a hundred (1). To purchase this honour, which was to be hereditary, every Baronet was obliged to pay to the King a thousand pounds. But in order to give some colour to this new institution, every Baronet was obliged by his Patent, to maintain thirty foot Soldiers in Ireland for three years, at eight-pence a day each Soldier (2). Afterwards it was hinted to them, that if they would compound with the King, and pay the whole sum at once, part should be abated, and the King would maintain his troops in Ireland himself; and there was not one but what accepted this offer. The Author of the Annals before-mentioned, affirms, that the King received only about a hundred thousand pounds of the Baronets, and that the maintenance of the troops in Ireland cost him much more. So, according to him, this new Order was instituted merely to ease the subjects.

Besides this method, the King made use of others to fill his empty coffers, without being obliged to have recourse to the Parliament. I shall only mention them, without pretending to determine whether the King exceeded his Prerogative or not. 1. The King, by his Letters Patents, granted Monopolies to private persons, exclusive of all others, and raised great sums by these sorts of favours. 2. He issued out Commissions for reviving obsolete Laws, for making men who could expend forty pounds a year, to compound for not being knighted. Formerly, an estate of forty pounds a year in land was considerable: and therefore the owners of such an estate were deemed proper to be made Knights, and as such, to serve the King in his wars, or find Soldiers. But in King James I.'s time, such a revenue was inconsiderable: there were infinite numbers who had more, but not desiring to be Knights, chose rather to give the King money, than be obliged to receive an honour, which rendered them very dependent. 3. The King made a certain number of Knights of Nova Scotia (3), each of which paid him such a sum. 4. The dignities of Baron, Viscount, and Earl, had a fixed price set upon them. The King received for making a Baron ten thousand pounds, for a Viscount fifteen thousand, and twenty thousand for an Earl. Thus, whoever had money, might be made a Peer of the Realm. 5. The same honours were rated likewise in Scotland and Ireland, though at lower prices (4). 6. Those who had defective Titles, were obliged to compound with the King for rectifying them, otherwise they were declared null and void (5). 7. The Star-Chamber condemned in excessive fines, to the King's use, such as were cited thither. I have already related some instances, and shall have occasion to take notice of some others hereafter. 8. To all this, may be added the sums levied by the King upon his subjects, when the Prince his Son was knighted, and his Daughter married.

He would have had also a good means of raising money, if he had demanded of the United-Provinces the sums that were due to him. But if we believe certain Historians, he durst not claim his debt, for fear of engaging in a war in case of refusal. A more probable reason might be given, by saying, the places he held in Holland and Zealand kept the States in a sort of subjection, if he had not shown, two years after, that this was not the true reason, by receiving his money when offered him by the States.

In fine, the King's revenue not answering his expences, recourse was to be had to a Parliament. The Earl of Somerset, having with him neither Overbury nor the Earl of Northampton, was at a loss how to find the King money, and the Lord Treasurer his Father-in-law was no less embarrassed. All extraordinary means seeming to be exhausted, they proposed to the King the calling of a Parliament. To induce him to it, they put him in hopes, that by their interest and management, the majority of the Commons should be at his devotion. The King was very loth to consent: but at length was persuaded, and a Parliament was summoned to meet the 1st of April (6).

This Parliament consisted not of such members as the King was made to expect. The people, who were discontented, instead of being gained by the Court, chose representatives of a quite different character from what the ministers desired. The very first day, the King demanded an aid of money for the marriage of his Daughter, and told the Commons, after dispatching that affair, he would give them leave to examine the grievances of the Nation. But the Commons thought proper to invert the method prescribed them, and begin with the grievances. Instead therefore of granting the money first, as the King expected, they examined to what uses the Revenues of

(1) The first Baronets were created on May the 22d. 1621, by Patent. See British Compend. Part. II. p. 328. They were to have their Privileges to them and their Heirs for ever: Place before all Knights Bachelors, and of the bath, and all Baronets; to be impleaded by addition of Baronet, and the title Sir, and their Wives Lady; the King shall not create any degree under the Dignity of a Baron, that shall be superior or equal to them; no more to be made, but the full number of two hundred, until some die; but the younger Sons of Viscounts and Barons (by decree of the King and Council upon Controversy) were adjudged to take Place before them; and that their Heirs Male at one and twenty shall be knighted, and shall have either a Canton in their Coat of Arms, or in a Scotchman, at their Election, the Arms of Ulster, Argent, a Hand Gule; their Place in the King's Armies to be in the gule, near the King's Standard, for defence thereof. Annals of King James, p. 8. There were made at first but ninety: Of whom Sir Nicolas Bacon, of Redgrave in Suffolk, was the first.

(2) Which comes just to one thousand ninety five pounds, and not two thousand, as Rapin says by mistake. And it has been customary for those who have since been admitted into this Order without Money, to have a Receipt endorsed on their Patent for the said Sum of 1095 l. to be appropriated to the same use; and for want of such Endorsement, several Baronets were compelled in King Charles the Second's Time to pay 1095 Pounds.

(3) This Order of Baronets was first erected for advancing the Plantations of Nova Scotia in America, and for settling a Colony there, to which the aid of these Knights was appropriated. It was intended in 1621, but not actually founded till 1625. See British Compend. p. 502.

(4) Scotch Honours of the same Title, to have the precedence of an Irish, as a Scotch Baron, Viscount, or Earl, to have the precedence of an Irish; and though an English Honour of like degree, had the precedence of either of the other, yet if either of the other had a higher Title, he should precede an English Peer under a less; as a Scotch or Irish Viscount, shall precede an English Baron. Coke, Vol. I. p. 66.

the Crown had been put. The result was, that the King had bestowed on the Scots excessive grants both in land and money, and that the Scots having fold these lands to the English, had conveyed the money into Scotland, to the great detriment of England. If what the King had given to the English had been as carefully examined, it would have been found ten-times more, by the confession of the Historians themselves (1): but herein was not seen the same inconvenience.

Then, the House inquired into the causes of the increase of Popish Recusants; since it should rather seem, that the Laws enacted after the Gun-Powder-Plot, should have very much lessened their number. The first cause appeared to be the King's admitting into his Council Popish Lords, publicly known for such. A second was, the negotiations abroad for the marriage of the late Prince Henry and Prince Charles with Popish Princesses.

After this, the Commons took into consideration the Monopolies authorized and licensed by the King's Letters-Patents, to the great prejudice of Trade; and the extraordinary Levies of money, without the consent of the Parliament. Upon all these grievances, it was resolved to represent them in a Petition to his Majesty, and to pray him to redress them, and especially to hinder the future settlement of the Scots in England.

The carriage of the Commons was so different from that of the Courtiers, who never spoke of the King but with admiration, that his Majesty had not patience to bear it. So, on the 7th of June he dissolved the Parliament, after a Session of about two months, wherein not one Statute was enacted. The Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but the King committed to prison several members of the House of Commons, who had spoken the most freely, without admitting them to Bail (2).

The Parliament not answering the King's expectation, and his Exchequer being empty, there was a necessity of recurring to new expedients to fill it. But before we speak of these expedients, it will not be amiss to show one of the chief causes of the King's being reduced to straits. I mean the Electress his daughter's marriage, which had cost him very near a hundred thousand pounds, according to the following account, inserted in his book by the Anonymous author of the Annals above-mentioned.

The King loves a Benevolence Weldon,
p. 696.

The King resolving to call no more Parliaments, extraordinary means were to be devised to supply his expenses, his ordinary Revenues being far from sufficient. To that end, certain persons diligently searched into history, to discover what had been done by former Kings in the like cases, or when there was not time to call a Parliament. Among all these methods, the Court chose the way of Benevolence, invented by Edward IV., abolished by Richard III., and once revived, if I am not mistaken, by the Parliament itself in the Reign of Henry VIII.

(1) Of this Sir Anthony Weldon gives a notable Instance. He says, Salisbury would make the Scots buy Books of Fee-Farms, some 100 l. per Annum, some one hundred Marks, and would compound with them for a thousand pounds, which they were willing to embrace, because they were sure to have them paid without any controul or charge; so then would Salisbury fill up this Book with such prime Land, as should be worth ten or twenty thousand pounds, which, as Treasurer, he might easily do, and so enriched himself infinitely, and cast the envy on the Scots, in whose names these Books appeared, and are still upon Record to all Posterity, p. 60.

(2) These were Obtuse. — Nevel Lord Abrogareny's Son, Wentworth, Jo. Haskins. Canden's Ann. This, (say C. &c.), was the greatest Violation of the Privileges of Parliament, that ever was done by any King of England before, p. 79.

(3) Though this account seems of little moment, it may serve however to show the liberal Temper of the King, and his Opinion that the Parliament was obliged to find him Money for these Expenses. Rapin.

(4) He arrived at London, July 22. and embarked at Graveland, August 1. Houart, p. 1012.

(5) Or else from an apprehension, that the King's Love and Company was alienated from her, by this masculine Conversation and Intimacy. But it was, more probably, from a suspicion of his being concerned in the Prince's death, for he would never see him after it. Weldon, p. 697.

(6) He was made March 29, 1614. Canden's Ann.

(7) He cut a Channel from the two great Springs of Chadwell and Amwell, near Ware in Hertsfordshire; in which the Water is run into a low, e Pond at Iljington, and from thence in Elm Pipes to all places of the City. This new River runs under near eight hundred Bridges. Howe, p. 115.

Nevertheless, the author of the Annals pretends, that James only followed the constant example of all his Predecessors, and upon these pretended examples, and the custom in France and Spain, undertakes to vindicate him. But there would be too many things to be said upon this, if it should be insisted on.

The resolution being taken not only to demand but extort a Benevolence, all the Sheriffs were ordered by the Council, to ask of all private persons within their district a free gift, in proportion to the King's wants. At the same time, they were expressly commanded to return to the Council the names of such as should refuse to contribute, or not give according to their abilities. This shows the King did not mean, the Benevolence should be entirely voluntary. This method however was not so successful as the King had expected. The more eager the Sheriffs and Court-Party were to excite the people's liberality, the more induracious were others to dissuade them from it, by setting before them the consequences. So, if we may believe the author of the Annals, the Benevolence procured the King but 52900 l. which yet (continues he) maddened the ill-minded man (Pillar), so some called them, to the Kingdom's Liberties always plotters to the Kingdom's Miseries, who being ashamed to be out-done in honesty and honour, they justly drew upon themselves a mark of Malignity. — And yet they would be meddling, devising poor Arguments, to pretend it was against the subjects liberties, though accustomed evermore by examples of all former Sovereigns. Others speak of it very differently, and represent this way of raising money upon the people, as a real extortion and encroachment on the nation's liberties. Thus do King James's Historians contradict one another, not in facts but in principles, some deeming illegal, what others maintain to be the undoubted prerogative of the Crown.

The money arising to the King from the Benevolence, tho' no great sum, came however very seasonably for the King of Denmark's reception, who made him a second visit, with a train of forty persons only. During the fortnight he stayed in England (4), entertainments and diversions never ceased.

Shortly after, the King received with great pomp the Russian Ambassador sent by the Czar, to desire him to be mediator between him and the King of Sweden, on account of their differences.

Hitherto, the Earl of Somerfet possessed the King's heart so entirely, that the Queen herself grew jealous. Some say, the inwardly grieved for the death of Prince Henry, and suspected him to be the author. Others say only, that his greatness had so blinded the Favorite, that he was wanting in his respect to the Queen (5). However this be, she had conceived a very violent hatred of him, and to ruin him the more easily, she thought proper to gain Sir Ralph Winwood, who was still Secretary of State (6), but without exercising the office, at least in important affairs, because the Earl of Somerfet had seized the management of every thing. Winwood readily joined with the Queen to ruin this Lord, who left him only the title of Secretary. This was a preparative to the revolution which happened the next year.

Before I end this year, I must not forget to mention the memorable undertaking of Mr. Hugh Middleton, citizen and goldsmith of London, who having an Act of Parliament for his warrant, found means to bring water from Hertsfordshire, to the principal parts of the City, for the convenience of the Inhabitants (7).

The King was wont twice a year to take a journey into some part of the Kingdom. These journeys were called Progresses, one whereof was made in winter, the other in summer. In his winter-progress, in the year 1615, he passed through Cambridge, where the Scholars entertained him with a Comedy called Ignoramus, which ridiculed the Common-Law. Nothing could be more diverting to the King. The Civil-Law, or the Laws made by the supreme authority of the Roman Emperors, appeared to him of much greater value than the Common or Statute Law, and he could not forbear now and then to speak of these last with contempt. Wherefore he was so delighted with this Play, that he caused it to be acted twice in his presence, during his short stay at Cambridge.

From an original painted by Ger^d Menthem^d in the Regal apartments at St James's By J. G. Ad. & Co. del.

At this Play it was that the King was struck with a new object, which made the same impression upon his mind as Robert Carr did the first time he saw him (1). This was George Villiers, a young Gentleman who appeared before him with all the advantages of a good mien, a fine shape, and a handsome and well-made suit of cloaths. Every one perceived he looked upon this young man with pleasure, and from that moment it was thought Villiers might supplant the Earl of Somerfet. And indeed with this view it was that certain Lords had brought him before the King, and placed him at the Play just opposite to him.

George Villiers was of a good and antient family in Leicestershire, Son of Sir George Villiers (2), [of Brokeby] by a second Wife, who bore him three Sons, of whom this George was the second (3). After the death of Sir George, his Widow married Sir Thomas Compton, Brother of the Lord Compton (4). As George Villiers was but a younger Son of a second bed, his fortune could be but small; nevertheless, his mother took great care of his education. After he had finished his studies, he sent him into France, where he made himself perfect master of the French tongue, with all the exercises proper for a Gentleman, and especially dancing, wherein he excelled. When he returned from his travels, his mother sent him to Court to make himself known, and endeavour to procure himself friends and a place (5). He no sooner appeared there, but the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Bedford, and some other Lords, enemies to the favorite, and who fought his destruction, fancied this young man might be subservient to their design. They knew the King sufficiently, to hope he would be taken with the outward accomplishments of this newcomer. To this end, they liberally supplied him wherewith to deck himself and attract the King's eyes. Their project succeeded to their expectation. The King being at the Play, looked with admiration on George Villiers, and could not help showing some signs of his growing inclination. He took care however to conceal it as much as possible, not to alarm the Earl of Somerfet: nevertheless he resolved from that instant to have Villiers near his person, imagining he might easily keep both. So, to have time to manage this affair, he privately caused Villiers to purchase a Cup-bearer's place, and to be instructed how to behave.

What care soever the King might take to conceal his new inclination, the Courtiers did not fail to discover it. Somerfet, as most concerned, was harder to be deceived than the rest. His office of Lord Chamberlain giving him a great authority over the King's Servants, he did not want opportunities to vex and mortify Villiers, who bore all with patience; and the King feigned not to perceive it. But at last, an accident happened which suffered not the King to dissemble any longer. It was customary for the Cup-bearer whose turn it was to be in waiting, to have the first place at the Table where the Cup-bearers dined. Villiers having begun his month, sat at the upper-end during the whole time of his service, without any opposition. But offering to sit in the same place after his month was expired, the person, whose turn it was to wait, rudely thrust him from thence, which greatly confounded him. Some days after, the same Cup-bearer carrying a glass of wine to the King, let it fall accidentally or designedly on Villiers, who gave him a box on the ear. It is a Law of a long standing at Court, that whoever strikes another in the King's Palace, is to lose his right-hand, with many formalities. It is the Lord Chamberlain's business to see crimes of this nature punished, and the Earl of Somerfet failed not to do all that lay in his power to have the Law executed to the utmost rigour. But the King granted Villiers a pardon, without enjoining any satisfaction to the party offended. This was the first public mark of his affection for Villiers.

From thenceforward, the Earl of Somerfet's enemies laboured incessantly to ruin him in the King's favour, in which they could not better succeed, than by cherishing the King's new inclination by immoderate commendations of Villiers. The truth is, that even before he had seen Villiers, the King began to be weary of Somerfet, who was not so agreeable as when he was first taken into favour. Since his marriage with the Countess of Essex, he was grown very melancholy, of which probably Overbury's death was the cause, and become more careless of his person and dress. He had lost that vivacity which rendered him so agreeable to the King, and his temper, now sullen and fullen, induced him harshly to oppose some wanton tricks which were now and then played in the King's Anti-Chamber, and wherein his Majesty took a singular delight. Nay, he was become so interested, that he did nothing for any one without money. His enemies did not forget to inform the King, or hint the same to him, knowing how much it might conduce to make him forget his favour, since there was no vice more contrary to the King's humour than avarice. The Queen for her part missed no opportunity to do him ill offices: So that, in all appearance the project of making Villiers the King's favorite was formed upon the visible signs of the Earl of Somerfet's decline.

The whole Court perceived the alteration in the King since he had Villiers about him, and every one strove to thrust the old favorite down the precipice. The best way to that end, was to oblige the King to declare for Villiers; but there was a great obstacle to be removed. The King, by a very gross artifice, would have no favorite but of the Queen's recommending, that in case she complained of him afterwards, he might say, he had received him at her hands. This was the King's Turn, who fancied by such a device, to impose upon the Queen and the whole Court. The business therefore was to prevail with the Queen, to recommend Villiers to the King. But she was already prejudiced against this young man, and not seeing with the King's eyes, perceived nothing in him worthy of so great an advancement. Perhaps too, she had cast her eyes on some other, to procure him this Preference. Somerfet's enemies knowing how the Queen stood affected to Villiers, thought the Archbishop of Canterbury alone able to persuade her to what they desired. The Archbishop, who neither loved nor valued the Earl of Somerfet, readily undertook to speak to the Queen: but his first attempt was in vain. The Queen, who was perfectly acquainted with the King's temper, told the Prelate, that neither he, nor they who set him on, knew what they did; adding, I know the King better than you all, for if this young man be once brought in, the first persons he will plague, must be you that labour for him; yea, I shall have my part also. The King will teach him to despise and hardly intreat us all, that he may seem to be beholden to none but himself.

For this time the Archbishop could not prevail with the Queen; but afterwards he so pressed her, that at length he desired the King to receive Villiers as a favorite. The King, who only waited for this, sent immediately for Villiers, knighted him with the Prince of Wales's sword, and ordered him to be sworn Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber. Somerfet, hearing of it, came immediately, and intreated the King to make Villiers only a Groom; but the Archbishop and other Lords besought the Queen to complete the work; and at last Villiers was admitted to the Post ordered him by the King (6). As soon as he was out of the King's presence, he waited upon the Archbishop, and acknowledging himself indebted to him for his good fortune, desired his instructions how to behave. The Prelate told him, he had three lessons to give him: First, to pray without ceasing for the King's prosperity, and for grace to serve his master faithfully. Secondly, to labour continually to preserve a good union between the King, Queen, and Prince. Thirdly, to tell the King nothing but truth. Then he caused him to repeat these three lessons before him, to see if he retained them. The King hearing this, was extremely well pleased with it, and said, these lessons were truly worthy of a Bishop. The Queen's predilection proved but too true with regard to the Archbishop, who was one of the first to whom Villiers became ungrateful. Mean while, Villiers being come to Court without a great stock of money, the King easily guessed he wanted a supply. Had it been in his power to follow his inclination, this supply would have been very considerable: but he was himself so destitute of money, that a present of a thousand pounds was all he could spare at that time.

After Villiers was made Gentleman of the Bed-chamber, several Courtiers adhered to him, in hopes he would soon have the advantage of his rival. Others continued firm to the Earl of Somerfet, whether out of gratitude, or for fear

My Lady dying soon after, Sir George became so enamoured of Mary, that he married her, and at his death left her a Jointure of 2000*l.* a year. of ruining their fortune by false conjectures. Two parties therefore were formed at Court, who mutually clashed upon all occasions. If the King had at once dismissed Somerjet, all would have been quiet; but he intended to keep both, not so much out of love to Somerjet, of whom he was tired, as to avoid the imputation of inconstancy. Thus the King still affecting to show, he loved his old favorite as well as ever, the Courtiers were greatly embarrassed. But Villiers daily stole the hearts of the Courtiers and Petitioners from his rival, by his noble and generous way of promoting their Suits.

Mean while, the Earl of Somerjet perceiving, he daily declined in favour, before all things thought of securing himself from the danger to which he might be exposed by Overbury's murder. Though he knew the King had not the same affection for him as formerly, he hoped, however, as it was not entirely extinguished, to obtain what at least would free him from uneasiness. So, spying a favorable opportunity, he cast himself at the King's feet, and represented to him, that having served him some years in a very dangerous post, it was difficult not to fall into some miscarriages, and therefore besought him to grant him a general Pardon, which might secure him from the malice of his enemies. The King very readily complied with his request, and ordered as ample a pardon as possible to be drawn. This was accordingly done; but, whether through the ignorance or malice of the person who drew the Instrument, the King was made to say in it, that he pardoned not only all manner of Treasons, Murders, Felonies and Outrages whatever, already committed, but also those which should be hereafter committed by the Earl of Somerjet (1).

The King signed this pardon without any scruple, and perhaps without reading it. But the Lord Chancellor Egerton refused to put the Seal to it (2), saying, as there had never been an instance of such a Pardon, he should incur a Præmunire if he passed it; and when he told the King the reason of his refusal, he easily satisfied him, he could not answer setting the Seal to the Pardon. Nothing was more easy than to draw another Pardon, without the Clause disliked by the Chancellor: but whether the Queen was against it, as some affirm, or Somerjet did not care to discover too plainly the occasion he had for a Pardon, or the King was now informed of the circumstances of Overbury's death, nothing more was said of it. Indeed, it is likely the King had now some knowledge of Overbury's treatment, but perhaps not sufficient to satisfy him of the Earl's guilt. However this be, he began his summer progress before this affair became publick.

The King's dissimulation with respect to his two favorites, held the Court in continual suspense. Many were afraid of adhering to Villiers, lest his credit was not yet firmly established. Others declared openly against Somerjet, in order to make a merit of it with the new favorite. Winwood was one of these, and affected, upon all occasions, to oppose the Earl of Somerjet, who had it not in his power to be revenged. During the whole progress, there were many disputes and quarrels between the two parties, to the King's great disgust. At length, the fatal blow was given, at the Court's return to Royston.

Franklin, who administered the poisoned clyster to Overbury, made use, to compose it, of one Reeve an Apothecary's boy, who was afterwards sent into Flanders, or perhaps run away from his master. This Reeve being at Flushing, where some business had brought Sir William Trumbull his Majesty's Envoy at Brussels, got acquainted with some of his servants, and whether unadvisedly or with design, informed them of what he knew concerning Overbury's death (3). The servants telling their master what they had heard, he examined Reeve himself, and drawing from him what he desired, found means to detain him at his house. Then, he writ to Winwood, desiring him to obtain the King's leave for him to come to England, because he had some things to reveal, which he could not trust to paper. Leave being granted, he acquainted Winwood with what he had learned (4), and Winwood told it the King, who commanded them both to keep it private till further orders.

Some time after, the King being returned to London, wanted to reconcile his two favorites, to be freed from the continual importunities occasioned by their contests, and those of their adherents. He thought he had found a notable expedient, by obliging Villiers to make the first advances, and desire the Earl of Somerjet's favour and protection. To that purpose, he ordered Sir Humphrey May, Somerjet's creature, but who showed great respect for Villiers, to tell the Earl, as of himself, that he was credibly informed, Villiers would come and desire his friendship and protection, and advised him to receive him civilly, and that by giving the King this token of his compliance, he would still be very much in favour, though he was not to flatter himself with reigning alone in the King's affection. Sir Humphrey May having discharged his Commission, and perceiving the Earl of Somerjet unwilling to follow his advice, was at length forced to tell him in plain terms, that what he had said was by the King's order, and warned him to consider seriously the consequence of a refusal. About half an hour after, Villiers came to the Earl's, and used these very words: My Lord, I desire to be your Servant and Creature, and to take my Court preferment under your Lordship's favour, and your Lordship shall find me as faithful a Servant as ever did serve you. To this so submissive a compliment, the Earl returned this short and quick answer, I will have none of your service, and you shall have none of my favour. I will, if I can, break your neck, and of that be confident. These words very much exasperated the King, who from that instant resolved to be rid of the Earl of Somerjet.

It is hard to guess whether, supposing the Earl of Somerjet had behaved with more condescension to the King, and been reconciled to Villiers, Overbury's affair would have been buried in eternal oblivion. This seems at least to be the course the King had resolved to take, if the Earl had been inclined to do what he desired. Be this as it will, the King being come to Royston, to begin his winter progress, expressed no displeasure against Somerjet, but lived with him as he was wont, without the least sign of any alteration in his friendship. But some days after, he sent in the night a messenger to Lord Chief Justice Coke, with a letter, ordering him to make a Warrant to apprehend the Earl of Somerjet at Royston, and his Countess at London, with Franklin, Weldon, Mrs. Turner, and Sir Gervase Elways, Lieutenant of the Tower. The messenger was sent back to Royston at four o'clock in the morning, with an Officer of justice to execute the Warrant. At his arrival, the Officer found the King with his arms about Somerjet's neck, who was just going to London, and affectionately saying to him, When shall I see thee again Somerjet (5)? At that very instant the Officer arrested the Earl by Sir Edward's Warrant, who exclaimed, that such an affront was never offered to a Peer of the realm in the King's presence. The King feigning ignorance, and asking what was the matter, said jeeringly, Now, man, there is no remedy, for if Coke sends for me I must go. Then accompanying him to the steps before the door, he desired him, as he was going down, to return speedily, saying, he could not live without him. As soon as Somerjet was in his coach, the King said, in the hearing of some persons, who told it again afterwards, Now the deal goes with thee, I will never see thy face more. If this be true, it must be owned, it was a needless and very strange dissimulation: but King James took delight in things of this nature.

At his coming to London, the Earl of Somerjet was sent to the Tower (6), his Countess, and the rest of the accomplices, having been arrested and committed, whilst he was on the road. The same day, Chief Justice Coke going to Royston, the King told him all he had heard from Trumbull, and enjoined him, with all possible scrutiny, to search into the affair, without partiality or respect of persons. He concluded with saying, God's curse be upon you and yours, if you spare any of them: And God's curse be upon me and mine, if I pardon any one of them.

Coke receiving such strict orders, was very active in the affair. Nay, some pretend, he was too active, and that finding in the Earl of Somerjet's papers, indications of his being concerned in the death of Prince Henry, he had not the prudence to conceal them. However this be, most of the parties accused were tried in October and November, and being found guilty, were condemned and executed (7). Sir Thomas Monson, who was also arrested, appeared twice before the Judges, and at the second time Coke received a note from the King, which obliged him to send back the prisoner to the Tower, with these words, Take him away, 1675. we have other matters against him of a higher nature. It is affirmed, Coke said aloud one day, as he was sitting on the Bench, God knows what became of that sweet babe Prince Henry, but I know somewhat, and then stopped short. This gave occasion to think, he had made some discovery concerning the Prince's death (1).

Simon [Mason] servant to Monson, who had been employed to carry a poisoned tart to Overbury, being likewise brought before the Court, the Judge said to him, Simon, thou hadst a hand in this poisoning business. No, my good Lord, (answered Simon) I had but one finger in it, which cost me all my hair and nails. He had, it seems, out of liquorishness, as he was carrying the tart, tasted with his finger a little of the syrup. This ingenuous answer caused him to be acquitted: for it was thought he would not have tasted the syrup, had he known it to be poisoned.

The Trial of the Earl of Somerset and his Countess was deferred to May the next year 1616 (2), but not to be obliged to return to this affair, I shall relate here the circumstances of the Trial. If we may believe Sir Anthony Weldon, Author of a little Book entitled, The Court and Character of King James, which is properly but a Satire, the King had assured the Earl of Somerset he should not be brought to a Trial. For this reason, when George More Lieutenant of the Tower came and told him, he must prepare for his Trial on the morrow, he answered, That positively he would not appear, unless he was carried by force in his bed. The same Author adds, the King being informed of it, sent him word, he could not hinder his appearing before the Judges, but would prevent the passing any sentence upon him (3). By this artifice, says Weldon, the Earl was prevailed with to appear in Court, where he pleaded in his defence from eight in the morning, till seven in the evening, when, contrary to his expectation, sentence of death was passed upon him, as guilty of Overbury's murder. The same Author says, the King was terribly uneasy all that day, neither was he at rest till the news came of his condemnation. This Author's aim, in relating these and many other circumstances, was to insinuate, that the King was afraid the Earl of Somerset, to save his life, would reveal some secrets he had a mind to conceal. But these secrets are not explained, and probably are only Chimeras. If the King had feared any thing from the Earl of Somerset, he would never have brought him to a Trial, or commanded the Judge to examine him strictly. Nevertheless, though Weldon be satirical, and there is no depending upon his testimony, some truth however appears in what he relates, since the King's conduct, after the Earl of Somerset's condemnation, shows there was in this affair some circumstance by which he was embarrassed.

The Countess of Somerset being brought before the Court, pleaded only with a shower of tears, which raised some compassion in her Judges, but however, hindered her not from being condemned to die as well as her Lord. The King granted them a reprieve, which was often renewed till the year 1621, when they had liberty to go and live at a Country-seat, without however being released from their sentence. At last, in 1624, about four months before the King's death, a Pardon was granted them. After the Earl of Somerset was condemned, the King gave him four thousand Pounds a year in land, which he took in his servants names. This noble present, the pardon granted the Earl, notwithstanding the curse denounced by the King against his self and posterity, if ever he pardoned the guilty, he re-iterated, during the Trial, the Note sent to the Chief Justice whilst he was trying Sir Thomas Monson, Coke's imprudent words concerning Prince Henry, and his disgrace which soon followed, all these things, I say, have given occasion to King James's enemies to insinuate, he was conscious of some guilt, and they have been pleased to apply the whole to Prince Henry's death. But, besides that all these circumstances could at most only form a bare presumption, who can affirm them to be all precisely true? Amidst the perpetual contrarieties in the Authors who write of King James I. it is hard to know distinctly the truth. Some pass over in silence particulars which are chiefly insisted upon by others, or absolutely deny facts, which the others advance as incontestable. Some there are whose aim was to give a very ill idea of the manners and qualities of this Prince, whilst others represent him as a very wise, just and religious King. Some panned his Reign while the Civil Wars raged in England, or when the Monarchy was changed into a Common-wealth. These thought to do their Country service, in demonstrating, that the project of enslaving England was begun in the Reign of James I. and pursued in that of Charles I. Others wrote after the Restoration of Charles II. when the Civil Wars were filed an unnatural Rebellion, and when the fear of falling under an arbitrary Government was termed chimerical. Hence arises the difficulty of making a choice amidst all the contrarieties between the Historians. Unhappily the same parties still subsist with the same prejudices. So there is little hopes of seeing an impartial History of England, from the beginning of King James the First's Reign, to our time. Let a Historian turn which way soever he pleases, he will be look'd upon as partial, by one or other of the two factions. This is a remark absolutely necessary as well for the fact I have just mentioned, as for the whole Reign of James I. and fill more for the following.

To finish what relates to the Earl and Countess of Somerset, I shall briefly add, that their Love which had engaged them to commit such abominable deeds, turned at last to hatred. They lived together many years in one house, as strangers to each other, and at last the Countess died of an uncommon disease (4). The Earl lived long enough (5) to see his Daughter married to the Duke of Bedford, who had by her the Lord Russell, beheaded in the Reign of Charles II.

Arabella Stuart, First-Cousin to the King, died in the Tower the 27th of September 1615, a little before the Trial of the Complices of Overbury's murder. Many fees began that on occasion of these Tryals, Prince Henry's death might be talked of afresh, imagined this Kinswoman or his Majesty might also be poisoned. This is what some Historians, enemies to King James, have advanced, or at least insinuated, without any other foundation than this malicious report, grounded upon the chimerical project in the beginning of the present Reign, of setting Arabella on the Throne. She was daughter of Charles Stewart younger Brother to Henry his Majesty's Father. Consequently, she could have but very remote pretensions to the Crowns of England and Scotland, which James enjoyed not by the Title of the Stewart Family, of which he was by the Father's side, but by his Mother Queen Mary's right, to whom Arabella was only a very distant relation. The King therefore must have carried his suspicions beyond all imagination, to resolve to poison this relation at a time when there was no commotion either in England or Scotland, and when she was actually in prison. The cause of her disgrace was, her privately espousing without the King's consent, Sir William Seymour, Grandson of the Earl of Hertford, to which the King sent them both to the Tower, from whence some time after, they made their escape with intent to fly into France. Seymour had the good fortune to escape, but Arabella was taken and shut up in the Tower, where she died (6).

The Earl of Somerset's affair ending the dispute between the two Favorites, the Court was restored to its former tranquillity, under the management of Villiers, who engrossed the King's affection without a Rival (7). The new Favorite behaved in much the same manner as his Predecessor. He suffered himself at first to be guided by such as he thought wiser and more experienced than himself: But in time he thought himself the most able person in the Kingdom. His first care was to diminish by degrees the Earl of Somerset's creatures, and confer the places on his own relations and friends. Nothing more material was transacted at Court for some years, except the two usual affairs of this Reign, wherein the promotion of the new Favorite made no alteration. I mean the advancement of the Prerogative Royal, and the methods of raising money

Whereupon More assured the King, he would give him a man to see what he said, and leaving him, went and told the Countess all he could say. After some time they were permitted to meet at a certain place on the Thames, in order to fly beyond Sea. He leaving his Man in his Bed to act his part with his Keeper, got out of the Tower in disguise, and came to the place appointed. She, dressed like a young Gallant, followed him from her House, but happening to fly beyond the limited time, he went away, leaving word, if he came, he was gone before to Dunkirk. She, full of Tears, and lagging in her flight, was apprehended and sent to the Tower. After her death Sir William got leave to come home, and married afterwards the Lady Frances, Sister to the Earl of Essex. Weldon, p. 702.

1616. The first of these two points was, whether the King might give a Commendam vacant Bishopric, the occasion whereof was this.

The King desiring to give a Commendam vacant Church (1), it was disputed in the Court of Common-Pleas, not only whether the King might give a Commendam to a Bishop, either before or after his Consecration, but also whether Commendams were to be granted without necessity. The chief Justice of the Common-Pleas finding the case difficult to be decided, desired to have it farther argued by all the Judges, as is usually done in nice points. The King, who was at Reydon, being informed of it, commanded his Attorney-General [Bacon] to signify by Letters to all the Judges, that they should defer the determination of the affair till his return. Notwithstanding this order, the Judges met and argued the case. After which, they unanimously signed a writing, declaring they could not obey the King's order, because they were sworn to have no regard to the King's orders or letters, in matters concerning private persons (2). The King, exasperated at their proceedings, writ them, that it was not his intent to stop the course of Justice, but however he would not endure, that under colour of determining cases between private persons, they should attack the Prerogative Royal, or That any Person should be allowed to dispute or argue on that head: That the argument drawn from their oath was impotent, since the oath was enjoined by the Kings his Predecessors, only to prevent the importunities of Suitors [to the Prince,] and not to give the Judges authority to determine in points of Prerogative. He concluded with a peremptory command, not to proceed till they had consulted him.

It must be observed that in this letter, the King supposed two or three Principles, which neither the Judges, nor the generality of the Nation did admit. The first, that no person had a right to argue concerning the extent of the Prerogative, since the Judges of the Realm, being considered as middle Persons between the King and People, were alone to decide, and commonly did decide the questions on this head. The second principle was, that the oath taken by the Judges at their admittance into their office, was enjoined by the King his Predecessors, to avoid the solicitations of Suitors, whereas it was the common opinion that the Power ascribed to the Judges to disobey the King's Letters, was given them by the whole Nation represented in Parliament (3). The third principle was, that nothing ought to be decided (4) without consulting him, that is to say, their determination was to be founded upon what he should himself enjoin. People for the most part affirmed, the King would thereby establish a new Prerogative unheard of in England.

The King being returned to London, sent for all the Judges to the Council-Table, and reprimanded them severely. He told them among other things, that since his accession to the Crown of England, he had observed that the Counselors at the Bar (5), took the liberty to argue the extent of the Prerogative-Royal, which on that pretence, was trampled upon, and it was the Judges business to bridle this insolence in their respective Courts. Then speaking of the order he had sent them, he imperiously told them, there was no reason that could excuse their non-compliance (6). The King's manner of expressing himself terrified the Judges, who chose rather to give way than resist him to his face. Coke alone constantly maintained, that the King's order being contrary to Law, they were not to blame for refusing to obey it. Whereupon the King said with some emotion, whether they had done well or ill, he would not suffer his Prerogative to be centred. In fine, the Judges being withdrawn, the Council unanimously determined the case in favour of the King.

This affair made great noise among the People. They who were already prejudiced against the King, said, it was evident he intended to reign with an absolute power. That not only he contemned the determinations of the Judges, but would not so much as endure that his Prerogative should be argued, and pretended to be sole Judge of the extent of his own authority. But others admired his courage in maintaining the Prerogatives of the Crown.

It was not long before Coke felt the effects of the King's wrath. The Chief Justice having brought a complaint in the Star-Chamber against the Lord Chancellor Ellismer, concerning an Order issued out of the Court of Chancery, and having lost his Cause (8), wherein he was accused, 1. Of having wrongfully attacked the Lord Chancellor (9). 2. Of having [when Attorney-General] concealed a Statute of twelve thousand pounds due to the King from the late Lord-Chancellor Horton. 3. Of having said in open Court, that his Majesty was labouring to overthrow the Common-Law of England. 4. Of having behaved very insolently to the King, in the case of Commendams. The Lord Treasurer upbraided him likewise before the Council, for suffering his coachman to drive him bare-headed, a Privilege not granted even to the Lord Chancellor himself. As the King was displeased with him, this was sufficient to turn him out of his place, which was given to Sir Henry Montague. Coke was extremely well versed in the Common Laws of England, of which he wrote a Book highly esteemed, and which is daily cited in the Courts of Justice, and the High-Court of Parliament (10). But as he was one of those who suspected the King of aspiring to arbitrary Power, and thought it his duty to oppose it, he could not be agreeable to the Court.

Presently after, the Lord Chancellor Ellismer, being taken so ill, as to despair of being able to continue the functions of his Office, desired the King to confer it on another (11). But the King, without granting his request, sent for the Seal, telling him, he would himself be his Deputy. And indeed, he kept the Great-Seal till Ellismer's death, which was not till March the next year. After that, Sir Francis Bacon Attorney-General, was made Lord Keeper, and then Chancellor. He was a man of great abilities, as appears in his works, but a servile flatterer, cringing to those who were in favour, and very haughty to such as he believed he should not want (12).

Prince Charles the King's only son, was created this year (13) Prince of Wales, with the usual solemnities. The King thought of marrying him, but it was not easy to find a Princess fit for him. There was never a Protestant Princess of royal extraction in Europe, and his Father could not resolve to marry him to any but a King's daughter. Several of his Predecessors had not been so difficult: but for his part, he was extremely nice on this occasion. He would have thought it a disparagement to the Prince his Son to marry the Daughter of any German Prince. He chose rather, contrary to all the rules of good policy, to seek him a wife in a House sworn enemy to the Protestant Religion, than to marry him to one of his own Religion, who was not royally defended. This infatuation, if it may be allowed the expression, is to be considered as the source of the rest of the occurrences of this Reign, and of all the vexations James had to endure, as well from Foreigners as his own Subjects. It may be farther added, that this made him better known than before, and in a manner not to his advantage. He would have married his eldest Son Prince Henry, to Anne of Austria, who afterwards espoused Lewis XIII. King of France: but having at last discovered, that the Court of Spain carried on the negotiation only to amuse him, he gave over his design. The French King's marriage being solemnized this year 1616, James sent Ambassadors to France and Spain to congratulate the two Kings. The Lord Hay a Scotchman was chosen for the French Embassy (1), and the Lord Rosi for the Spanish. They had both orders to sound the two Courts concerning the Prince of Wales's marriage, with the Princess eldest Sister of Lewis XIII. or with the Infanta Maria, Daughter of Philip III. The Lord Hay quickly found, his negotiation would be fruitless, since the Princess of France was already promised to the Prince of Piedmont, Son to the Duke of Savoy.

Whilst these things were in agitation, and before the Lord Rosi's arrival in Spain, Sir John Digby, his Majesty's Ambassador to Philip III, writ to the King, that the Duke of Lerma had made an overture of a marriage between the Infanta Maria and the Prince of Wales, and desired private Instructions on that head. He advised him however not to break off the negotiation with France, for fear the Duke of Lerma's offer should be an artifice to render him suspected to the Protestants. James could not but be doubtful of Digby's suspicion being well grounded, as Sir Dudley Carleton his Ambassador at the Hague had told him, that to weaken the good intelligence between him and the States-General, a report was spread, that the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta of Spain was on foot, and now far advanced. But he took no notice of this intelligence. On the contrary, he sent orders to Sir John Digby to begin the negotiation with Spain. At the same time, [Don Diego di Sarmiento] Count Gendemar, the Spanish Ambassador in England, received a Commission to treat with the King concerning the marriage.

After James had taken this resolution, he could not conceal his extreme desire to accomplish this marriage. Hence he gave occasion to the Spaniard, who had then no design to treat seriously of this affair, to feign that he passionately wished to conclude it to his satisfaction, and to draw from his readiness, considerable advantages for the House of Austria and the Catholic Religion. By means of this same desire it was, that Count Gendemar, a man of great abilities, so insinuated himself into the King's favour, that for many years he caused him to do almost whatever he pleased, by putting him in fear that the marriage would miscarry, if the Spanish Court was not managed. We may judge of the policy of that Court, by the length of this negotiation, which was made to last seven years. At first, the Spaniard intended only to hinder King James from concerning himself in the war of Cleves, and assisting the Protestant Princes. But afterwards, a more important affair made it his interest more than ever to amuse the King of England, and to keep him at a bay.

Certainly James's conduct, who in some men's opinion passes for the Solomon of his age, was very extraordinary. Under colour of being at Peace with all the world, he meddled not with any foreign affairs. He beheld, without concern, France openly labouring the destruction of the Huguenots, and the House of Austria, forming projects to enslave all Europe, and daily increasing in power, to the just dread of the rest of the States, and especially the Protestant. Moreover, he expressed a strong desire to be allied to that House, by a marriage which could not but be prejudicial to the established Religion of England. In short, if his management at home be examined, the capacity, the great wisdom he thought himself blessed with, will nowhere appear. Without any war upon his hands, he had consumed immense sums, and alienated almost all the Crown-Lands, to enrich a dozen of English and Scotch Favorites, who had never done him any considerable service. The Earl of Somerset had, before his disgrace, amassed two hundred thousand pounds in Money, Plate and Jewels, besides nineteen thousand Pounds a year in Land, though he had been but five years in favour (2). The Earl of Salisbury, younger Son to the Lord Burleigh, who had no estate but what he derived from the Crown, had left his Son as rich as any Peer in the Kingdom. The Earl of Northampton, younger brother of the late Duke of Norfolk, had built a stately Palace in London (3), since called Northumberland-House, and left a vast inheritance to his nephew the Earl of Arundel, though he had little or nothing from his Family. The Earl of Suffolk, youngest Son of the Duke of Norfolk, had built a country Seat, which cost above two hundred thousand pounds, and he did not, as may be judged, expend his whole substance on this structure (4). The Duke of Lenex, the Earl of Dunbar, the Lord Hay, had remitted great sums into Scotland, and Sir Henry Rich, afterwards Earl of Holland, though a younger Son, had found means to raise an immense Estate. Amidst all these Favorites so rich and powerful, the King was in extreme want, continually giving more than he could afford, and running into needless expences, without ever regulating his Treasury. To all this was added a new Favorite, who being no less greedy than the rest, was also to be enriched, and had a numerous Kindred, whom he did not mean to leave in want (5). Another effect of the King's great wisdom was, to quarrel with his Parliament, in support of a Privilege which he would have carried higher than any of his Predecessors, and thereby put himself under a necessity of using means to raise money, which could not but alienate from him the love of his People. Lastly, let us add his weakness, in suffering himself always to be so governed by his Favorites, that he could not, or would not, see but with their eyes. At the time I am now speaking of, his Cabinet-Council consisted solely of the new Favorite, a young man without experience, through whose hands never any affair of moment had passed, and who, notwithstanding, thought himself the most able man in the Kingdom (6). The Earl of Suffolk was more versed in affairs, though he was never counted a great genius: but he was now upon the decline of his Favour, Villiers being far from supporting the Earl of Somerset's Father-in-Law. Bacon, Lord-Keeper, was well versed in the Laws of the Land, and capable of giving good advice: but he made it his whole study to adapt himself to the King's humour, and make his court to the Favorite.

The only affair which then employed the King and his Ministers, was to find money, and in plenty too, otherwise the King would have led a sad life. But all means seemed to have been exhausted, and a Parliament could not safely be called, the wound of the imprisoned Members being still too fresh to hope it was yet closed. Meanwhile, the Treaty of the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta, procured the King an unexpected supply. Queen Elizabeth had settled, with the States of the United-Provinces, the arrears they owed her, amounting to eight millions of Florins. This sum was due to James, as Elizabeth's successor. The States would have paid the debt long since, had they not found their account in remaining debtors to England, because they thereby engaged that Kingdom to support them. But after the twelve years Truce was concluded, the face of affairs was altered. The States no longer wanted the King's protection, and besides, he held in their Provinces, places which gave him opportunity to treat them with haughtiness, as he had done in the affair of Vorstius. It was therefore time for them to recover these places, since they had not the same interest now to leave them in the King's hands, when their dread of Spain was very much lessened by the Truce. But the sum they were to pay was so considerable, that they waited a favorable opportunity to procure them some abatement. This opportunity offering not till the present year 1616, they embraced it more eagerly, as they were under an urgent necessity to withdraw their Towns from the English. The King treating of his Son's marriage with the Infanta, it was to be feared, the restitution of these towns, to which the Spaniard laid claim, would be one of the Articles of the marriage Treaty, especially as a Clause in the Treaty of 1604, between England and Spain, gave them just cause to fear. On the other hand, the present juncture was favorable to them, because the King's coffers were quite empty, and there was no likelihood of his venturing to call a Parliament, by reason of the people's discontent. All the difficulty therefore was to order it so, that the offer of restoring the Towns should come from the King himself, because, in that case, the States might pretend inability to pay so large a sum, and that would naturally lead to a negotiation for an abatement of the debt. So, to bring the King to this point, they ceased for a time to pay the Garrisons of the places in possession of the English; though, till then, they had punctually paid the Treaty which obliged them to pay them. The Garrisons complained, and the States, without however refusing payment, found several pretences to defer it. This delay contrained the English forces, who were without money, to apply to the King, who was not in condition to satisfy them. He complained to the States, who answered with great moderation, insinuating upon the ill state of their affairs, by reason of their vast expence during the war. In a word, this affair did not end, and the English Garrisons still remained without pay. At last, Caron the Dutch Envoy in England, intimated as of himself, to some one of the Ministers, that he believed, if the King would offer to restore the Towns in his possession, the States would do their utmost to discharge the whole debt, by borrowing money at a high interest. This intimation produced the desired effect. The King having no money, and seeing a near prospect of drawing from the States a large sum, which the Courtiers had already devoured in their thoughts, readily determined to surrender the Cautionary Towns. Pursuant to this resolution, he writ to the States, That he knew them to be his good friends and confederates, both in point of Religion and Policy (1), therefore he apprehended not the least fear of difference between them: In contemplation of which, he was ready to surrender them. Upon this Letter they sent Pensionary Barnveldt to the King, who so artfully managed this affair, that they were discharged for two millions seven hundred twenty eight thousand Florins, in lieu of eight millions, which they had promised to pay to Elizabeth, besides eighteen years interest. By this agreement, the Cautionary Towns were delivered to the States the 14th of June 1616 (2).

They who were not pleased with the Court, greatly censured this Treaty, which robbed the Crown of England of the advantage of holding the United-Provinces in a sort of tutelage (3). It was said, that indeed Elizabeth was bound to resign these places, upon payment of the sums she had advanced; but there was no necessity to restore them for much less: That there was the less occasion to hasten this restitution, as the Garrisons were not maintained by the Crown; and if the States neglected to perform their agreement with the Queen, the King should have made them sensible they had not done it with impunity. These things were not for the King's honour, and his proceedings on this occasion could at most but confirm to him the title of Pacific (4), which he affected above all others. But it was much worse, when it was seen in a very short space, that the money paid by the States was vanished, without a possibility to guess what was become of it. The King had paid none of his debts: the Navy was suffered to decay, for want of money to repair it; and nothing had been sent to his army in Ireland, which had not received one penny for several years, and whose wants had served for pretence to treat with the States.

At length it was discovered, that the Lord Treasurer Suffolk had converted to his own use good part of the money received for the Cautionary Towns. The favorite mistook not this opportunity to ruin a man, whom he could not consider as his friend, since he was father-in-law to the Earl of Somerset. The Lord Treasurer was therefore accused in the Star-Chamber, of sundry misdemeanors in the exercise of his office, and especially of having kept for himself great part of the money received of the Hollanders. Sir Edward Coke, who was restored to his place, or had another (5), was his Accuser. He aggravated his misdemeanors, his extortions, his mismanagement of the King's treasures, his boldness to apply them to his own use, the corruptions of his Countess, who took bribes with both hands, the artifices of his Deputy Bingley (6), to ensnare such as had business with his master. After that, he cited many precedents of Treasurers, who in former Reigns had been punished for slighter crimes than those of the Earl of Suffolk, and showed the dangerous consequences resulting from the ill administration of the Treasurership, when it was not managed by uncorrupt persons. If the Lord Treasurer had cast himself upon the King's mercy, he would have been easily acquitted. But he strove to justify himself, and not doing it to the satisfaction of his Judges, he was fined thirty thousand pounds, and condemned to imprisonment during the King's pleasure, and Bingley was fined two thousand pounds. Till the King should Annals, make choice of a Treasurer, that office was executed by P. 22. Commissioners, the first of whom was Sir Henry Montague, the favorite's creature.

The Earl of Suffolk was not the only sacrifice to Villiers's Other policy, who by degrees removed Somerset's creatures. Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court, was turned out, and fined twenty thousand pounds. Sir Henry Yelverton the King's Attorney also lost his place, as well as several others whom it is needless to mention. Secretary H. Innes dying about this time (7), Sir Robert Naunton a Protestant, and Sir George Calvert a Papist, were made Secretaries.

The tranquillity enjoyed by the King, might have been deemed perfect, if the fear of his Prerogative's being attacked, had not continually disturbed his repose. In vain did he preach and advance his Principles upon all occasions, he had the misfortune to be regarded by none but his Courtiers and immediate Dependents. For this reason he durst not call a Parliament, knowing the Commons did not allow of his maxims. He seems to have thought it pure ignorance in the English, and that by a frequent repetition of the Sovereign's Prerogatives, he should at length succeed in convincing them of the truth of his Principles. This he took occasion to do in June this year, in a solemn assembly held in the Star-Chamber, on pretence of making known his design to correct certain abuses crept into the Courts of Justice. He made a very long Speech, full of divisions and subdivisions, according to his custom, and took for his Text these words of Psal. lxxii. 1. Give thy judgments to the King, O God, and thy righteousness to the King's Son (8).

He begins with saying, "The literal sense of these words runs upon David and Solomon, godly and wise; the mystical upon God and Christ, just and righteous; and from this imitation all Governments, especially Monarchies, have been established. Kings fit in the throne of God, and thence all judgment is derived, from the King to the Magistrates, not privative but cumulative. So by the counsel of Moses to Moses, the Judges were deputed for easier questions, the more profound left to Moses; and in this manner all Christian Kings govern, whereby appears the near conjunction between God and the King upward, and the King and the Judges downward; the King to settle the Law of God, and his Judges to interpret the Law of the King."

Then he teaches the Judges their duty in administering justice; and after dwelling upon many common places, he proceeds to the limits prescribed them: "Invade not upon the Prerogative; deal not in difficult questions, before you consult with the King and Council, for fear of wounding the King through the sides of a private person." Whereupon he takes occasion to commend some of the Judges for rebuking the popular humour of certain Pleaders at the Bar, who meddled with such matters. "That which concerns (says he) the mystery of the King's power, is not lawful to be disputed; for that is to wade into the weakness of Princes, and to take away the mystical reverence that belongs to those who sit in the throne of God" (9).

After having run through, and given his opinion concerning the several Courts of Judicature, he goes on, "It is the duty of Judges to punish such as seek to deprave the King's Courts, and therefore it was an odious and inept Speech in Westminster-Hall, to say, that a Prisoner lay against the Court of Chancery. I mean not that the Chancery should exceed its limits, but the King only is to correct it, and none else; and therefore I was greatly abused in that attempt: and for that reason commanded,

(9) He farther says, "The absolute Prerogative of the Crown is no Subject for the Tongue of a Lawyer, nor is lawful to be disputed. It is Alibi in and by itself, and is not to be disputed, but God can do; good Christians content themselves with his revealed Will. So it is Prejudicial and high to stretch in a Subject, to dispute what a King can do or say, that a King cannot do this or that, but rest in that which is the King's revealed Will in his Law." King Jam. I's Works, p. 549.

He speaks afterwards of the Star-Chamber, and says, "As a Star is a glorious creature, next in place to the Angels; so this Court is the most glorious of all Courts, consisting of [Privy Counsellors,] Judges, Peers of the Realm, and Bishops, and consequently the learning of both divine and human Law, the experience and practice of Government, are conjoined together in the proceedings of this Court. He added, I have laboured to gather articles, like an Index expurgatorius of novelties crept into the Law; look to Pleowden's Cafes, and if you find it not there, away with it."

Then he addresses himself to the Auditory, and gives them advice with respect to the Law-suits that were carrying on in the several Courts. "He chiefly advises them in their Pleas, not to presume to meddle with things against the King's Prerogative or Honour: If they do, the Judges will punish them; and in case the Judges do not, he must punish both them and the Judges. Plead not, continues he, upon new puritanical strains, that make all things popular, but keep you within the ancient limits of Pleas."

In speaking of Recufants, that is, those who refused to be of the Church of England, he says, "There are three sorts: The first are they, who enforced by Law, come now and then to Church; these are formal to the Law, but false to God (1). The second sort are they that have their conscience misled, and therefore refuse to come to Church, but otherwise live as peaceable subjects (2). The third sort are practising Recufants, who force their Servants and Tenants to be of their opinion, these are men of pride and presumption (3). He adds, I can love the person of a Papist so born and bred, but an apostate Papist I hate; such deserve severe punishment (4). I confess I am loth to hang a Priest only for his Religion, and saying Mass; but if they refuse the Oath of Allegiance, I leave them to the Law."

He concludes his long Speech with exhorting the Judges to countenance the Clergy against the Papists and Puritans, adding, God and the King will reward their zeal.

It is easy to observe, as well in this as in the King's other Speeches in publick, and on sundry occasions, three principal designs which he had ever in view. The first was, to establish the Prerogative Royal according to his own principles. The second, to intimate, that the Papists were not to be molested, provided they lived peaceably, and took the oath of Allegiance. The third was, to express his hatred of the Puritans, and to create the same aversion for them in the people. But it would be a great mistake, to ascribe this hatred to their refusing to allow of the Surplice, the Cross in Baptism, kneeling at the Communion. These were not the things that rendered them odious in his sight. He fancied their principles with respect to Church-Government, led them to be enemies to Monarchy. For this reason all Arguments against the extent of the royal Prerogative seemed to him to be founded on Puritanical principles.

On the 27th of August the King created Sir George Villiers, Baron of Whaddon and Viscount Villiers (5), and on the 1st of January following he was made Earl of Buckingham.

In the beginning of the year 1617, arrived in England Marco Antonio de Dominis (6), Archbishop of Spalato in Dalmatia, who was come to profess the Protestant Religion in the communion of the Church of England. As he was a man advanced in years, and very corpulent, it was readily believed, no other motive but that of Religion and Conscience could have induced him to undertake so long a voyage, and quit his Archbishoprick. He preached and writ against the Romish Religion, and at length was preferred to the Mastership of the Sewey, and the Deanery of Windſor. After some years stay in England he suffered himself to be gained by Count Gondemar the Spanish Ambassador, with the hopes of a Cardinal's Cap, if he would go to Rome, and publicly abjure the Protestant Religion.

This man, upon the brink of the grave, being seduced by Gondemar's promise, went to Rome, and abjured the Religion he had embraced in England, after which, instead of being a Cardinal, he was thrown into a dungeon in the Inquisition, where he died, and notwithstanding his abjuration, his Body was publicly burnt (7).

I have several times mentioned the King's aversion to the Puritans, whose Government, which came very near the Republican, was directly contrary to the principles he was labouring to establish. Ever since his coming to England, he had kept the Puritans so low, that it was not in their power to give him any disturbance. But the Church of Scotland was still Presbyterian, to his great mortification. Indeed Episcopacy was not entirely suppressed in that Kingdom; but it was in such a state, that the Bishops had no manner of jurisdiction. The several Presbyteries and the General-Assembly of the Clergy, had engrossed the whole Ecclesiastical authority, and left the Bishops only an empty name without power. There were also many other points wherein the Scottish Church differed from the English, so that Puritanism triumphed in Scotland, at the time it was looked upon in England as a sort of Rebellion. James had therefore resolved to put the Church of Scotland upon the same foot with that of England; but perceiving, that to compel the Scots all at once to a perfect conformity with the English Church, would be too difficult an undertaking, he meant to lead them to it by degrees. Pursuant to this project, he had now sent to the General-Assembly of the Kirk certain Articles, which he desired might be inserted into the Canons of the Church. These Articles were:

1. For the future, the Holy Communion should be received kneeling.
2. The Eucharist should not be denied to the sick, with three or four persons to communicate with them.
3. Christmas, Easter, Ascension-Day, and Whit-Sunday, should be kept as Holy-Days, and the preachers should make choice of Texts suitable to the occasion.
4. Confirmation should be practised after this manner; when the children were eight years old, the Ministers should catechize them, and then the Bishops in their Visitations should bless them with prayer for God's grace, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost (8).

As to this last Article, the King did not desire that Confirmation should be received in Scotland, as practised in the Church of England, because he was not fully convinced of it's usefulness. But as the business concerned one of the Episcopal functions, he would that the Bishops should have something at least to do in it.

The King's design being to compass his ends by degrees, he had selected these four Articles as least liable to give offence to the Ministers, in order to leave them without excuse in case they rejected them. The general assembly of the Scottish Church, perceiving the King's aim, declared, if the Churches of England and Scotland differed only in these four Articles, they might be received for peace sake; but as they were innovations incapable of producing a perfect union, there was no necessity of inserting them among the Canons. The King offended with this refusal, resolved to compel the Scots, not only to receive these four Articles, but also many more which he had not thought fit to meddle with at first, being persuaded he had a right, by virtue of his royal authority, to impose upon his people of Scotland, the Religion which to him seemed the best. To this purpose, he resolved to go in person to Scotland, under colour of visiting his native country, where he had not been these fourteen years.

Before his departure, he ordered a Proclamation to be published in Scotland, wherein he said, he was going to visit his old Kingdom, Not to alter the civil and ecclesiastical State, but to reform certain abuses in the Church and Commonwealth. At the same time, he sent beforehand some Officers of his household, all English, with orders to adorn his Chapel at Edinburgh in the same manner as that at Whitehall; and these men forgot not to carry with them some pictures and even statues of the Apostles (1). As soon as they began to adorn the Chapel, the People of Edinburgh exclaimed at the sight, saying, Images were begun to be introduced, and the Mass would quickly follow.

The King being come to Berwick, prorogued the Parliament of Scotland (2), to open it himself, as he did indeed with a long Speech, according to custom. To conceal his real design, he proposed several things, among which he did not forget the article concerning Religion, the only point he was seriously labouring. He contented himself at first with requiring, that a certain number of Commissioners should be appointed to examine and settle the affairs of Religion. The Parliament consenting to his demand, the King fluid not for the Parliament's nominating the Commissioners, but chose them himself, and appointed the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, and the Clerk of the Rolls, who were all three his creatures. But as the Parliament scrupled to stand to this nomination, he fell into a violent passion, thinking it very strange they should pretend to name others, after he had made known his pleasure. In short, as they durst not resist him to his face, he obtained whatever he pleased.

These Commissioners immediately settled an article, after which there was nothing more to be examined. The article was, That whatsoever his Majesty should determine in the external Government of the Church, with the advice of the Archbishop, Bishops, and a competent number of the Ministry, should have the strength of a law. The King himself had dictated this article, Not (said he) that I am against the advice of the grave and learned Ministers, but to be over-ruled, as in your former general assemblies, I will never agree; the Bishops must rule the Ministers, and the King govern both in matters not repugnant to Law. Thus the King plainly showed, that since his accession to England, he claimed in Scotland a greater authority than before.

Mean while, the Ministers in and about Edinburgh, perceiving that by the prevarication of the Commissioners, their Church was going to be overthrown, since the King was empowered to make what alterations he pleased, met together to consult how to prevent it. They found no other remedy than a Protestation against the article passed by the Commissioners, and when they had drawn it, they committed it to one Hewet, to present it to the King. Hewet being come into his Majesty's anti-chamber, in order to execute his Commission, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's civilly accosted him, desiring to see the Protestation; which the Minister readily showed him. As soon as he had it in his hands, he would have put it in his pocket, but Hewet seized the paper, which could not be done without making some noise. Upon which the King coming out and hearing the occasion of the bustle, spoke so roughly to the Minister, that the poor man, all in a fright, fell on his knees and begged pardon, protesting never more to meddle in the affair (3).

But though the King had obtained what he wanted of the Commissioners, he found however he should never attain his ends without the consent of the Ministers, especially as their Protestation was publick, and many copies, which continually increased, were already dispersed. He addressed therefore to the Bishops, an order to summon the Ministers to meet on the 10th of July, at St. Andrew's, where he would come and speak to them in person. The Ministers obeying the summons, the King called them all to witness his great care of the Church of Scotland as well before as since his accession to the Crown, adding, he expected however no thanks for his zeal for the true worship of God, and for maintaining good order in the Church. Then he told them, that before he departed for Scotland, he had sent them four Articles to be inserted in their Canons, which were rejected, and yet he was silent; that having lately desired, it might be declared, that by virtue of his prerogative, he had power to make Ecclesiastical Laws, their mutiny'd and protested against him: However, he was very willing to pass by all these, with many other affronts, received at their hands. But now, continued he, the errand for which I have called you, is to know your Reasons, why this same Power ought not to be admitted. I mean, not to do any thing against Reason; and on the other part my demands being just and religious, you must not think that I will be refused, or resisted. He spoke these last words knitting his brows, and looking at them, says the author of the Annals, with a majestic and stern eye, which made them all fall down on their knees. Then continuing his Speech, he said, It is a Power innate, and a special Prerogative which we that are Christian Kings have, to order and dispose of external things in the Policy of the Church, as we by advice of our Bishops shall find most fitting. And, Sirs, for your approving or disapproving, deceive not your selves, I will never regard it, unless you bring me a reason which I cannot answer.

The Ministers seeing how peremptory the King was, they desired leave to confer among themselves. Their request being granted, they returned in a few hours, with a Petition for a General Assembly, that what his Majesty proposed might be received with common consent. Alas, says the King, but what assurance have I of their consenting? Whereupon some of them said, they saw no reason to the contrary. But, says the King, if the General Assembly be of another mind, and your reason now be none of theirs, then, and the Articles are rejected, my difficulty will be the greater; for when I shall hereafter use my own authority in establishing them, I shall be reputed a Tyrant, and Persecutor; Ye were wont to do so. Then all cried out, that none of the King durst be so mad. Yet experience tells, (says the King) that it hath been so; therefore unless I be made sure, I will not give way to an Assembly.

It was, however, easy to perceive, that without an Assembly, the King could not possibly compass his ends. Though he should have extorted the consent of the Ministers then present, it would have been to no purpose, since they were not authorized. And if the King had caused these Articles to be passed by an order flowing from his absolute Power, he should have been first secure of the obedience of his subjects, or at least of a sufficient power to compel them, both which were equally difficult, not to say impracticable. So the King having considered the thing more maturely, agreed at length, that a General Assembly should be held at St. Andrew's in November. In this interval, Symson the Minister, who drew up and signed the Protestation, was committed to Edinburgh Castle, and Catherwood, who carried Letters to other Ministers to encourage them to adhere to it, was banished. After this the King returns to England.

The General Assembly, held at St. Andrew's in November, resolved to defer the reception of the four Articles, till all the Churches of the Kingdom were informed of this affair; and then separated. The King was extremely incensed, and looking upon this delay as a contempt of his authority, ordered the payment of the Ministers Stipends to be stopped for a year (4). But finding this only exasperated people, and retarded his design, he gave leave at length that another General Assembly should be held at Perth, on August the 21st the next year. And there by fair or foul means, he obtained the Churches consent to the four Articles. But wistful, he sowed in Scotland the seeds of those troubles, which distracted the Kingdom in the following Reign, and deprived the King his Son and successor both of Crown and Life. Thus, his zeal against the Puritans caused him to forsake the principles of equity and moderation, which he thought so reasonable in the case of the Catholics. He would not force the conscience of these, provided they lived like good Subjects; but the Presbyterians were to submit, tho' ever so unwilling, to what he should think proper. What has been said upon this subject, is taken almost word for word out of the Annals, the Author whereof cannot be suspected of representing things to the King's disadvantage.

Before he left Scotland, the King made the Earl of Buckingham Privy-Counsellor of that Kingdom, as he had been so for some time in England.

Whilst the King was returning to London, he received a Petition from some Servants, Labourers, Mechanics, and other vulgar persons, complaining, that they were debarred from dancing, playing, Church-ales, in a word, from all recreations on Sundays after divine Service. Whereupon it was suggested to the King, that the Puritans meant to persuade the people, such diversions were contrary to the regard due to the Lord's-day. That these men went upon erroneous principles, namely, that Christians were obliged to keep the day of rest with the same strictness as the Jews, and therefore affected to call Sunday the Sabbath. This was a sufficient inducement to the King to condemn this puritanical scruple, and the rather, as he was not himself very scrupulous in this point. A Book therefore was published in his name, wherein he maintained by several

(1) They carried with them the Portraits of the Apostles to be set in the Pews or Stalls. The Bishop of Glasgow, Dean of the Chapel, who attended this cause, went to the King, entreating him, "for the offence that was taken, to stay the affixing of those Pictures." His Letter was read by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Bishops of Aberdeen, and Brechin, and several Ministers of Edinburgh. To this the King returned an answer, expressing ignorance upon them, that could not distinguish betwixt Pictures intended for Ornament and Decoration, and Images erected for Adoration.

(2) Spargwood Archbishop of St. Andrew's says, that this Protestation was tumultuously formed, and that the next Morning, the chief Persons by whom it was subscribed, came and entreated him to stop the presenting thereof, which he shewed he might easily do by taking it from Peter Hewet, p. 532.

(3) And commanded the Bishops of St. Andrew's and Glasgow, in their own Persons to keep Christ's day next, preaching upon Texts proper for the time. Annals, p. 29. Spargwood, p. 335, &c. The King's Letters Injuncting this, are dated at New-market, December 6, and 11.

1617. arguments, that pastimes on Sundays, after evening service, were allowable, and withal, commanded that none should be hindered or discouraged from any lawful recreations. This Book (1) made a great noise, neither was it exclaimed against by the Presbyterians alone (2). Many Churchmen disapproved of it, and particularly the Lord-Mayor of London, who, notwithstanding the prohibition, commanded the King's own carriages to be stopped, as they were a passing thro' the City on a Sunday (3). But the King himself, regardless of these murmurs, and willing to support what he had done, enjoined all Ministers to read his Book publicly in their Churches; and those that refused were severely punished by the High-Commission. Some pretend, this order was a snare to surprize certain Ministers, who though Puritans, scrupled not to be of the Church of England, and preach their Doctrines there (4).

These were the most material affairs then in England. The King, as I said, never concerning himself in any foreign matters, left the government of the Kingdom to the care of his Ministers. The Earl of Buckingham was the head manager. He ruled with an absolute sway both in Church and State, disposing of all places and preferments. If we may believe certain Authors, he bestowed nothing without money or a yearly pension (5). As the King was always in want, the favorite was obliged to find means to maintain, and even enrich his numerous kindred, who flocked to Court to partake of his greatness. Not to return to these matters, I shall say here at once, that the favorite's elder Brother was made Viscount Purbeck; his younger Brother, Earl of Anglesey; his Mother, though a Papist, was created Countess of Buckingham, without her Husband's enjoying the same honour. In a word, all his female relations were married into the richest and most noble families of the Kingdom. The favorite's mother being a Papist, and ruling her Son, who was properly of no Religion, with the same ease as he himself governed the King, it was not very strange, the Papists conceived great hopes, and swarmed in the Kingdom. The King gave himself little trouble about it. Provided a man took the Oath of Allegiance, and was not Puritan, every thing else was indifferent to him. He was almost wholly employed in his diversions, and as he very frequently hunted, his admirers pretended he took those times to consider of the affairs of the Government (6).

I shall close the events of the year 1617, with the sad catastrophe of Sir Walter Raleigh. He had been a prisoner twelve years (7), ever since his condemnation, during which time, he had employed himself in compiling his History of the World. At last, he obtained his liberty, though without the King's pardon (8). As his estate was all forfeited, and given to the Earl of Somerset, he was very much embarrassed when he came out of prison. The Court, where he was entirely unknown, was like a strange Country to him. For this reason, he formed the project of seeking his fortune in distant climates. He had formerly traversed the Seas of America, and knew all the Coasts, particularly that of Guiana. Nay, it is said, he set up marks to direct him again to a certain place, where was a gold Mine, and that Keymis his old attendant (9), brought him from thence a piece of Ore, which made him think the Mine very rich. However this be, as he knew not where to lay his head, he found means to acquaint the King, that he knew of a very rich Mine in America, from whence he hoped to bring mountains of Gold, if his Majesty would be pleased to grant him a private Commission. The Mine lying in a Country belonging to the Spaniards, it could not be seized without breaking the peace with Spain. Nevertheless, the King, tempted no doubt with the golden hopes inspired by Raleigh, granted him a Commission, directed to Our beloved and faithful Walter Raleigh, Knight, &c (10). It was said afterwards, the King granted the Commission with this limitation, that he should not injure the Subjects of Spain. But how was it possible to bring away Gold from a Mine belonging to the Spaniards, without doing them damage?

However, Raleigh, by virtue of his Commission, engaged several persons in this project (11). He was supplied with money to fit out twelve sail (12), and departed in August 1617 (13), in search of the Mine. At his arrival upon the Coast of Guiana, he found not the marks he had left there, neither could he know again the place he thought to have so well observed. He detached however his Son, and Captain Keymis, with five Ships (14), to sail up the river Oromoco as high as possible, in order to discover the mountain where the supposed Mine lay. The mountain not appearing, the English landed, and putting the Spaniards to flight who opposed their descent, pursued them to the Town of St. Thomas, which they took and plundered: Sir Walter Raleigh's Son was killed in the assault. Then leaving a Garrison in the place, they advanced farther into the Country, without being able to find the so much desired Mine. At last, weary with searching, they returned to Sir Walter Raleigh, who finding himself disappointed of his hopes, threatened Keymis with the King's indignation, and some days after, Keymis was found dead in his Cabin (15). The Sailors, vexed at this ill success, loudly complained of their being drawn into a chimerical project, and compelled Sir Walter to sail back for England. When they arrived at Kingsale in Ireland, he would have persuaded them to go with him into France; but instead of listening to his proposal, they carried him against his will to Plymouth, where he was arrested by the King's orders, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

During his absence, Don Diego de Sarmiento, Count of Gondemar, the Spanish Ambassador in England, making great complaints about Sir Walter's Commission, which was become publick (16), the King found no better way to appease him, than by disowning it, or at least by assuring, that Raleigh had express orders not to act against the Spaniards (17). Raleigh returning without Gold, his cause was so much the worse. Besides, the Ambassador openly insisted upon his being punished, and told the King, there was no other way to continue the Treaty of the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta. Wherefore the King determined at length to sacrifice Raleigh to the Spaniard. But as he could not be tried upon his late expedition, for which he had a Commission in form, it was resolved he should lose his head, by virtue of the sentence passed upon him fourteen years before. In vain did he plead that his Commission, wherein the King styled him faithful Servant, and gave him power of life and death over those who were under his command, was equivalent to a pardon. The Judges told him, That Treason could be pardoned but by express words. So, without being called to an account for his late expedition, it was ordered that the former sentence should be executed (18).

(8) There were several Bishops that declared their Opinions against the Book of Sports.

(9) The Court was to remove next day to Whitehall. It put the King into a great rage, Swearing he thought there had been no more Kings in England but himself. Cooling a little, he sent a Warrant to the Lord-Mayor, ordering him to let them pass, which he obeyed with this answer, While it was in my power I did my Duty, but that being taken away, it is my Duty to obey. The King upon second Thoughts took this well, and thanked him for it. Wilfon, p. 709.

Thus died Sir Walter Raleigh, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. He was a man that deserved a better fortune, and had a large share of merit. He had also some faults, which are lessened or aggravated, in order to render his execution more or less odious, according as the Historians are for or against King James. Most certain it is, he fell a sacrifice to the mortal hatred conceived by the Spaniards, against him in Queen Elizabeth's time, and to the King's unhappy desire to accomplish the Prince his Son's marriage with the Infanta of Spain (1).

Since James was on the Throne, the English had lived in peace with all their neighbours, without being disturbed by any war. The King and his Ministers pretended, this was the chief point of Government, and that nothing more plainly discovered the capacity of those that ruled, than to cause the subjects to live in peace. Mean while, the people were not satisfied. Many affirmed, this maxim was false when carried too far, and that war often happens to be no less necessary than peace, for the welfare of a Nation. It was disliked, that the King should let the Hollanders fish upon the English Coast, without asking leave of [him, or] the Governor of Scarborough, as was customary, before they had recovered their Cautionary towns. It was thought no less strange, that they should be suffered to come upon the Coast with a Fleet to support their Fishermen, as if they meant to bully the King, and show they would fish on his Coast in spite of him; and it was openly said, to preserve peace by bearing such affronts, was no great sign of ability. It was also complained, that the King deserted the cause of the Protestant Religion, at a time when France, the Emperor, King of Spain, and Pope, were using their utmost endeavours to destroy it, and had but too much hopes of succeeding, since the Defender of the Faith remained unconcerned. The King's extreme jealousy with respect to his Prerogative, was another and great occasion of discontent. It did not appear wherein this Prerogative had been infringed: but it was thought very manifest, he intended to stretch it farther than any of his predecessors. It was considered, he had imprisoned several Members of Parliament, solely for insisting in the House upon the people's Grievances: had granted divers Monopolies; and raised money upon the subject without consent of Parliament: That his Speeches to the Houses, to the Judges, and in the Star-Chamber, tended only to exalt the regal authority, and make it, as it were, equal to God's; from whence it was inferred, that he designed to destroy the Constitution. People could not behold, without indignation, a young man of twenty five imperiously governing the whole Kingdom; disposing of all preferments in favour of his relations and friends; involved with the office of Lord High-Admiral, though he had never been at Sea, except from Dover to Calais; and lastly, honoured with the title of Marquis of Buckingham, without having ever done the State any service during the two years he had been at Court. These two dignities were lately bestowed on the favorite; the first, by the Earl of Nottingham's resignation, who had amassed great sums, and got a pension for the residue of his life. But there were still farther complaints. It was said, the Court gave a very ill example to the whole Kingdom: Nothing was heard there but blasphemy and oaths, and the King himself was not free from this vice: that one of the two Secretaries of State was a Papist, as well as the favorite's mother: that though it was not known what religion her Son was of, his debaucheries were publick, and gave universal offence: the number of Papists daily increased: the Prince's marriage with a Papist, daughter to the mortal enemy of the Protestant Religion, showed how little the King regarded the concerns of Religion: that if any one represented to the King or the Ministers, the inconveniences arising from such a marriage, he was silenced, by being told, it was an attempt upon the Prerogative Royal; and that every man, who, without a call, pry'd into the secrets of the Government, was guilty of rebellion.

But on the other hand, the King was no less offended with this boldness in censuring his conduct, as if a King was to be guided by the caprice of his Subjects. What most troubled him was, that the Puritans were not the only persons who dared to complain of the Government, but that even the greatest friends to the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy could not bear an arbitrary power in the State. The Parliament itself had plainly showed him, how far they were from submitting to any Laws but those which had been hitherto in use.

Thus the King and People were equally dissatisfied. It is true, the King seemed to have a great advantage, as, there not being a Parliament, no man had right openly to arraign his conduct: but then, money did not flow into the Exchequer so plentifully as under the Kings his Predecessors, who knew how to manage the Parliament. He chose however to be without any, or to procure it by such means as increased the People's discontent, rather than run the hazard of seeing the Parliament question his Prerogative, of which he was strangely jealous. He comforted himself however with the hopes of speedily concluding his Son's marriage, by which he was to receive a dowry of two millions. It is certain the Court of Spain had offered that sum: but I have not been able to discover what sort of money was meant. I imagine the Spaniard left that undetermined, to have an opportunity of prolonging the negotiation as much as he pleased, and of breaking it off at last when he thought proper.

When the King of Spain's proceedings with respect to the marriage are considered, it must be thought, that he did not intend to conclude it, either at the time the negotiation was begun, or long after (2). At first, his sole aim was to amuse King James, and hinder him from interposing in the affair of Cleves. The Emperor had a mind either to keep that Duchy for himself, or to give it to some Prince of his Family, under colour of holding it in sequestration till the dispute was decided. But the States of the United Provinces avoiding this snare, seized part of the Country in question, protesting to restore it to the person to whom it should be adjudged. Besides, they openly protected the Elector of Brandenburg, who was one of the chief claimants, and a Protestant; as on the contrary, the House of Austria favoured the Duke of Neuburg, who was turned Catholic. On this pretence, Prince Maurice on the one side, and Spinola on the other, endeavoured to become masters of the Country, and so a kind of religious war ensued, wherein England's not interposing was of great consequence to the House of Austria. For this it was, that James was allured by the Spaniard with the hopes of the marriage and dowry of two millions.

Pretences were not wanting to prolong the negotiation. The union of a Catholic Prince with a Protestant Prince, required that care should be taken to secure to the Infanta the liberty of professing her Religion, in a manner becoming the Princesses of Spain. This was the only Article insisted upon at first, the two Courts being of opinion, that before this was settled, it was in vain to bring the rest upon the carpet. As it was the Spaniard's interest to lengthen the negotiation, so it was necessary to satisfy King James of his sincerity, to keep him still at a bay. To that purpose, after a two years debate, fearing at last that James would be discouraged, he agreed with Digby and Cottington the English Ambassadors upon five Articles, the first whereof facilitated the continuance or even the entire interruption of the Treaty, when it should be no longer his interest to dissemble. The Articles were these.

1. That the Pope's dispensation be first obtained by the mere Act of the King of Spain.
2. That the Children of this marriage be not constrained in matter of Religion, nor their Title prejudiced in case they prove Catholics.
3. That the Infanta's family, being strangers, may be Catholics, and shall have a decent place appointed for all Divine Service, according to the use of the Church of Rome; and the Ecclesiasticks and Religious persons may wear their proper Habits.
4. That the marriage shall be celebrated in Spain by a Procurator, according to the instructions of the Council of Trent; and after the Infanta's arrival in England, such a solemnization shall be used, as may make the marriage valid, according to the Laws of this Kingdom.
5. That she shall have a competent number of Chaplains, and a Confessor, being strangers, one whereof shall have power to govern the family in religious matters.

These Articles being transmitted to England, the King in allowing and signing them, thus expressed himself: "Seeing this marriage is to be with a Lady of a different Religion from us, it cometh us to be tender, as on the one part, to give them all satisfaction convenient, so on the other, to admit nothing that may blemish our confidence, or detract from the Religion here established." I confess I do not see how this maxim agreed with the second Article. For the first, he supposed as previous, the Pope's dispensation, which was expected several

(1) Weldon observes, That he was executed without all precedent, without any just cause, and even against King James's will; who in many things was over-awed by his timorous disposition. But the Spanish Faction, and Spanish Gold betrayed his Life, as they had done the Kingdom before; and it was one of Godwin's greatest Master-pieces to purchase Raleigh's head; yet, had not the Earl of Brissol, who was possessor of Bloxville Castle, formerly Sir Walter's, co-operated, the King would never have consented, p. 28, 29.—This year, on May 7. died the learned Facilius Augustus Thuanus, called Camden's Le President de Thon. Camden's Ann.

1618. years, and at last came clogged with additions and limitations, which I shall have occasion to speak of hereafter. Hitherto the Spaniard in prolonging the negotiation had only the Succession of Cleves in view. But this year the affairs of Germany and Bohemia began to give occasion to fear, a religious war would be kindled in those Countries. This was a fresh reason for the Spaniard's amusing King James, lest he should side with the Protestants, and send them a powerful aid. For the better understanding of the sequel, it will be absolutely necessary to know in what situation the affairs of Germany and Bohemia then were.

As for Germany, it suffices to say in two words, that for some time there had been great jealousies and mutual suspicions between the Catholics and Protestants. These last complained, That they could not have justice either from the Emperor or the imperial Chamber. The Catholics complained in their turn, That the Protestants were continually endeavouring to extend their privileges beyond what the Laws of the Empire allowed: That after pretending to be satisfied with a bare Toleration, they had aspired to an equality, and not content with that, had plotted to banish the Catholic Religion out of all Germany. On this pretence it was that the Catholics had entered into a confederacy, which occasioned the like among the Protestants. The Protestants being assembled at Hailbrun, the Emperor Matthias wrote to exhort them to dissolve their League. But they thought not proper to submit to his exhortations, by reason their League was only defensive and the Catholics did not offer to break their confederacy. This was a motive for the Spaniard to amuse King James, and hinder him from uniting with the Protestants of Germany. But the troubles this year in Bohemia, furnished him with a motive of much greater consequence, which I must explain here as briefly as possible, because this affair continually influences all the rest of this Reign.

In Bohemia were two Religions established by Law; the one was called sub una, and the other sub utraque. The former was professed by the Catholics, who communicated in one kind only, the latter by the Hussites, who received the Eucharist in both kinds, and, since the Reformation, were become true Protestants. I have spoken elsewhere of the religious wars which afflicted that Kingdom under the Emperor Sigismund. It suffices therefore to add here, that this Emperor was forced, in order to be owned for King of Bohemia, to grant the Hussites an Edict, whereby, among other privileges, it was decreed there should be no Magistrate or Inhabitant in Prague but what was of their Religion. This Edict granted in the year 1435 was observed till 1570, when, by order of Maximilian II. a Catholic was made citizen of Prague. Another of the same Religion obtained the same favour in 1599, and withal, a place in the Magistracy. From that time, Sigismund's Edict was very frequently violated, and at last the Jesuits were admitted into Prague, and built there a stately College. Thus, by degrees the number of the Catholics was considerably augmented in the City, by means of the Governors and the Emperor's other Officers who were all of the same Religion. The more they increased, the higher they carried their pretensions, and at last, if we may believe the Apology published afterwards by the Bohemians, the Edict of Sigismund was continually transgressed. However, in the Reign of Rodolphus II. the Protestants, by the intercession of Prince Matthias, obtained of the Emperor a second Edict, which under colour of confirming their privileges, put them upon a sort of equality with the Catholics, though they had enjoyed the superiority for one hundred and fifty years. Nevertheless, this equality was as much as they could expect, considering the present juncture of time. But, though it was far short of their ancient privileges, the Emperor's Officers in Bohemia thinking such an Edict prejudicial to the Catholic Religion, refused to publish it, affirming, it was extorted from the Emperor whilst at war with the Turk. Very likely they were privately countenanced by the Court of Vienna.

Rodolphus II. dying in 1614 (1), his Brother Matthias succeeded him, both in the Kingdom of Bohemia, and the imperial dignity. Under this new King the privileges of the Protestants were violated much more openly, and with greater haughtiness than under the last, if any credit is to be given to their Apology. But this was not all, Matthias having adopted his Nephew (2), Ferdinand of Austria, had a mind also to secure him the Crown of Bohemia. The execution of this project would doubtless have been very difficult, had not the Emperor used artifice. Silesia, Moravia, Upper and Lower Lusatia, being annexed to Bohemia, had a right to send Deputies to the Assembly of the States of that Kingdom. But as these Countries were Protestant, their Deputies very probably would join with those of Bohemia, of the same Religion, and frustrate the Emperor's design. Wherefore he convened the States of Bohemia without summoning the others. The Protestants complained of this innovation, and not to authorize it, refused, for the most part, to send Deputies to the States. This was what the Emperor foresaw and wished: for the Catholic Deputies being the Majority, Ferdinand was declared Matthias's presumptive Successor, and shortly after crowned at Prague; after which he resided at Gratz. The Defenders, for so were called a certain number of eminent persons, chosen and appointed by the States to see the Edicts put in execution, perceiving the designs of the Imperial Court, summoned the States pursuant to their power, and forgot not to call the incorporated Provinces. This Assembly only drew a Petition to be presented to the Emperor, wherein the States demanded the execution of the Laws of the Kingdom, and a just reparation for the injuries done them. Mean while, as they could come to no resolution before the Emperor's answer was received, they adjourned to the Monday after Rogation-Week, in the year 1618.

The Emperor instead of being inclined to send a favorable answer to the States Petition, ordered his Lieutenant in Bohemia to hinder the next Session of the Assembly, called without his license. But the Lieutenant was not strong enough to execute the order. His opposition serving only to exasperate the States who were assembled on the day appointed in the College of Charles IV. they went in a body to the Chancery, and seizing the Emperor's Officers, pitched upon three, and threw them out of the Castle-window (3). After that, they drove the Jesuits out of Prague.

Things being come to these extremities, the States published an Apology to acquaint the Publick why they had punished these Officers. But as they believed the Emperor would not hear their reasons, they signed a Confederacy, promising mutual assistance against all opposers. In the mean time, hearing the Emperor was making preparations to attack them, they chose four and twenty Protectors, empowering them to raise forces, and lay upon the Kingdom and the incorporated Countries what Taxes they should judge necessary. Thus, a war being unavoidable, every one took such measures as he deemed requisite, whether to attack or defend.

At the time, the Bohemian States were taking these resolutions, the Cardinal Infant was preparing an army in the Low-Countries to assist the Emperor. Whilst this army was levying, he sent Charles de Bucquoy, Count de Longueval to the Emperor, who made him General of the Army designed against Bohemia. The States chose for their Generals Count Ernst of Mansfeldt, and Count de la Tour. This war was of so great moment to the House of Austria, that it is not very strange the Spaniard should still continue to amuse King James with the hopes of seeing the projected Marriage speedily concluded. Very likely this war would at last become a Religious War, and in that case, England could very much strengthen the Protestant party. Afterwards, the King of Spain had still farther motives to continue this management. But the wonder is, though James had very strong reasons to suspect the Spaniard of artifice, he still obstinately relied on his sincerity. It seems unto us here in England, (says one of his Ministers in a Letter to Cottingham) that Conde Gondemar hath gone but very slowly in his journey: and divers (seeing how long time he hath spent in the way) do make conjecture, That it proceedeth from the small Affection that he judgeth to be there, towards the effecting of the main business.---But if the Spaniards act unsincerely, I shall judge them the most unworthy and perfidious people of the world, and the more, for that his Majesty hath given them so many testimonies of his sincere intentions towards them, which he daily continueth, as now of late, by the causing Sir Walter Rawleigh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them Satisfaction, when by preserving him, he might have given great satisfaction to his subjects, and had at command upon all occasions as useful a man as served any Prince in Christendom (4). 'Tis certain however the King was amused by the Spanish Court. Count Gondemar undertaking to carry into Spain the Articles signed by the King, was so very long on the road, that 'twas evident he sought only to delay the time. Notwithstanding this King James continued wilfully to shut his eyes, which will appear still plainer in the sequel.

Though the People of England were not informed of the contents of the Articles agreed upon by the two Courts, 1618. they knew however, the marriage was going to be concluded, and thought it could not but be prejudicial to Religion. This occasioned many complaints and murmurs amongst the Protestants (1), whilst the Catholics triumphed, knowing the King of Spain would not give his daughter to Prince Charles, without procuring them great advantages. At the whole, they were sure of having in this Prince's a powerful protectress, who would never forfake the interest of her Religion. We shall see in the following years how artfully the Spaniard prolonged the negotiation, till he had drawn from it all possible advantages, as well for the House of Austria, as for the Catholic Religion.

In the beginning of the year 1619, the Earl of Northumberland who had been in the Tower ever since the Gun-powder Plot, obtained his liberty at last by means of the Lord Hay his Son-in-law, lately made Viscount Doncaster (2).

About the same time, Doctor Williams Dean of Westminster was made Privy-Counsellor, and shortly after Bishop of Lincoln (3). I purposely mention this Prelate's promotion, because he will often occur in the History of this, as well as of the next Reign.

In March this year (4) the King lost his Queen, in the forty-sixth year of her Age. Shortly after he was himself seized with a great illness, which brought him, as I may say, to the brink of the grave. It would have been well for his reputation, had he died at this time, since the rest of his Reign, which lasted six years longer, was not much to his honour. In this space he more plainly discovered his settled design to stretch the Prerogative-Royal as high as possible. Besides, he gave very convincing proofs, that though he defended the Protestant Religion by his Writings, he had not its interest much at heart. In fine, his eager desire to conclude the Spanish match, displayed all his weakness, and the affair of Bohemia, in which he could not but be concerned, fully satisfied the world of his slender capacity.

The Emperor Matthias dying the 20th of March 1619, Ferdinand his Cousin and adopted Son, was proclaimed King of Bohemia, as well in consequence of his Election, as in virtue of his pretended hereditary Right to that Crown. Mean while, as his chief aim was to obtain the Imperial dignity, and as he stood in need for that purpose of the Protestant Electors, he feigned a willingness to end amicably the war now begun in Bohemia, by giving the States a reasonable satisfaction with respect to their Privileges. But the States thought not fit to trust to his promises. In the mean time, he endeavoured to gain the Electors, and make Alliances with the Catholic Princes of Germany. James, who gloried in being styled the Pacific King, thought himself obliged as such, to try to appease, by his mediation, the troubles of Bohemia. To this end, he chose the Viscount Doncaster to go and endeavour to procure a peace between Ferdinand and the Bohemian States. There was not a Prince in Europe so improper as he for a mediation of this nature, considering his Principles, with respect to Monarchy. This Embassy was very expensive, the Ambassador, who was a sort of Favorite, and extremely profuse, having been very lavish of his Master's money. Mean while, I know not whether he could obtain so much as a single audience of Ferdinand, who still removed as the Ambassador approached. Thus much is certain, the Embassy was entirely fruitless, and served only to show the little account Ferdinand made of the King of England's mediation.

The time appointed for the election of an Emperor approaching, the Elector of Mentz summoned the rest of the Electors, and particularly Ferdinand as King of Bohemia.

The States of that Kingdom protested against the Summons saying, Ferdinand could not be received as Elector in quality of the King of Bohemia, since he was not in possession of the Kingdom. But their opposition was ineffectual. Ferdinand was not only acknowledged for the King of Bohemia and Elector, but was also chosen Emperor the 5th of August 1619 (5). Then the States of Bohemia, seeing they had not been able to hinder Ferdinand from being Emperor, took an oath never to own him for their Sovereign, and at the same time, namely, on the 5th of September (6), chose for their King, Frederic Elector Palatine, and sent deputies to acquaint him with his election, and pray him to repair to Prague (7). Frederic did not want much sollicitation to accept of a Crown offered him by those who, in his opinion, had a right to dispose of it. He dispatched however Baron d'Aulni (8) to the King his father-in-law, for his advice, but it was a mere compliment. As he knew him to be a Prince not very ready to engage in great undertakings, he did not stay for his answer, but assembling some Troops, came to Prague, where he was crowned the 4th of November.

Before Frederic's Envoy reached England, James hearing the news of his Son-in-law's election, called a Council to debate whether the Elector ought to accept or refuse the Crown of Bohemia. The Archbishop of Canterbury not being present, by reason of the Gout which confined him to his bed, writ to Secretary Naunton, "That it was his opinion the Elector should accept of the Crown, and England openly support him. And therefore as soon as there should be certain news of his Coronation, the bells ought to be rung, guns fired, and bonfires made, to let all Europe see the King was determined to countenance him." But this advice was not followed. The King maintained in the Council Ferdinand's cause against the States of Bohemia, and without knowing any thing of their Privileges, as he afterwards owned, decided that the Bohemian States were in actual rebellion (9). As for the reasons with which the Archbishop supported his opinion, in his Letter to Naunton, the King rejected them, as built upon Puritan-principles (10). For, as I have elsewhere observed, there were in this Reign State-Puritans as well as Church-Puritans, whom the Court took great care to confound one with another, and this confusion of ideas has been preserved to this day. Hence the obscurity which still occurs in the notion of the two Parties of Whigs and Tories. It was therefore resolved, the King should admonish the Elector to refuse the offered Crown, not only because it was agreeable to the King's Principles, but for another and no less strong reason, namely, the King rightly judged that the Electors acceptance could not but be extremely prejudicial to the negotiation of the Spanish match, considering the strict union between the Princes of the House of Austria.

But the Elector Palatine had broken these measures by accepting the Crown, without expecting the Council of England's resolution. The King was so angry, that he refused to give Baron d'Aulni audience, who, since his departure, had received orders to excuse the Elector from the necessity he was under of proceeding with all possible expedition. If the States of Bohemia had designed to gain King James, by electing his Son-in-law, they were very much deceived, since they were never assisted by him. The very Ambassadors, sent by King James on this occasion to the Emperor, and several German Princes, did great injury to the States; for these Ambassadors had express orders to disavow Frederic's proceedings, and of all the Protestant Princes, James alone never gave him the title of King.

(1) This would have brought off this match at the dearest rate; and, as far as they durst, opposed it by Speeches, Counsels, Wishes, Prayers, &c. Ryfuorth, Tom. 1. p. 4.

(2) James Lord Hay it seems had married, on November 6. 1617, Lucy the Duke's youngest Daughter, without his consent, and he was so much displeased with the match, that he could hardly be brought to accept of his Liberty from the hands of his Son-in-law. The fine of 30,000*l.* which he had been condemned to, was compounded at 1000*l.* State of the Revenue, p. 11. His Daughter was the same Lady, who under the title of Countess of Carlisle, made the most shining Figure in the Court of Charles I. as a Beauty, Wit, and Politician. The old Duke, when he came out of the Tower, hearing that Buckingham was drawn about with six Horles in his Coach, (being the first that was so,) put on eight to him, and in that manner was drawn through the City, in his way to the Bath. Wylson, p. 720.

(3) Doctor Williams was not made Dean of Westminster till July the 12th, 1620. Nor Bishop of Lincoln till July 1621. Philips, p. 57, 68, 76. — He was reported to be married to Buckingham's Mother. Widley, p. 138.

(4) Ryfuorth places the Queen's death on the 17th of November 1619. Rapin. — Camden says, he died March the 10. 1619. of a Dropy in the Night. Annals, Houers, p. 1037. The Character of this Queen is variously drawn. Some represent her as a vicious, lewd, and luxurious Woman; but this, upon the best enquiry, seems to be only calumny. Wylson more justly ascribes, that she was a good Woman, and may have engraven upon her Monument, a Character of Virtue. See Sir E. Pagyn, p. 27, 28. Wylson, p. 719, &c.

(5) He was elected by the Archbishop of Mentz, the Duke of Saxony, and the Electors of Brandenburg, Colon, and Treves. Ryfuorth, Tom. 1. p. 11.

(6) The 5th of August. Rapin makes use sometimes of the New stile, which in the last Century was ten days before our reckoning, and is now eleven. The Elector Palatine was crowned November 4. Wylson, p. 721.

(7) They offered the Crown first to the Duke of Saxony, who refused it. The Elector Palatine accepted it, through the persuasion of his two Uncles, Maurice Prince of Orange, and the Duke of Bruns. Burnet's Hist. p. 13.

(8) Some say, it was the Baron of Dhom. I own, I am not certain, whether it was d'Aulni, or Dhom. Rapin. — Most of our Historians call that Person the Baron Dene, as the Annals, p. 42. Wylson, p. 721, &c. In Rymer's Fœd. he is called the Baron de Dona. T. m. 1. p. 100.

(9) He was so filled of the opinion of a divine Right in all Kings, that he could not bear, that even a elective and limited King should be called in question by his Subjects. Burnet's Hist. p. 13.

(10) The Archbishop says in his Letter, "It is a great honour to his Majesty, to have such a Son made a King; and methinks I do foresee a great work of God, that by degrees the Kings of the Earth shall now leave the Whore to devastation, as St. John says. On drinking in will comfort the Bohemians, honour the Palgrave, strengthen the Union, bring on the Dutch, stir up Denmark, &c. &c. &c. On this they say, and Hungary I hope will run the same fortune, and for money and means to support the war, providentia Deus. This from my bed, and when I can stand, I hope to do better service, Sign 12. 1619. The Letter in Ryfuorth is something different from this, particularly, he says, "The Archbishop says, 'The Parliament is the old and honorable way of raising Money, and all that may be saved is to be turned this way. And perhaps God has provided the jewels which are in the Tower by the Mother for the preservation of the Daughter. Certainly, if I could be given to this action, many brave Spirits would be made.'"

1619. Mean while, though the Elector was now crowned, the King his Father-in-law fancied, he could persuade him to quit the Crown, and induce the States of Bohemia to acknowledge Ferdinand. To that purpose, he sent two Ambassadors to Prague, namely, Richard Weston a Papist, and Sir Edward Conway a Protestant. Conway being afterwards made Secretary of State, the King used to say to him merrily, that never Prince had such a Secretary, who could neither read nor write (1). This Embassy was very fruitless, as it was easy to foresee.

Mean time, the King of Spain did not forget to do the Emperor good service, keeping King James in his pacific disposition. Nothing was talked of at the Court of Madrid, but the King of England's generosity, justice, and equity. In fine, to amuse him the better, the negotiation of the marriage was renewed, having been interrupted, in expectation of the Pope's dispensation. Nay, it was intimated to Cottington, that if the dispensation did not quickly arrive, the marriage should be concluded without it, or means found to force the Pope to grant it. Cottington, who knew the Spanish Court, fell into the snare. He sent word to England, that nothing more was to be expected concerning the marriage; that the King of Spain's intent was only to amuse his Majesty, and therefore he believed, the negotiation ought to be broke off. But instead of seeing his advice followed, he received orders to declare to the King of Spain, that his master was not concerned in the acceptance of the Crown of Bohemia: That his Son-in-law had proceeded without his approbation and knowledge, and therefore he entirely disowned him. Philip answered, he was glad to find the King his Brother in so equitable a disposition, and that nothing could sooner gain his esteem and affection, than the continuance of this express disowning an action so repugnant to justice (2).

The affair of Bohemia put several of the Princes of Europe in motion, and held the rest in suspense. Ferdinand and Frederic had each their friends and allies, who were preparing to assist them, whilst James stood neuter, imagining, that by making a show of neutrality, he should induce the two competitors to make him arbiter of their difference. But both were jealous of him, the one because he was a Protestant, and Father-in-law of his adversary; the other, because he had openly declared, he disapproved of his conduct. So, without much regarding his solicitations, both sides prepared to decide the quarrel by arms.

Had England espoused Frederic's cause, and with a good Fleet kept Spain and the Netherlands in awe, the Elector, very probably, would have preferred his Crown, in so good a situation were his affairs the beginning of the year 1620. Several Princes of Germany had formed a League to support him, and were now levying an army, to be commanded by the Prince of Anspach (3). On the other hand, Bethlen Gabor Prince of Transylvania, had excited the Hungarians to rebel against Ferdinand, and most part of Austria had followed the example of Hungary and Bohemia. All this confounded the Emperor, and would have confounded him more, if the Elector of Saxony had still remained neuter, according to his first resolution. But the Emperor offering him Upper Lusatia, on condition he would conquer it, he could not withstand the temptation of acquiring a Country which lay so convenient for him. Moreover, the Duke of Bavaria, and the three Ecclesiastical Electors (4), declared for the Emperor: the Pope supplied him with money, and the King of Spain ordered his forces at Naples and in the Milanese to march to his assistance.

But this was not all the aid, the Spaniard gave the Emperor. He assisted him still more considerably, in hindering James from aiding his Daughter and Son-in-law, and keeping him immovable, and, as it were, enchanted, with the hopes of the marriage and dowry of two millions. To hold him the faster in his chains, Philip sent back Count Gondemar, under colour of finishing the affair. He dissembled to artfully, that James, who had recalled Digby (5) from Spain, sent thither Sir Walter Aston, to endeavour with Cottington to finish the Treaty, which he thought very near a conclusion. Gondemar being returned to England with great sums of money, laid them out so pertinently, and made such good use of his talents and knowledge of the Court, that he became as master of the King, the Favourite, and the Ministers, and governed them as he pleased.

To this aid, which was not inconsiderable, Philip was William preparing to add another more effectual, to enable the Emperor to get the advantage of his enemy. Frederic had drawn ten thousand men out of the Palatinate, and sent them into Bohemia. This inspired the Emperor with the thoughts of invading him on that side, and to execute this project, Philip and the Archduke Albert levied in the Low-Countries an army of twenty six thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, to be commanded by Ambrose Spinola. The truce between Spain and the United Provinces not being yet near expired, it was evident these forces could be designed only against the Palatinate. The Hollanders warned King James of it, and such of the Courtiers as were not bribed with Spanish Gold, never ceased to represent to him the danger to which the Elector's dominions would be exposed, if he did not suddenly resolve to prepare for their defence. But James could not think of taking such measures on so bare suspicions. He contented himself, with ordering Sir Thomas Edmonds, his Ambassador at Brussels, to ask the Archduke the reason of so considerable an armament. The Archduke answered, It was by the King of Spain's order, and the reason might be known of Spinola, who had the command of the army. Spinola being asked the same question, replied, That indeed he was ordered by the King of Spain to raise forces, but did not know for what purpose: that his orders being sealed, he could not open them till his march, and if the Ambassador would follow him, he might then be resolved. A man must have been wilfully blind, not to see what this mystery tended to, and yet James still continued immovable, relying on the Spaniard's friendship, and Gondemar's fair promises.

The whole Kingdom was extremely surprized at the King's inflexibility for his Son-in-law, his Daughter, and their Children: but for his part, he looked upon the quarrel between the Emperor and Frederic in quite another light. He was just going to be strictly united with the House of Austria, by his Son's marriage with the Infanta of Spain, and at this very time, the Elector his Son-in-law had broken all his measures by a rash, unjust, and inconsiderate action; for so he termed the acceptance of the Crown of Bohemia. "Is it reasonable," said he, "I should suffer myself to be drawn by a Son-in-law's ambition and humour, into a war against the House of Austria, who have done me no wrong? Must I alter all my projects, all my measures, because the Elector Palatine has been pleased to accept the Crown of Bohemia, without so much as asking my advice" (6)? However, by much persuasion, he was prevailed with at length to suffer a Regiment of two thousand two hundred men to be raised, which was done mostly at the charge of some Lords. Sir Horatio Vere, who had long served in Holland, where he had acquired great reputation, commanded this Regiment, having under him Burroughs and Herbert for Major-Generals. The Earls of Oxford and Essex accompanied him, and commanded each a company of Gentlemen Volunteers (7).

This Regiment being raised with extreme speed, was transported to Holland. Then they passed the Rhine below Wesph, to avoid Spinola, who was at Aix la Chapelle. It is hard to say, whether they were not without danger, that the English crossed so many Countries to reach the Palatinate: nay, they durst not have attempted it, if Prince Frederic Henry of Nassau, with two thousand Horse, and some Foot, had not conducted them to Frankfort, and deceived Spinola's vigilance, who expected them on another road. It was the 1st of October before they joined the army of the King of Bohemia's allies (8), commanded by the Markgrave of Anspach.

Spinola, who departed from Brussels the 8th of August, being come to Coblenz, opened his orders in the presence of the English Ambassador, who had accompanied him thus far. The orders were, to make war upon all who should declare for the Elector Palatine. This was all Edmonds

Not that he had any intent to go to war with the House of Austria let what would happen, but hoped, this would be a good pretence to get money, which he wanted very much. To this end likewise it was debated in Council, how to make preparations for the defence of the Palatinate, in case the King's mediation was rejected. Gondemar having notice of what had passed at the Board, writ to the Marquis of Buckingham, desiring to know what was the King's intention. Here is the favorite's answer, which plainly discovers the King's thoughts,

Buckingham's Letter to Gondemar. Gondemar explains the King's thoughts upon the Palatinate. Du Chesne, p. 145. H. A. of the Rebellion in Bohemia. Part 5. p. 712.

I Shewed your Letter to the King, who thinks your request reasonable. He has ordered me to tell you, that the Speech he lately made to the Council, contained two principal points: First, whereas the World talked so variously of him, he declared, he was so far from advising the Elector Palatine to accept the Crown of Bohemia, that he used his utmost endeavours to dissuade him from it. For the particulars of what he said upon this subject, he refers to the Lord Digby, who being present, can inform your Excellency. His Majesty declared moreover, he was resolved to continue neuter for three reasons. First, because his Conscience obliged him to it. Secondly, because his honour was concerned. Thirdly, not to give an ill example. Upon the first reason he said, he was sure the Religion he professed did not allow that Crowns should be removed from one head to another on account of Religion: That our Church very justly opposed the principle of the Jesuits, who take upon them to introne and dethrone Kings according to their fancy: That our Religion enjoins us to obey our Princes and Sovereigns, though they should be Turks or Infidels: That the world was inclined to turn this to a religious war, to which his Majesty is entirely averse. As to the point of Honour, the King said, That being solicited by the King of Spain to use all his interest to procure a peace between the Emperor and the Bohemian States, and this accident, of accepting the Crown of Bohemia, happening whilst his Ambassador was in Germany mediating an accommodation, he was obliged to make known his innocence, in order to save his honour: That if now he alighted his Son-in-law in this affair, his actions would be directly contrary to his protestation, which would be very dishonorable. Upon the third reason, his Majesty declared, It was a very dangerous precedent against all Christian Princes, to allow of the translation of a Crown by the People's authority: That though he was King by hereditary Right, yet it could not be sufficiently considered, how far this mischief might reach, if once it took root, and that this example might very sensibly affect the King of Denmark his Brother-in-law, whose Crown was elective: That as for the privileges the Bohemians might have, in this case, by the ancient and fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, it would be necessary to turn over many Volumes, read abundance of Histories, and carefully examine what their Rights are, before this point could be determined, with which he has nothing to do, not being made Judge of the dispute. The second thing, concerning which the King declared himself, was the affair of the Palatinate. Upon this point he first informed his Council, that he had omitted nothing, as well by means of his Ambassadors, as by his own mouth, in speaking to your Excellency: That moreover, he had sent an Ambassador to the German Princes, who were concerned in the affair, to remonstrate to them, that since he had with so much sincerity and candor continued neuter, he had great reason, on the other hand, to represent to them how much he was concerned in the invasion of the Palatinate, since he had given his Daughter to the Elector Palatine, bona fide, whilst that Prince was in possession of his dominions, and long before these troubles could be foreseen: That at present, his Grandchildren were lawful heirs to it, and it was neither just nor reasonable to deprive them of their inheritance, since they are not guilty, considering the sincerity of the King their Grandfather: That indeed, it cannot be denied, there was notice given from Spain, that the Emperor would be forced to make this diversion, to free himself from the oppression he endured in Bohemia and Austria: That your Excellency said the same thing, which was confirmed by his Ambassadors: That the invasion being really made, nature obliged him to provide for the defence of his Grandchildren by all possible and lawful ways: That the approaching winter allowed him to make two sorts of preparations: First, to endeavour, that a Peace may be concluded before summer; and if, as he hoped, the Elector his Son-in-law would be guided by him, and the Emperor be willing to hearken to the overtures which would be made him, he did not question but a Peace would ensue, and the calamities Christendom was threatened with, both by a Turkish invasion and an intestine war, would be happily prevented. But if the Elector would be willing to yield to reasonable terms, and the Emperor refuse to comply, in that case he would not lose the opportunity of the winter, to prepare for the defence of the Palatinate: and if, on the contrary, the Elector remained obstinate, he would then leave him to his own counsels.

After the King had thus spoken, it was debated in Council concerning the means of defending the Palatinate, as the Lord Digby could have informed your Excellency. To conclude this Letter, his Majesty commands me to assure you, upon the honour of a Christian King, that this is all that has passed in this affair either in public or private. He is persuaded, not only your Excellency but the King of Spain also will believe it, sooner than all the informations which thro' ignorance or malice may be given you from any other place."

The King's whole conduct, whether at the time this Letter was writ, or afterwards, agrees so exactly with the sentiments therein expressed, that it would be in vain to question its being genuine (1). It is certain, the King never intended to defend the Palatinate by arms, whilst he had any hopes of concluding the Prince his Son's Marriage with the Infanta. He used however this pretence to draw money from his Subjects, and to send a Letter signed by the Council to all the Nobility, and to the Lord Mayor of London, for a Benevolence (2). But probably this method was unsuccessful, so much were the people dissatisfied with the Government. At the very time he seemed desirous to defend the Palatinate, invaded by the Spaniards, Count Gondemar properly governed England by his influence over the King (3). All who had any expectations from the Court, were extremely careful not to offend him in any thing whatever, knowing how much it was in his power to prejudice such as he was displeased with. Secretary Naunton failing, on some occasion, to make use of this policy, lost his place, which was given to Conway.

On the other hand, the Marquis of Buckingham ruled in the King's name, without bearing the least contradiction. He absolutely disposed of all Offices, or rather his Mother, since he could not deny her any thing (4). As she was extremely greedy of money, and a great bigot to the Romish Religion, none were preferred but such as could make large presents to the Favorite's mother, and were well inclined to Rome, or at least indifferent in point of Religion. Nay, Places were frequently taken from those who had paid dear for them, in order to dispose of them to new purchasers. Montague having given twenty thousand pounds for the office of Lord-Treasurer, was removed before the year expired (5), and Sir Lionel Cranfield put in his place, and created soon after Earl of Middlesex (6). Cranfield had been a Merchant in London, and afterwards a Custom-house officer, from whence he was introduced into Court as a Projector: a name given to such as suggested to the Ministers expedients to bring money into the King's Exchequer, when there was no Parliament.

The Marquis of Buckingham, about the end of the year, married the Earl of Rutland's only daughter, the richest heiress in the Kingdom. Some say, he debauched her before Marriage, and the Earl of Rutland sent him word, if he did not espouse her, the King's favour should not screen him from his revenge. Buckingham readily complied, since it was a very advantageous match for him. But as the young Lady was bred a Papist by her mother, she must, for form sake, be instructed by Dr. White, who, as it is pretended, made her a good Protestant. However, she was brought by her mother-in-law into the old way again.

The affairs of the Protestant Religion in Germany and France were in a very ill situation. On the other hand, the King of Bohemia being driven out of his Kingdom, law himself upon the point of losing also the Palatinate. All the world murmured to behold the King's extreme indolence with respect to these two affairs, wherein he was particularly concerned as a Father, as a King of England, and as a Protestant. These murmurs produced at length a Parliament. Not that the Court's intent was to satisfy the people: but it was judged, since they were so desirous, that proper measures should be taken for the defence of Religion and the Palatinate, the House of Commons would be ready to grant the King an aid answerable to so important a design. A Parliament was therefore summoned to meet on the 20th of January 1621 (1). But the better to persuade the publick, the King was really bent upon a war, the Council nominated, a few days before the Parliament met, a certain number of the most noted Lords and Officers, who had orders to meet and give their Opinion concerning the means of vigorously carrying on the war. Mean while, as the People talked too freely of the King's and his Ministry's conduct, they were forbid by Proclamation to discourse of State-affairs. But this prohibition produced a quite contrary effect, it being hardly possible to stop people's tongues by such means.

The King, no doubt, wished to preserve the Palatinate for his Son-in-law. All he could be blamed for was, his taking a wrong course to that end. Amused, or as it were bewitched by Gondemar's charm, he believed the Prince's Marriage with the Infanta was the most proper means, not perceiving that this marriage was only a decoy to deceive and hinder him from taking better measures. It will doubtless be thought strange, that James should suffer himself to be thus managed by a Spanish Ambassador, in an affair, which so much concerned the House of Austria: but it will be the less surprizing, if his situation be considered. First, he had an aversion to War, and tho' he would have made believe, it was out of reason and choice, it is certain however, this aversion was so natural, that it was almost impossible for him to overcome it. In the next place, his opinion concerning the extent of the Royal Power, made him dread all occasions of causing his Prerogative to be questioned. If he engaged in a War, he must call a Parliament, and the Parliament had already convinced him, they were not of his sentiment concerning the extent of the Prerogative Royal, of which he was so jealous. It is therefore no wonder, that of the two ways which offered to preserve the Palatinate, namely, War, and the Prince's Marriage, he should chuse that which was most agreeable to his temper and inclination. What is more strange, is, that in comparing these two ways, he should be so blind as to think the Marriage the easiest and most proper, and would not see that it was only a snare to deceive him. On the other hand, he was not satisfied with resolving to take this method rather than the other, but even affected to intimate to the House of Austria, that he should not, till the last extremity, think of having recourse to arms, and thereby married all his affairs. The Emperor and King of Spain knew how to improve these wrong proceedings. Gondemar having easily discovered the King's Scheme, failed not to encourage him to pursue it stedfastly, by putting him in hopes of success. There was another and very strong reason for Gondemar's keeping the King in this situation. The Truce between Spain and Holland being like to end quickly, if the King should resolve to support his Son-in-law by arms, he would be able to make such a diversion in the Low-Countries, as would render the conquest of the Palatinate dear to the House of Austria. For this reason chiefly the Courts of Vienna and Madrid flattered him with the hopes of obtaining an honorable Peace for the Prince Palatine. But these were only words, which James, too credulous, took for deeds.

Though the King did not intend to declare War with Spain, he was very glad however that the people were inclined to support by arms the Elector's interest. He hoped the Parliament would grant him large Sums to enable him to make himself feared, and then he fancied, it would be easy for him to determine his Son-in-law's affairs, without drawing the sword, and consequently without employing the Money which should be given him by the Parliament. Herein he meant to imitate his Great-Grandfather Henry VII. who often used this expedient to fill his coffers. But he should also have imitated his address in concealing his designs, whereas on the contrary, James's intentions were known to all.

The Parliament being assembled, the King made a Speech to both Houses, which he divided into three heads. In the first, he told them what a Parliament was, under colour of reminding them of so necessary and fundamental a point. The second contained the reasons of their meeting. In the third, he spoke of the Grievances which the People thought to have cause to complain of, and endeavoured to justify his conduct. As this Speech is very long, I shall only cite such passages as may serve to discover both the King's principles and designs. He begins thus:

MY LORDS SPIRITUAL and TEMPO- RAL, and YOU THE COMMONS.

"IN multiloquio non desit peccatum, faith the wisest of Men that ever was; and this experience I have found in mine own person, for 'tis true there have been many sessions of Parliament before this, wherein I have made many discourses to the Gentlemen of the Lower House, and in them delivered a true mirror of my heart; but as no Man's actions are free from censure, in regard of the excellency of perfection, so, it may be, it pleased God, seeing some vanity in me, to send back my words as wine spit into my own face, so as I may truly say, I have piped unto you, and you have not danced; I have mourned, and you have not lamented.

Concerning the Constitution of a Parliament.

"What is a Parliament? It is an assembly composed of a head and a body; the Monarch is the head, and the three Estates (2) the Body, which are called in a Monarchy a Parliament, which was used and created by Monarchs; For Kings were before Parliaments, who as soon as they had settled a form of Government, and were willing that the People should be governed by Laws, called their Parliaments, &c. — Only this I would have you to observe, that it is a vain thing for a Parliament to press to be popular; there is in no State a Parliament without a Monarchy. — This I put you in mind of that you serve under a Monarchy, and that we must stand and fall with it: Now consider, First, Who called you? Your King. Secondly, Whom he calls? The Peers, who in respect of the eminency of their places and highness have an interest therein by birth and inheritance, because they are to assist the King in his great Affairs. In the next, the Church, the Clergy, not all, but the principal heads thereof, the Bishops. — The Knights stand for the Shires, and the other Gentlemen for the Burroughs: of these is the whole body compact.

"Thirdly, Why are called? To give the King your advice in such errands as he shall ask of you, or you shall think fit to ask his advice in.

"The King makes Laws, and ye are to advise him to make such as will be best for the Common-wealth. There is another cause for which the House of Commons is called, for that they best know the particular estate of their Country; and if the King shall ask their advice, they can best tell what is amiss, as being most sensible. And also petition him to redress and amend it; they are the authors of dissolution also to him, to supply his necessities, and that is the proper use of a Parliament. Here they are to offer what they think fit to supply his wants, and he is in lieu thereof to afford them mercy and justice.

"And this I dare boldly say, and I am not ashamed to speak it, that all people owe a kind of tribute to their King, as a thankfulness, for his love to them; and where there is this sympathy between a King and his People, it breeds a happy Parliament. —

Concerning Religion.

"As for Religion there are Laws enough, so as the true intent and execution follow. —

"As touching the rumour which is spread, that I should tolerate Religion in respect to the Match which hath been long in treaty with Spain for my Son; I profess I will do nothing therein which shall not be honorable and for the good of Religion, else am I not worthy to be your King; and if any thing break off this match, it shall be the cause of Religion. The trial which you have had of my words and writings, wherein I have been a Martyr, tortured in the mouths of many idle Fellows, may give you ample testimony of my integrity, in such sort, as I hope you will trust

Concerning the Reasons of calling the Parliament.

"Now the major errand (I speak truth) for which I have called you, is for a supply of my urgent necessities in urgent causes; ye can all bear me witness, that I have reigned above eighteen years among you; if it hath been a fault in me that you have been at peace all this time, I pray you pardon it; for I took it for an honour unto me, that you should live quietly under your vines and fig-trees, reaping the fruits of your own labours, and myself to be a just and merciful King among you. You have not been troubled with preffing of men, nor with other inconveniences which the disasters of war produce, and yet in these eighteen years have I had less supplies than any King before me. The late Queen of famous memory was so far supplied in her time, that it grew to an annual contribution of one hundred thirty five thousand pounds a year: I had never above four Subsidies and six Fifteenths. I challenge not more of desert than she; but sure I am, I have governed as peaceably. The time since my supply hath been as the time of Women with Child, Que decem tulit infidia mensis, who after ten months longings, are delivered of their burthens; but I have travailed ten years, and therefore full time to be delivered of my wants.

"Now you have seen a trial of my late care in divers years last past in looking into the particulars of my Estate, wherein I must confess I have found my revenue (as Job's friends) forsaking me. [In my household expences I have abated ten thousand pounds per Annum, in my Navy I have abated twenty five thousand pounds, and shortly I hope to abate ten thousand pounds more. In my Ordinary I have brought the expence from thirty four thousand to fourteen thousand pounds,] and yet I was loth to believe at first that these were so much out of order; but at last, by the information of some private Gentlemen, I was induced to enter into a particular survey; and herein was the Love of my young Admiral to me, as he took the envy of all upon himself for my sake: And though he be but young, yet I find him true in faith, and an honest man, and hath had the best success in all he hath taken in hand: He appointed under himself divers Commissioners, as a young Commander should do, the better to preserve himself from errors, and yet sought no reward but my good and service, nevertheless went through with great diligence and good success: And therefore I hope the Kingdom shall say I have now a true care of my estate, not taking from others by violence, house or land, but governing my own with good husbandry."

Concerning the affair of Bohemia, he said much the same things as the Marquis of Buckingham writ in his Letter to Count Gondemar, after which he added:

"I am now to take for a worse danger against next summer, albeit I will leave no travel untried to obtain a happy Peace; but I thought good to be armed against the worse time, it being best to treat of Peace with the sword in my hand: Now I shall labour to preserve the rest of the Palatinate, wherein I declare, That if by fair means I cannot get it, my Crown, my Blood, and all shall be spent, with my Son's Blood also, but I will get it for him; and this is the cause of all, that the cause of Religion is involved in it, for they will alter Religion where they conquer, and so perhaps my Grandchild may suffer who hath committed no fault at all. But this is nothing without a speedy supply, Bis dat qui cito dat.

"Consider who it is that moves you? your King: and the care of the Reformation, and the charges which he hath disbursed, besides forty thousand pounds upon the pyrrical wars; and consider if I deserve not your respects?"

"It is strange that my Mint hath not gone this eight or nine years, but I think the fault of the want of money is in the uneven balancing of Trade; for other things I confess I have been liberal, but the main cause of my wants has been the ill Government of those whom I have trusted under me, for I will not make every day a Christmass; and yet it may be in some grants I have hurt myself, and in others my Subjects;

but if I be truly informed, I will rightly reform them.

"But for you to hunt after grievances to the prejudice of the King and yourselves, is not the errand: Deal with me as I shall deserve it at your hands: I will not leave any thing undone that becomes a just King, if you deal accordingly."

"I know this Parliament hath been of great expectation, and so was that at my first coming: You I knew, but not the Laws and customs of this land. I was led by the old Counsellors I found, which the old Queen left, and it may be there was a mistaking and misunderstanding between us which bred an abrupt. And at the last Parliament there came up a strange kind of Beast called Undertakers (1), a name, which in my nature I abhor, which caused a dissolution.

"Now you have that advantage that I call you out of my own free motion, and my trust is in your good offices: For my good States, even all and every one shall find an honest King of me.

"How happy a fame will that be, that he is revered and loved of all his people, and he reciprocally loves them. So shall I then be honoured by my neighbour Princes, and peradventure my Government be made an example for posterity to follow (2)."

Many remarks and reflections might be made upon this Speech; but as that would lead me too far, I shall content myself with making one single observation. This Speech contained some maxims concerning the Regal Power, which certainly the English in general did not then admit, as they do not even at this day. If since King James's accession, the Parliament, or the Commons in particular, had endeavoured to incroach upon his Prerogative, it might not be thought strange that he should let them know his resolution to maintain it, and mark out the bounds they were not to exceed. But if we consider what passed in the two first Parliaments of this Reign, the Commons did not begin to attack the King, but the King himself gave the Parliament cause to complain. And supposing the Grievances complained of by the Lower-House were groundless, to represent them to the King was no attempt upon the Prerogative-Royal; and yet this was the only reason of dissolving the two first Parliaments. It appears moreover, not only in this to the present Parliament, but also in his former Speeches, that he made his Prerogative to consist in an unlimited Power, since he said in express terms, That as to dispute what God may do, is Blasphemy; so is it sedition in Subjects to dispute what a King may do in the height of his Power (3). Hence it was easy to infer, he let no bounds to the Prerogative-Royal.

The occasion of calling the Parliament was so plausible, that the Commons easily perceived, if they began, according to custom, with the consideration of the Grievances, before they gave the King money, he would not fail to say, that a delay in so important a juncture was the same as a denial. The people were extremely incensed against Spain for invading the Palatinate. They dreaded the Prince's marriage with the Infanta, and the destruction of the Protestant Religion abroad. So to deny the King money on this occasion, would be justifying his indolence. Some Members, however, believing the King had no design to make war, were desirous to spare the people's purses. But the rest demonstrated to them, the necessity of sacrificing a sum of money, whether the King employed it in defence of the Palatinate, or put it to other uses. In the first case, the Publick would have what they wished, and the money given the King, would be only a small part of what was farther to be expended in support of the war. In the second case, the King's intentions would be manifestly known, and that would afford a just motive to refuse him money hereafter for imaginary undertakings. So, without any solicitation, the Commons granted the King two entire Subsidies (4), with which he was satisfied, in expectation of obtaining much more hereafter on the same account.

Not long after, the King sent the Lord Digby to Vienna, Digby is sent to endeavour to adjust the Elector Palatine's affair, or at least, to obtain a Truce, which should secure the Palatinate from the danger it was threatened with in the next campaign. I shall speak of this negotiation, after the recital of what passed in the Parliament.

The Subsidy Act was no sooner passed, but many Petitions were received by the House of Commons, as well against the increase of Popery, and impunity of Recusants, as against Monopolies, Informers, or Projectors. Of the Monopolies, three were chiefly complained of. The first was concerning Inns, which no man could keep without a 1621. Licence from certain persons, to whom the King had granted a Patent. The second was of the same nature with respect to Ale-houses. The third was the most enormous. It was a Patent granted by the King to Sir Giles Monpesson, and Sir Francis Michel, for the sole making and selling of Gold and Silver Lace. By this means, they sold great quantities of counterfeit Gold Lace instead of real, and if any person presumed to make or sell any other, he was thrown into goal, and fined severely (1). The two Patentees being informed against in the House of Commons, were immediately committed to prison: but Monpesson, Buckingham's creature, found means to make his escape. As soon as he was safe, the King published a Proclamation, promising a reward to any person that should take him.

Mean while, the two Houses applied themselves closely to the affair of Monopolies. The Commons would know how these two persons obtained their Patent, whilst the Lords were diligently forming their process. In the mean time, the King was very uneasy. He saw, this affair was examining in such a manner, that the odium could not but fall upon himself or favorite. Wherefore, to prevent the consequences, he came to the House of Lords, and made a Speech full of tender and affectionate expressions. He affirmed, he was ignorant of the ill effects his Patent had caused, and charged them to bring the offenders to speedy and severe justice: adding, his intention was to revoke all his Patents which had been so injurious to the people, and particularly that of Gold and Silver Lace, which was a kind of false coin. He exhorted them, moreover, to dispatch the Bill they were preparing against Informers and Projectors, saying, he had [before in the Star-Chamber] shewn his dislike of such people, and to be rid of them, would be the greatest ease to himself, [and all those about him.] "For, continued he, Buckingham told me he 'never found such quiet and rest as in this time of Parliament from Projectors and Informers, who at other times miserably vexed him at all hours.'" In short, he told them, he thought till then the People had never been so happy as in his Reign: but now he was ashamed to consider how his People had been vexed and polled, by the vile execution of Projects, Patents, Bills of Conformity, and the like, which have more exhausted their purses than Subsidies would have done. Having thus obviated the complaints which could be made against him, by condemning first the occasion of them, he taught the Lords how they were to proceed in equitably judging the matters before them, namely, not to suffer themselves to be carried away with an inconsiderate zeal for justice, in hearkening to those who accused the innocent as well as the guilty.

Every one knew that he meant to hinder the Marquis of Buckingham from being attacked, who was reckoned the chief author of the Monopolies. He had indeed the satisfaction to see that the Parliament did not carry this affair very far. But though he had ordered his Speech to be printed, and dispersed, he could not hinder reflections to his disadvantage. For instance, he said in his Speech, that he assured them in the heart of an honest man, and by the faith of a Christian King, if these Grievances had been complained of to him before the Parliament, he would have punished them more severely than perhaps the Parliament intended to do; and yet he was contented with abandoning Monpesson and Michel, whilst he desired the person who procured them their Patent should be left unmolested.

However this be, the Lords were satisfied with punishing Monpesson and Michel. They confiscated Monpesson's estate, who had made his escape, and degraded him of his Knighthood (2). Michel was likewise degraded, fined a thousand pounds, imprisoned for life, and carried on horseback with his face to the tail, through the publick streets in London.

Shortly after, the King hearing, complaints were brought before the Peers against Chancellor Bacon, came to the House of Lords, and sending for the Commons, made a Speech, wherein he chiefly insisted upon the necessity of punishing corruption and bribery in Judges. Then he thanked the Commons for the two Subsidies, but said, the money had been employed before-hand for the defence of the Palatinate, and maintenance of his Children, who were fled to Holland for refuge: That he had procured a short truce, and hoped soon to obtain a general peace; but the great charges of sending Ambassadors over all Europe, or an army into the Palatinate in case his negotiations became fruitless, required a much larger sum than what had been granted him. He concluded, with protesting before God, he would not dissolve the Parliament till the affairs in agitation were finished.

Mean while, the House of Commons having demanded a conference of the Lords, represented to them, that the Chancellor being accused of several crimes, it was not fit he should continue any longer in so eminent a post if he was guilty, or be exposed to calumny if innocent. Whereupon the Lords sent the Chancellor to the Tower, and prepared for his trial. He used all possible endeavours to avoid the shame of a particular and full confession. To that end, he presented an humble submission to the House, confessing himself guilty in general, and imploring pardon, or at least, that his punishment might not extend farther than the taking from him the Great Seal. But the Lords were inexorable. They required him to confess the particulars of the Charge, which consisted in the enumeration of several bribes he had taken. He was so very express, that he confessed, one of his servants took a dozen of buttons as a gift, in a cause depending before him (3). But this confession, however full and plain it was, did not hinder him from being declared unworthy, not only of the office of Chancellor, but even of having a place for the future in the House of Peers (4), though he had been created Baron of Verulam, and Viscount of St. Albans (5): Nay, he was like to have been deprived of this dignity (6). He was a very great Genius, and one of the most learned men in Europe, but a servile flatterer, extremely haughty whilst fortune smiled upon him, and cringing when the frowned. After his disgrace, he composed several Works, and amongst others, the History of King Henry VII, to whom certainly he has not given a just character. This is not surprising; for as his estate was forfeited by the sentence passed upon him, and as he lived only on a pension from the King, who always spoke of Henry VII. his Great-Grandfather with high commendations, he made his court to the King, by representing that Prince as a pattern of wisdom and virtue (7).

It was properly in this third Parliament that two Parties were formed, the one for the Court, the other for the People, who began from this time to oppose one another on all occasions. The People had the strongest party among the Commons, and the King in the House of Lords. Not but that the Kings had always their adherents in both Houses, and the Ministers and Favorites their enemies and enviers. But till this Parliament, there were not properly any formed parties, or, if any, they were not long-lived. But those that began to be formed this year, continually increased. These are the same parties which still subsist, under the names of Tories and Whigs; the first of which labours incessantly to stretch the Prerogative Royal as high as possible, when favoured by the King; and the other is always insisting on the rights and privileges of the People. The mutual animosity of these two parties, when first they were formed, was nothing in comparison of what it is at this day. When all parliamentary affairs came to be transacted with a spirit of Party, every thing tended by degrees to confusion. As one of the parties was always ready to increase the King's power, the others used their utmost endeavours, not only to keep it within due bounds, but also to lessen it, for fear the King's Prerogatives might serve him for steps to mount higher. Thus both went too far. James I. gave birth to these two parties, (who occasioned so many calamities to England and his own family) by haughtily establishing Prerogatives, which perhaps would never have been questioned, had he not founded them upon principles that opened a door to arbitrary power. He met however, with great opposition, not only in the House of Commons, but among the Peers themselves, several of whom did not scruple to contradict him openly. Of this witness number were the Earls of Essex, Oxford, Southampton, [and P. 736.] Warwick; the Lord Say and Seal, the Lord Spenser, and some others. It then became customary, that when one Lord had spoken for or against the Government, he was answered by another of the opposite party, and very often with a heat and passion unbecoming the dignity of the Houfe. One day, as the Lord Spenser was ſpeaking about the Government, and alledging ſeveral examples of their great Anceſtors, Arundel ſuddenly interrupted him, ſaying, My Lord, when theſe things you ſpeak of were doing, your Anceſtors were keeping Sheep (1). Spencer inſtantly replied, When my Anceſtors (as you ſay) were keeping Sheep, yours were plotting Treafon. Whereupon the Houſe ordering them both to withdraw, it was reſolved, in ſpite of the moſt zealous Courtiers, that the Earl of Arundel, as aggreſſor, ſhould give the Lord Spencer ſatisfaction, which he reſuſing, was ſent to the Tower, and not releaſed till he had ſubmitted to the commands of the Houſe.

Mean while, the Commons finding the King made no preparations for war, but only ſent Digby to the Emperor, were not forward to give him a freſh ſupply, eſpecially as they knew the two Subſidies already granted had been put to other uſes. They were not ignorant, moreover, that the King built all his hopes upon the Spaniſh match, and conſequently would not eaſily reſolve to take arms againſt the Houſe of Auſtria, and the more, becauſe Gondemar had ſtill a great influence over him. The truth is, had the King really intended to wreſt from the Spaniards what was taken from the Palatinate, it was not natural for the Spaniſh Ambaſſador to have ſo much power at Court. The people were extremely diſpleaſed with it, and looked upon the Spaniſh marriage as a very great miſfortune to the Nation, and the Proteſtant Religion. Of this they gave Gondemar himſelf a ſenſible proof, who was reviled and inſulted by the populace in London ſtreets (2). The King hearing of it, ordered one of the inſolent mob to be publicly whipt by the hangman.

The King perceiving the Commons would never think of granting him a freſh aid, before it was more certainly known whether there would be peace or war, ordered the Lord-Treſurer to go in his name, [on June 4.] and adjourn the Parliament to the 14th of November. The ſpirit of jealouſy, which then reigned among the Commons, cauſed them to conſider this adjournment as an inroad upon their Privileges. They pretended, the King had indeed power to prorogue and diſſolve the Parliament, but that Adjournment was the peculiar privilege of each Houſe. So they deſired a conference with the Lords, to perſwade them to concur with them, in preſenting a Petition to the King upon this occaſion. But the King acquainting the Lords, that ſuch a Petition would be very diſpleaſing to him, and that he would not ſuffer his power to call, adjourn, prorogue, and diſſolve the Parliament, to be diſputed, the Lords reſolved to join with the Commons. Whereupon the Commons declared, That they were extremely concerned at the King's reſolution, becauſe it deprived them of the means of ſuſtaining what was begun for the publick good.

This declaration brought the King to the Houſe of Peers, and after thanking their Lordſhips for acknowledging his Prerogative, and reſuſing to join with the Commons, he told them, if they deſired it, he would grant them a delay of eight or ten days; but would not do it at the requeſt of the Commons. Upon this offer, the Lords, after a conference with the Commons, moved the King to continue their ſitting for fourteen days, which was granted. Some days after, a Committee of both Houſes attending the King, he took occaſion to tell them, how ill he took it that the Commons ſhould diſpute his undoubted right to adjourn the Parliament. Probably, this power was not confirmed by cuſtom, ſince the Commons conſidered it as an invasion of their privileges, whereas they never thought of queſtioning his right to prorogue and diſſolve the Parliament. Be this as it will, the Commons, ſeeing the Lords, who were equally concerned in the affair, reſuſe their concurrence, proceeded no farther. Nevertheless, on the day they were to break up, they drew the following Declaration, That taking into moſt ſerious conſideration the preſent ſtate of the King's Children abroad, and the generally afflicted ſtate of the true Proteſſors of the ſame Chriſtian Religion, proteſted by the Church of England in foreign Parts, and being touched with a true ſenſe and fellow-feeling of their diſtreſſes, as Members of the ſame body, they do with unanimous conſent declare—they ſhall be ready to the utmoſt of their power, both with their Lives and Fortunes, to aſſiſt his Maſteſty ſo, as that he may be able to do that with his ſword, which by a peaceable courſe ſhall not be effected.

Preſently after, the King publiſhed a Proclamation, wherein he ſet forth, That as many great affairs debated in Parliament, could not be brought to perfection in ſo ſhort a time, the Commons thought it convenient to continue the ſame ſeſſion in courſe of Adjournment. That as for the Grievances, they were ſuch as he needed not the aſſiſtance of Parliament to reform the ſame, and would have redreſſed them himſelf, had they been ſooner made known to him. Adding, that by his own Regal Authority, he annulled and revoked the Patent for gold and ſilver thread, and ſome others mentioned in the Proclamation. At the ſame time a ſecond Proclamation was publiſhed againſt ſuch as were ſo bold as to talk of State-affairs, notwithſtanding his Maſteſty's former command, with threats of ſevere puniſhment, as well againſt the concealers of ſuch diſcourſes, as againſt audacious tongues and pens.

On the 20th of July, John Williams Dean of Wyſeminſter was ſworn Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal of England, the Chancellorſhip having been vacant ever ſince Bacon's condemnation.

I muſt now briefly relate what paſſed in Bohemia and the Palatinate, after the Battle of Prague. This knowledge is abſolutely neceſſary for the clear underſtanding of the affairs of England.

The day after the battle, the City of Prague ſurrendered at diſcretion, and the Duke of Bavaria returned to Munich, leaving his Army in Bohemia under the command of Count Tilly his General. On the other hand, Count Bucquoy departed the 12th of December for Moravia which voluntarily ſubmitted, as deſpairing of aſſiſtance. After Bucquoy had ſpent part of the winter in Moravia and at Vienna, he went and commanded the imperial army in Hungary, where he was ſlain, after ſome progrels. A little before, Sileſia had likewiſe ſubmitted to the Emperor.

Mean while, Count Mansfeldt had ſortified himſelf in Moravia, from whence the Imperialiſts would have found it difficult to drive him. But the King of Bohemia, who was ſtill in Holland, hearing the Duke of Bavaria was preparing to invade the Upper Palatinate, cauſed Mansfeldt to march his Army thither, having obtained of the Hollanders a hundred and fifty thouſand Florins to pay his Troops. Mansfeldt was not however in condition to withſtand Tilly, who being entered the Upper Palatinate with twenty five thouſand men, had taken Bomburg and ſome other places. Mean while, as Mansfeldt had intrenched himſelf behind a Moras, where it was impracticable to attack him, Count Tilly, to make him quit the Country, concluded a Treaty with him, by which he promiſed to ſupply him with two hundred thouſand Florins. This Treaty was concluded the 27th of September 1621, but ſome difficulty ariſing, it was not executed. So Mansfeldt kept his poſt till the Lord Digby's arrival, who paſſing that way in his return from Vienna, prevailed with him to march into the Lower Palatinate, which was in extreme danger. By this means the Upper Palatinate was really loſt and ſubdued by the Duke of Bavaria.

In the year 1620, Spinola, as I ſaid, began his conqueſts in the Lower Palatinate. Since the ſubmiſſion of the King of Bohemia's Allies to the Emperor, after the Battle of Prague, Spinola had continued his conqueſts with rapidity, for there was no army to ſtop him, and the Engliſh were too weak to oppoſe his progrels. However on the 2d of Auguſt 1620, a five weeks Truce was concluded at Haguenau which was the Truce mentioned by King James in his Speech to the Parliament. The Archduke had made him believe he agreed to this Truce purely on his account; but in reality it was only to give the Emperor time to ſend forces into the Lower Palatinate, in the room of thoſe, Spinola was leading back to the Netherlands, becauſe of the expiration of the twelve years Truce between Spain and Holland. Spinola leaving but very few Troops with Don Gonſales de Cordova, who was to command in the Palatinate, the Truce was as much for the Spaniards' advantage as for the King of Bohemia's. Shortly after, the Spaniſh Army being grown ten thouſand ſtrong, Vere was forced to retire to Wormes. Mean while, the Spaniſh Siege of Frankendal continued. There was no other way to ſave this important Place, than, as I ſaid, by cauſing Mansfeldt to come from the Upper Palatinate. Upon Mansfeldt's approach, Gonſales raiſed the Siege of Frankendal. But preſently after, Tilly arrived in the Lower Palatinate with the Bavarian army, and ſome Troops of Mentz and Wirtzburg, Mansfeldt was forced to retire into Aſſia. This Campaign ended with the loſs of all the Towns in the Lower Palatinate, except Manheim, Heidelberg, and Frankendal, which were the moſt important. Vere conti-

Philip III. died. Philip III. King of Spain died the 31st of March this year, and was succeeded by his Son Philip IV.

In France, Lewis XIII. vigorously pressed the Huguenots, and invested Montauban, but the long resistance of the Belieged, compelled him to desist.

The twelve years Truce between Spain and the United Provinces being about to expire, the Archduke was afraid, James would send a strong aid to the States, in order to oblige the Spaniards to restore what was taken in the Palatinate. To divert him from such a thought, he intimated to him, that a Peace between the Elector Palatine and the Emperor was not so difficult as was imagined, and the Emperor doubtless would agree to it upon reasonable Terms. Nay, he sent the Emperor in the Elector's behalf a very pressing Letter, which was shown to the King. This was attacking him on his weak side: for he was ever of opinion, that justice, honesty, and the regard the World had for him, were sufficient to determine this affair. To insinuate him the more easily, the Emperor writ to the Archduke, that at his instances, and out of his great respect to the King of England, he was ready to embrace all proper methods for a Peace with the Elector Palatine. On the other hand, the King of Spain told the Emperor, that if he gave the upper Palatinate to the Duke of Bavaria, as was reported, he must expect no farther assistance from Spain. All these Letters were communicated to the King, or his Ambassadors, which confirmed him in his opinion, that there would be no occasion for War, and to show the least mistrust would spoil all. Thus the Princes of the House of Austria amused the King, to induce him to remain in his fatal neutrality. Upon these hopes therefore, without questioning in the least their sincerity, he dispatched the Lord Digby to Vienna, the success of whose Negotiation I must now relate.

This Ambassador having an audience of the Emperor the 15th of July, confined his demands to these two heads. First, That the Elector Palatine should be restored to the same state he was in before he was chosen King of Bohemia. Secondly, That the imperial ban should be revoked, or at least suspended; for which the King his Father-in-law would undertake to oblige him to give the Emperor due satisfaction.

The Emperor, who only sought to gain time, answered in writing, that at the request of the King of England, and some other Princes who had writ to him in the Palgrave's behalf, he was ready to pardon him. That the difficulty of this affair consisted in two principal points, the first whereof was, that the Palgrave should pay him the obedience due to the Head of the Empire; the second, that he should give him a reasonable satisfaction. As this was exactly James's scheme for an accommodation, a Peace seemed not to be very remote. But the term, Satisfaction, being capable of a more or less extensive meaning, it was easy for the Emperor to prolong the negotiation, as he pleased. However, for fear he should be taken at his word, he added in his answer, that, as he had undertaken the war with the advice and assistance of divers Princes, he could do nothing without their consent; but had called a Diet at Ratisbon, the resolutions whereof should be communicated to the King of England. It must be observed, this Diet did not meet till January 1623.

A few days after the Emperor had delivered this answer to the Ambassador, he received a Letter from the Infanta Isabella, notifying the death of her Husband the Archduke, at Brussels the 13th of July, and repeating withal her instances in the Elector's behalf. Whereupon Digby presented a fresh Memorial, demanding a Truce for the Lower Palatinate on three conditions. 1. That Count Mansfeldt should observe the Truce, otherwise the Elector Palatine should revoke his commission. 2. That the commission of John George de Brandenburg Marquis of Jägerndorf who served the Elector, should be likewise revoked. 3. That as soon as the Truce was published, the Elector should deliver to the Emperor, Tabor and Winigau, the only Places he still held in Bohemia.
